One of the problems we are trying to get at in our brief is the educational problem of how to help children get out of that stratification or classification, or that tendency to remain at a poverty level with welfare as a way of life rather than to try to escape. I have seen references to that many times in reports presented to you. You have statistics on that.

Senator McGrand: You speak about schools that are old, gloomy and poor. Structure is only one aspect of that; buildings can be improved. The question comes down to teachers; library and reading room facilities; and the use of films and other educational devices that could give poor people a different orientation.

Apparently the well-to-do have good schools, or a good school system, while the poor do not. Apparently the poor are neglected, have poorer teachers and have poorer programs; or at least the programs they have are not of particular benefit to children of poor families. How do you define poor schools?

Brother Brennan: When we refer to poor schools, we mean they are usually poor from just about every point of view; they are the oldest, the gloomiest and the dirtiest.

Incidentally, I was talking to an electrical engineer yesterday, whose work consists in lighting and its effects upon the efficiency of people in their work. He told me that he had recently visited a plant in New Jersey which was operating below 50 per cent efficiency because of its mere physical set-up: it was gloomy, sooty and dirty. It struck me forcibly at the time that if there was any validity in his comments with respect to a mere plant they would certainly apply to schools where facilities are poor, gloomy and lack such educational devices as resource centres, library facilities, film strips and visual aids generally. In addition to that, poor schools also suffer from having teachers of lower qualifications. Moreover, poor schools lack playgrounds, indoor recreational facilities and gymnasiums.

In other words, poor schools are often schools that were built several generations ago when the added services that are found in the modern school of today just did not exist.

Miss Hodgins: I think we would agree, however, that the old building is not necessarily undesirable per se. The old building can be remodeled and made attractive. Reading facilities and the like can be built in.

Obviously it is not the fault of the federal Government that the local school boards tend to neglect old schools.

Senator McGrand: I had in mind the Duke of York School in Toronto.

Miss Hodgins: It is a good school.

Senator McGrand: Yes. It is an old school built before the turn of the century, I believe. Nevertheless, it is one of the model schools in Toronto.

Miss Channon: On page 39 of our brief we try to outline some of the features of the programs being used to improve schools. The number of students per classroom must be reduced; reading and language specialists must be brought in; meals and day care centres have to be provided, and so on.

Senator McGrand: On page 34 of your brief you mention discrimination. You say that if discrimination in Canadian society, whether conscious or unconscious, could be ended, a major step would have been taken towards the elimination of poverty.

Are you saying there that discrimination exists and that it will eventually lead to a stratification of society in which the poor will be separated from the well-to-do? If the poor are separated from the well-to-do they will have a different set of values while they are young people, and if they maintain that different set of values until their adolescence they will retain those same values for the rest of their lives. Is that what you have in mind?

Miss Channon: We do have a continuing situation of stratification, senator. I should think that is why this committee exists.

Senator McGrand: But would it become a permanent fixture?

The Chairman: I think what Miss Channon is getting at is that it could become permanent if this committee does not come up with some solution.

Mr. Goble: What has been said underlines the necessity of having the "poor" defined. There will always be those who earn less than others. But, if there is hope of mobility, that does not matter much. Many of us have experienced poverty. I did in my childhood. But if poverty is something you can escape from, then there is no permanent harm. It is when you find that there is a group developing to whom the escape routes are closed that you have a catastrophic problem.

Miss Channon: A letter we received from teachers in the Northwest Territories has in it a description of how it feels to belong to the disadvantaged group in the Northwest Territories.

Younger people... can and do make demands that are invariably denied because of a lack of economic means. They learn that economic impoverishment goes hand in hand with legal impotence, social marginality, a general knowledge deficit, and, ultimately, a profound questioning of racial adequacy and self-worth; not that fear and trembling that is the hope of the existentialists but those "cliffs of fall, frightful" that Hopkins uses as an image of the descent into despair.

That is the way our teachers of the Northwest Territories describe how it feels to be poor up there.

Senator Fergusson: Your brief was extremely interesting. The supporting documents were most helpful.

My only problem was an excessive interest in your footnotes, which had the effect of delaying my reading of the brief. I was surprised to learn that the members who make up your Teachers' Federation have had such a great interest in poverty and in the pupils who are suffering from poverty. I was delighted to see that you had done such a tremendous amount of work. It helps to contradict some of the remarks Senator Fournier made to the effect that teachers are more interested in salaries than anything else. The fact that you have produced all this material certainly shows that you have other interests besides an increase in salaries.

Senator Fournier: I must be reading the wrong newspapers. I am sorry.

Senator Fergusson: In your brief, at page 49, your first recommendation is that some form of guaranteed annual income should be established which would enable those presently defined as poor to achieve the goals of adequate housing, clothing and nourishment. Do you accept the definition of poor given by the Economic Council of Canada, or do you have some other definition of who is poor?

Miss Channon: I think we have defined as poor those who are a great deal lower in their economic status than the bulk of the population. Because of this difficulty in that, as you know, you have a range of income in which you have people who are extremely low. And the Economic Council has two definitions, the minimum and the maximum, but even those are only adopted for statistical purposes and must take into account some variation in need from one individual family to another, or from one individual to another individual.

The Chairman: I did not understand the Economic Council to set a maximum. I understood them to suggest a minimum.

Miss Channon: But they did have two definitions, didn't they, the one at 70 per cent and the other at 60 per cent?

The Chairman: No, the 70 per cent is Miss Podoluk's definition which is the accepted one and the others were merely for discussion. But the 70 per cent one for food, clothing and shelter is the accepted one. There was no maximum suggested.

Senator Fergusson: Would you accept that 70 per cent generally as being a good definition and would that apply in different areas of the country?

Mr. Goble: This cannot be a universal definition because of the categories of people that you may be talking about. There are the obvious exceptions; you may be talking about somebody who has withdrawn from the labour force for a couple of years to take a post-graduate degree and who would be living for those two years in the definition, the financial definition of poverty. But in reality he has no problem of poverty.

The Chairman: But insofar as income is concerned, wherein does he differ from anybody else?

Mr. Goble: The financial figure shows no difference, but the expectation and the hope differ very greatly, and this is where you have a great problem, I think, in setting up a universal definition in any terms because individuals will always differ. So one can only say that very broadly speaking, by and large, we think this 70 per cent definition is an adequate measure, erring if anything, on the optimistic side.

Miss Channon: I think we have got around that problem about the poor, or about the person who chooses to be poor by defining poverty as being involuntary; in other words, those who have not any choice between having and not having, and this would not apply to the case of a student in the example given.

The Chairman: But what Senator Fergusson is getting at is this; sooner or later we have to come up with a meaningful figure for a poverty line. It so happens I have brought some along with me this morning in case this matter came up. The poverty line has changed, taking a family of four—and this is the size of family we normally use—the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in 1967 had it at $4,060, and the Economic Council of Canada has it at $4,200 in 1968. The Ontario Department of Treasury and Economics in 1969 put it at $4,430, in each case taking into consideration the increased cost of living and the Gross National Product. That is the point Senator Fergusson is trying to get at. If you had the opportunity to examine the Economic Council's figures and bring them up to date, how would they strike you?

Senator Fergusson: Well, I have one or two other points I would like to bring up arising out of your recommendations. In Recommendation No. 3 you recommend "That education be given priority among possible long-term solutions to the problems of poverty." Do you include in that the learning of skills and that sort of thing or just academic education?

Brother Brennan: Whether we include it or not, education in the traditional academic sense is a pre-requisite for the training in other skills anyway. As you know, a lot of the money being used by the federal Government in retraining programs is designed to give the kind of education that the child should have got in primary and secondary schools anyway.

Senator Fergusson: So in this recommendation, you would say that pre-school training should also be included?

Brother Brennan: Particularly in this case where pre-school education is vitally essential for eventual success in the normal school situation.

Senator Fergusson: And then in the seventh recommendation, you suggest "That the federal government provide financial support for all levels of education (elementary, secondary and post-secondary) in regions of the country where there is a clear deficiency in tax-paying ability, relative to the rest of the country." That is at the bottom of the page. Of course you are aware that education is a provincial matter, so what justification would there be for the federal Government to assess those regions and decide where they are?

Brother Brennan: It seems to me that the federal Government is doing it anyway.

Senator Carter: I think Senator Fergusson's point is that the federal Government is doing it, as you say, through equalization grants, but they cannot pinpoint it as a priority.

The Chairman: Or admit that they are doing it.

Senator Fergusson: And they cannot say that they are giving it for that purpose, can they?

Miss Channon: This is a matter of belief, whether they can or can not.

Mr. Goble: If I may comment on that point, there is an extensive process of equalization going on in the distribution of revenue. This is the starting point. Now part of the process is that the provincial governments are presenting their case to the federal Government and the expense of education is by far the heaviest burden carried by the provincial governments. What we are really asking is that this should be more fully recognized than it is, and we recognize that the federal Government is still the government that has the greatest potential sources of revenue and it still has the fattest purse at its disposal. We are asking that more efforts be made to adjust the distribution of revenue to take account of the power and commitments and burdens carried by the provincial governments in which education of course stands at the top of the list. This does not mean that the federal Government should undertake a diagnostic exercise to see where education might be improved and apply specific moneys with strings attached to remedy those situations, but we would hope that this would come about through closer consultation between the various governments and the different jurisdictions. Miss Hodgins is in an authoritative position to speak on this because she is, so to speak, speaking from within a provincial jurisdiction.

Miss Hodgins: Well, as a matter of fact, we are opposed to the giving of money in education with strings attached because we feel that education is a provincial matter, but there are certain formulae; the federal Government does assist universities and does assist in vocational training and so on, and so we feel that this could be carried through. In discussing the brief, it was quite obvious that there were two basic problems, one was the poorer community, or areas where with the best will in the world they could not provide their children with good schooling because they could not pay for it, and this is an effort to meet that particular problem.

The other situation, that of the poor school in the wealthy community, is quite a different one and brings in different problems, but this community problem is the one that can be helped just by some money.

Senator Fergusson: I still cannot quite see how the federal Government can do this.

You refer to the difference in the quality of teaching between the middle class and the lower class in schools. I gathered you said, or somebody said, that the best teachers should be where the poor children are. Actually at the present time it is just the opposite, do you agree with that?

Miss Hodgins: I really cannot agree that it is just the opposite. There may be tendencies towards that.

Senator Fergusson: I gathered this from what I read.

Brother Brennan: There are notable exceptions.

Senator Fergusson: Oh, I am sure there are.

Brother Brennan: There is the Duke of York School which would be a notable exception, but everybody knows of that because to a great extent it is an exception.

Senator Fergusson: Yes, but in a general way would you not say that mostly in the poorer schools we have the poorer teachers?

Brother Brennan: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: What can we do to encourage teachers to teach the poor, as they do in the Duke of York School? What has prompted those teachers to take on that work instead of looking for a better job?

Miss Hodgins: I think that is where the development of different kinds of programs comes in, and I think there is a recommendation further on about supporting that sort of thing. I suppose we are just beginning to realize that with all these differences in background, and so on, we do have to provide different programs. The Duke of York School is really an experimental school. It is trying to develop different programs which will meet the conditions downtown, the interests of the downtown children and their backgrounds. We have the same problem in Indian education, in which we are realizing the kind of education you give the student in a city has to be different from the kind of education you give the Indian.

Brother Brennan: It is interesting to note also that, in speaking to the superintendent who controls the Duke of York School, he was telling me that he has no shortage of qualified teachers. I think one of the reasons is that the board there is making a conscious effort to upgrade the Duke of York School. They are providing facilities there, and if in these poorer schools the only thing that was different between these and the better schools was the fact that the kids were poor, I do not think you would have too much trouble getting good teachers. What aggravates the situation is the fact that not only are the kids poor, and therefore the co-operation between the home and the school is not as good as in the more affluent areas, but the facilities are usually quite inadequate and there is a series of frustrations when a teacher tries to operate in a school where conditions are not as they should be. So, an effort to upgrade these schools would be one of the ways in which to improve the teaching.

Senator Fergusson: In reference to the native peoples in your last recommendation—I seem to be spending a lot of time on these, although I have many other questions I will not have the time to ask—you did say the Government could provide assistance to enable them to develop appropriate courses for teaching the teachers of these native people. Should that not also be applied to teaching the teachers who are going to teach in poor schools?

Miss Hodgins: I think that is quite right. I was just going to comment that, again, when you study the situation and realize these situations, one of the reasons is that we have a great many young teachers in the teaching profession now, their average length of experience being probably four or five years. They find that they do not know how to handle the problems in the inner city schools, and I think that is one of the reasons. It is just not a matter of pleasanter surroundings, but they are frustrated and do not know what to do. There is a culture shock.

The Chairman: Discipline.

Miss Hodgins: No, not discipline, but there is a culture shock because they have not met this sort of people and these kinds of problems before. One of the things the educational institutions for teachers are beginning to face is the fact they have to make provision in their training for this sort of thing, because most of the teachers do come from the more comfortable homes.

The Chairman: But I do not understand the answer someone gave to Senator Fergusson. How do we justify even the thought of saying, "We are training you to teach poor children, and you can also teach other than poor children"?

Miss Hodgins: Everyone would get the same, but they would be aware of these differences in the different groups of children.

The Chairman: Are they not now aware of it, and have they not been for some time? There is no one closer to poverty than teachers, is there?

Miss Hodgins: No, not the sort of poverty we are talking about, with the culturally disadvantaged. I hate to use these terms because they become such cant, but they have not come up against this sort of family before.

The Chairman: But they meet the child every day, no matter where he lives, and they have the problem daily. We sit here once in a lifetime, and you once a month or so, but these teachers have that problem every day, Who can be closer to it?

Senator McGrand: They do not know the home and recognize them as poor children.

The Chairman: Of course they do. I do not know what teachers you are thinking about, but, surely, after they have been in a class for a month they know every child and they have some idea of every home and background.

Senator McGrand: Let me just remind you that an Indian boy came down here from Manitoulin Island, stayed here all year and went out and drowned himself in the month of March because no one knew that he could not speak English.

The Chairman: I know that example, and that is an unfortunate one. I am talking about the normal school in the sort of community in which I went to school and in which you went to school. Who knows more about the children and something of their homes than the teacher?

Senator Fergusson: I do not think they know much about the home.

The Chairman: They should.

Senator Fournier: They should, because if you are a teacher it is your business to know.

Mr. Goble: There are two major problems here. One problem is that familiarity does not necessarily produce comprehension, and the daily encounter between teacher and pupil may be completely unfruitful, the child may close up and the teacher may not know why. The other problem is one of sheer numbers, and this is truer as you go into situations where teachers are more specialized and meet more children in the course of the day, with less continuing contact. There is no time to explore a child and the nature of the problem of communicating with him. So often the teacher is taking the wrong things for granted and does not even know that he is taking the wrong things for granted, and approaches the child in ways that are normal in the area where he lives, where he has been brought up, but fails to understand why this, to use the fashionable phrase, "turns the child off" instead of obtaining responses. Here it would be of immense value if teachers had resources to turn to, in classes available to the practising teacher for in-service education, so that he could go to specialists in the areas, for example, of psychology and sociology, and say, "This is the problem I have encountered. What is it? These are the symptoms, what is the disease? What do I do to increase understanding?"

The Chairman: But we have more specialists in the educational field at the teacher level than we have ever had, have we not?

Mr. Goble: Yes, and that could be the beginning of a long debate, which might be a digression.

Specialization, of course, exists in many forms and for many reasons, and many of the areas of specialization have more to do with techniques of instruction than with these very special problems of inter-personal communication and inter-community communication.

The Chairman: Let me ask you one question with respect to what Senator Carter tried to get at, to see if there is an answer to it. In the last ten years at the federal level, the provincial level, and the municipal level we have spent vast sums of money on education. We have really opened the cash box. Did we get results? Was it worth while, or was all that money mispent?

Mr. Goble: The rewards, I believe, have been immense. When we talk about the need for further expenditures let us not overlook the fact that extraordinary progress has been made. The nature of the rewards, of course, may still be beyond our understanding. Many of them are long term in the deepest sense of that phrase, but as improvements have taken place we have become more and more aware of the intractable problems that are still there. Many of the easier ones have been greatly improved, and in many cases solved, but in this process of improvement there has been a greater isolation of the problems that have not moved.

The Chairman: Please define the problems that have moved and the problems that have not moved.

Mr. Goble: There has been a notable increase in the general level of education, both general academic education and vocational education, in all parts of the country. There have been notable improvements in retention in schools. To quote the Toronto area, for example, I believe that in the secondary school system there they have come very close to complete retention, which is a very fine achievement indeed. We have become more aware of the problems of the indigenous people, for example—the special and very intractable problems of Indian, Metis, and Eskimo communities which, because of their remoteness, have often escaped attention. We have become more clearly aware that the poor themselves in some parts of the country constitute a sub-culture, and almost a separate population which is not benefiting from the general improvements that we have been talking about, and I am referring particularly here, of course, to the urban poor.

This is a point that is perhaps worth making at this time. There is poverty everywhere. Across the country there are pockets of poverty, and some of the worst are in the rural areas. Some of the hardest problems to solve are the poverty problems of remote rural communities. But, in terms of total numbers of people the poor in the cities of Canada far outnumber the total population of the pockets of rural poverty across the country.

The Chairman: What you are saying is what we have discovered, but it is worth hearing repeated.

Mr. Goble: The problem is: What is the problem of the poor in relation to schooling. This is what we have come here to try to answer; not to give statistics. You can get the statistics from all sides, and from agencies that are more able to provide them than we are. What we are suggesting is the problem of the poor, when they are identifiable as a separate element in society and a different kind of people, is that the educational systems generally are attuned to those who are not poor. The things that a teacher takes for granted about the background of a child, and the understanding that the teacher expects a child to have of what he says, are very often geared to those children whose background is not one of poverty.

The Chairman: Just stop there. That is nothing new. The poor did not come on the scene yesterday, and teachers did not come on the scene yesterday. You admit that we have spent endless amounts of money on education. What took us so long to come to that recognition?

Miss Hodgins: I think it is because the solving of one problem led to another problem. This is in answer to Senator Carter's point in regard to keeping the schools open all year. The moment you solve one problem you are faced with other problems. Students used to drop out of school at the end of grade eight, and nobody knew very much about what they had achieved. Could they read? They could probably read well enough to get by, but that was it. Now they go on to high school. We have people who can judge their reading ability, and we have found that remedial reading is much more necessary than we thought. As soon as we improve our educational system we find we are faced with other problems that we had not anticipated. I think we have made tremendous steps, but we are facing more problems.

The Chairman: Then, tell me why there is 11 per cent illiteracy in this country.

Miss Channon: You have to look at the age distribution.

The Chairman: That is important, but even after the spending of quite considerable sums of money over a period of years we have this amount of illiteracy. Of course, there is more illiteracy in certain age groups, but why 11 per cent. That is a very high percentage for the Western world. When I read that I had to go back to ascertain that I was reading Canadian figures.

Mr. Goble: I think it may help if we remember that we are not talking about a phenomenon that has appeared and has to be explained, but rather the residue of an unsolved problem. The 11 per cent is what remains of what was once a much larger problem. The committee will remember that the concept of universal education above and beyond the most elementary level is in terms of human history quite recent. Until recent years education for all but a select few was regarded as an activity of essential simplicity, and the factors of education and teaching was regarded as an occupation of low skill or no skill. The teacher was a man of low skill and low status. It is only in very recent times . . .

The Chairman: You are talking of long ago. Since when was the teacher considered to be of that status?

Miss Channon: Fifteen years ago in one province a teacher required only grade nine and one or two years more of training.

The Chairman: That happened in Ontario, but at that time we were short of teachers.

Miss Channon: It is only 15 years ago.

The Chairman: But we were facing a crisis, and those teachers were little more than baby sitters. We gave them a short course and brought them in order to get the children off the street. They could teach something, but they were not really teachers. Let us talk about the people who taught us. We all went to Canadian schools, and teachers were never considered in that light in our day. They were badly paid—I will admit that—but they were also the leaders in the community, and people to look up to. They were never in my memory in the classification you mentioned.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, in this money-oriented civilization if they had the status you say they had then why were they not paid more?

The Chairman: Let us not forget, Senator Fergusson, that at that time we were a poor society. We were a poor society almost to the beginning of the war, and there was a different view of most things. Once we recognized ourselves as being something more than a poor society then the teachers began to be well paid. I think my friend, Senator Fournier, thinks that this is due to the union, and I think it is too. It is a wonderful thing that the teachers have been able to bring their salaries up to a certain level, but to think that they were anything less than somebody who counted in the community is beyond me.

Brother Brennan: I think you have to recognize the fact that there are sections of Canada—and I can speak for my own Province of Newfoundland—which until very recent times were so completely isolated that you could not get teachers to go there.

I happen to be the District School Superintendent for a school board centred in Corner Brook extending to the northern peninsula of the island. Up to five or six years ago there was no road, the only access being by boat. Even up to two years ago no certified teacher would go there, because of its isolation.

The Chairman: That is a minority case of 2 or 3 per cent of the total population of Canada. I am referring to the vast majority.

Senator McGrand: Where are the pockets represented by this 10 or 11 per cent?

Mr. Goble: Newfoundland seems to be used as an example more than it deserves, but there are people of 45 years of age and over who are generally poorly educated. About half of that age group are functionally limited. Having once learned to read and write they can sign their names with difficulty. However, they are unable to read books or articles or write other than the shortest and simplest of letters.

This bears out Brother Brennan's statement that it is one place where times and conditions have changed.

Mr. Chairman, you have quoted your own experience and that of the committee. You represent the successes in the system. However, of what percentage of the school population of your day do you believe you are typical? How did the retention rate of the children who went to school in the days when you started grade 1 compare with today? For that matter, has there been no change in the expectation of the industrial society which has developed over the last 20 years in this country? I am speaking of the needs of society in relation to the output of the schools. Has there not been a dramatic increase in the last 15 years in the qualities expected of teachers?

The Chairman: Believe me, during my school years I had great difficulty in finishing in the middle of the class. We were no more successful than others. We represent the normal, rather than the unusual.

Of course education and our approach to it has changed. However, for some reason we have not reached the people who need the results of that change.

Mr. Goble: I agree with you. The problem is that the residual hard core has not been broken. Much that is soluble has been solved, but we are moving closer and closer to the hard core of the intractable problems.

An attempt is made in our brief to illustrate the nature of the people in that hard core.

Senator Fournier: We talk of improvement. Maybe it could be termed rejuvenation. In your opinion what should be refurbished and rejuvenated first, the buildings, the teachers or the system?

Brother Brennan: As far as schools for the poor are concerned, rejuvenation of the actual school plant is important. The teachers are available.

I do not believe that there is anything basically wrong with the system. It is just that it is not working for certain groups within the society it serves.

Re-organization and improvement within the school plant in the areas where the poor live would be of considerable help.

Senator Fournier: Are the school boards receptive to these new methods of teaching?

Father Brennan: It is difficult to speak for them, because they vary. However, by and large they are receptive.

Senator Fournier: This is not a question, but a remark relating to the statement that the federal Government has a fat purse which I condemned in my short lecture.

When you speak that language you are not making any corrections, improving anything nor evading taxation, because whether you put the load on the federal or provincial government it comes out of your pocket, either the left or the right.

To say that the federal Government has plenty of money resulting from taxation does not apply. It all comes from us.

Miss Channon: Our position is that the federal Government is in a position to pay attention to regional disparities, which is not the case with any one region.

The Chairman: You are, of course, aware that the federal Government does make an attempt at equalization, not that I suggest it is perfect.

Senator Carter: We have been told by many witnesses—that if this committee is—to make any contribution at all to the solution of the problem of poverty, our success will depend upon the extent to which we can change public attitudes and commitment on the part of the public to do something about it.

Teachers are obviously in a key position to influence public attitudes with respect to poverty.

What is the Canadian Teachers' Federation doing about this and what do you feel you can and should do?

Miss Hodgins: Could you be a little more specific, senator? In what respect is your question framed? We have gone into this in some depth, discussing poverty, discrimination and other matters.

There are several aspects to the question, including that of the Indians.

Senator Carter: I will enumerate them: there must be a recognition on the part of the public that poverty is a national problem. If it is going to be solved it is not by government or a committee, but by active participation on the part of the public. That means a change in the attitude of the public. There must be a willingness to do something about this, a change from the apathy of saying we have always had poverty and we will always have it.

We questioned the representatives of the churches with respect to this and now we are questioning the teachers.

Mr. Goble: I have a publication of one of the teachers' associations in Montreal which will give an illustration in answer to your question. This is devoted to a very explicit and detailed description of the problem of differences between the wealthier and the poorer schools, the wealthier communities and poorer communities, and the experience of children in both, well illustrated by pictures. This is typical of the kind of effort that most or all of our associations are making towards public education in the use of their own publications to present these major social problems, with I believe a high degree of objectivity.

Senator Carter: Who sees this publication? It goes only to teachers, does it?

Mr. Goble: Yes.

Miss Hodgins: Teachers have to be educated, too.

Mr. Goble: If I may hazard this remark, teachers are human beings; they belong to families and these sorts of publications get into other hands; they are circulated among families; they are read by parents; they travel fairly widely from the original addressee.

Brother Brennan: I think it is correct to say that in the schools today, particularly at the senior elementary and high school level, there is far more in the nature of discussion, dialogue and so on between teachers and students relating to social problems. It is not nearly as textbook oriented as it was in the past, when the material talked about was what was in the textbook and nothing more. Today there is much more involvement—perhaps at times a little too much involvement—with what is going on outside the school, perhaps to the detriment of order in the school. The fact is that high school students particularly are much more social minded and conscious of social problems than they were before, and credit must be given to the teachers for creating that atmosphere in the schools.

Senator Carter: Do you see any more that they can do, except what you have just mentioned?

Miss Channon: There are so many things.

Senator Carter: Can we not get involved in this crusade among the public?

Miss Channon: One thing that has not been mentioned, of which I have seen a number of fascinating examples recently, is the development by teachers of curricula and textbooks adapted to children who are culturally different. Textbooks have been criticized for not reflecting the life style of, say, Indians in their rural community, in their reservation life, and teachers themselves are working in committees to draw up reading texts that can be used in those situations, and they are putting their resources into this very thing.

Senator Carter: I am thinking in terms of developing a commitment. There has to be a commitment, and it will be costly to tackle the problem, to develop a commitment in the public. You have emphasized in your brief several times the inequality between children from poor families and affluent families, how the poor child goes to school hungry in the first place, has a poor lunch, probably just bread and butter, so he is physically handicapped and not able to pay proper attention; he is poorly dressed, and probably has other deficiencies from home; he feels a little different from others; he is psychologically handicapped; he feels humiliated because he thinks people take notice of his poor dress and so on. The other difference you have mentioned is that poor parents are not involved; there is not sufficient liaison between the parents of poor children and the teacher; there is not the same involvement at the decision-making level. What is your answer to these problems?

Miss Channon: We have suggested that the priority need for the poor is more money so that they can overcome the basic deficiencies in nourishment, housing and clothing, to some degree at least.

The Chairman: I understood the first priority was to provide them with maintenance income, and then move on from there. That is what I understood from the brief.

Senator Carter: I am talking about something else. I noticed that. The basic handicap of the child is when he goes to school, and it has to be corrected before he goes to school. Simply giving more money will not do that. There have to be services and facilities to even up the handicap before the child gets to school, so that he is on an even footing. How do you think that can be done?

Miss Hodgins: One of the recommendations is pre-school education for the child from the poor community. We feel very strongly that a basic income is a basic need, that part of the trouble with the poor parent and the poor student is psychological; they are pushed around a lot more than people who know their rights and have some money to back them up. When schools are criticized for sending downtown children to technical schools, it is really partly that the parents think their children should go to that sort of school; it is not entirely a matter of locational direction. There are many problems with people on welfare that come out strongly in the school system, where they are naturally on the defensive. They think their children are being discriminated against, whether they are or whether they are not. One has to consider the whole psychology, as you are very well aware from what you have heard, of welfare people and poor people who are disadvantaged.

Senator Carter: What would you say is the greatest single need that should be met in dealing with education and poverty?

Miss Hodgins: My answer is the same: some money for the parents to give them a decent independent standard of living.

Senator Fournier: How do you know the parents would spend it properly?

Miss Hodgins: I do not know whether I spend my money properly.

Brother Brennan: How do you know the rich people spend their money properly?

Senator Quart: That is right.

Senator McGrand: It is hard to organize home and school organizations, and even in the better off communities not much attention is paid to them. Do you get any response to home and school organizations from poor areas and poor parents in poor areas?

Miss Hodgins: Yes, but again it is a greater problem there to get the parent associations organized and working on a basis acceptable to them as well as to the school.

Brother Brennan: Related to it, of course, is the fact that generally speaking in that type of school there is a greater turnover of teachers . . .

Miss Hodgins: And parents.

Brother Brennan: And a greater turnover of parents, yes, which makes it more difficult to establish the liaison that you want. There is more mobility in that type of area.

Miss Channon: It is recognized that the home and school associations do not necessarily work, and there are other much more imaginative ways of involving parents in the school. These are being used, and hopefully will expand.

The Chairman: I thought I would call to the attention of the committee something that I found significant. In the course of our discussion we have talked about welfare being a right, that we had to meet the need. We have been having some difficulty to get that across to some of the provinces. Mr. Yaremko, the Minister of Social and Family Services, speaking in Brockville last night, made it very clear that welfare is a legal right, and that people on welfare have that right.

Senator Carter: That is wonderful.

The Chairman: To that extent we have made some progress, have we not, in Canada?

Senator Quart: I have spent my entire weekend, not reading your brief, but at graduations, Friday and Saturday and Monday where education was discussed in all its aspects afterwards at different parties. You mentioned, Miss Channon, that the poor people drop out because of their clothing, and so on. In my time, the private and public school children wore uniforms. I know there is probably a great controversy about this, but there does seem to be an advantage for the poorer child if he could be supplied with a uniform by the welfare organization without having the uniform brought to the class and the teacher saying, "This is yours, Mary Jane." or "This is yours, Joseph."

As an official Commissioner of Girl Guides for years, I am sure of what I am saying that there is a difference between Guide companies in the poorer sections where many times the uniforms were supplied by the main association. It would have been a shame if these Girl Guides and Boy Scouts had attended meetings in their ordinary clothing. Frequently friendships were formed when they wore the same uniform. They were not self-conscious about what they were wearing. Would it be possible to do this today in schools?

Miss Hodgins: This is something which has been discussed many times. I feel, as you do, that it would solve many problems. I personally think that the uniforms they are using in some private schools are quite attractive. The idea was not accepted by the parents when it was proposed in the secondary schools. It would save parents all kinds of money but the proposal is always turned down. I don't know why this is so. Possibly they are self-conscious and do not want their children in uniforms.

Senator Fergusson: It is done in many countries besides Canada. In January I visited one of the Caribbean countries and every schoolchild had the same uniform. They wore different colours for different schools. You could not tell one child from the other, whether poor or not.

Brother Brennan: Strangely enough in some countries it is the students themselves who object to the uniforms being taken away.

Senator Quart: Then the parents go along with the idea.

The Chairman: Miss Hodgins has answered the question, that it is unacceptable.

Senator Quart: I always ask a revolutionary question.

The Chairman: If there are no further questions, I would like to say on behalf of the committee, sir, and to all of you, that we consider your brief to be one of the outstanding briefs. It is thorough, logical and constructive. It was well presented here this morning. It will be most helpful to us.

I am still of the view that you see poverty at first hand and meet it daily face to face. The problem is not going to disappear very quickly. We still have a great deal more work to do, and I am sure all members of the committee feel that the teachers can concern themselves more publicly with the problem of poverty and bring to bear the need for the community to concern itself with poverty. We hope that we will get the backing of the community, not only in realizing that there is poverty but that poverty is next door—the neighbour, the friend, the relative. We must all join in and help, otherwise we are not going to get very far.

On behalf of the committee I assure you that you have made a worthwhile contribution. I presume that is the purpose of your going to great lengths to assemble such an able group and have them so well prepared.

Brother Brennan: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. On behalf of our group, I wish to thank you and the other members of your committee.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we have before us now the submission of the Canadian Council for Research and Education. The council is represented by Mr. Fred E. Withworth, Director.

Mr. Fred E. Whitworth, Director, Canadian Council for Research and Education: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, we appreciate very much the opportunity which has been given to us to appear before you this morning. We feel that one of the most important things in connection with the work of the committee is education. We also have the feeling that education can be improved and if it is to be improved certainly we need research in education.

I would like to add that when we speak of education we are talking about education as a continuous thing from cradle to grave. This is extremely important, because what happens to the child before he goes to school, according to the Coleman studies and other studies in the United States is equally important. At this particular time I will not follow the brief but merely talk about some of the things that are related to the brief and which you can look at afterwards. It would appear that there was a great deal of interest in North America, but particularly in the United States, in the 1960s, and a number of people had the idea that they were going to solve this problem of the disadvantaged child. At the present time there is a good deal of disillusionment. They have decided that things did not work out the way they had planned. I think they realize now, the same as most of us do, that this is a tremendously broad and complex subject, that really what we are setting out to do, in a good many cases, when the child comes to school, is to reverse the negative impact, and there may be a number of things. For example, we might be particularly concerned with economic deprivation. In other words, the child is a problem because the economic situation was such that he did not have a chance to develop correctly. It may be social insulation. These two may be separate or they may be tied in together; and this may be psychological.

I heard this morning, when the other brief was being presented, to the effect that a person must feel important, that he must feel wanted, that he must feel that he belongs and if he does not the chances are that there will be alienation, that he will object to what is going on and he will defend himself in whatever way he thinks is possible.

Also, you are up against the question of ethnic discrimination. I mention these, I suppose, to tell you what you already know probably better than I do, that is, that a deprived child may be deprived because of a variety of effects. It is not a nice simple question that requires a pat answer. We are dealing with a heterogeneous population, that have different backgrounds, that have different opportunities, that operate in different social milieux, whose patterns of thought are different and so are their value systems. This was mentioned previously.

What I want to talk about is research that has been done and research that should be done. I have to admit at the present time none of us know the answers to these, but we think we have come some way. Much of the research which has been done relates to the study of population characteristics. In other words, if you are concerned with the Indians who belong in this category, then you would find out as much as you could about their characteristics. The same would be equally true of the people living in a city centre or in the poorer suburbs or in any place where you find groups of these.

The research work has been concerned, in a good many cases, with performances. Here we have to admit that the tests and the devices that we have for testing these, leave a lot to be desired. It is true that we can use intelligence and performance tests and a number of aptitude tests and things like this, but we still have the feeling that there are a lot of areas that we have not tested at all.

Another possibility, of course, is to be concerned with life conditions and to relate life conditions to what you find so far as it concerns the children's entrance at school.

One of the things that bothers me here is that so much of the research ends up by generalizing, saying that on the average we find this. We are not just concerned with the average, but we are concerned with the individual. In research we need a good deal more case studies and a good deal more emphasis on this sort of thing. This obviously gets us into this whole question of heredity against environment, which has been threshed out year after year. We talked about it when I first went to university and we are still talking about it. Unfortunately too many people take a very firm stand for the one or the other, whereas it would appear that the interactionist position is the only one that is tenable. If you want me to amplify this later, I might do it. I am referring to farmers growing wheat in the west, or to cattle breeders.

On this whole question of heredity environment, a lot of people at the present time say that heredity is of little importance, that environment determines largely your success, in fact, to the point where we can almost forget about heredity. I do not think we are going to solve any problem that way, for the simple reason that you cannot solve it in any other area and we have to look at both. We are concerned with the sort of heredity a person has and then what we can do with it.

To suggest, for example, that an Eskimo has the same heredity as the negro just does not seem to make too much sense. This is not a question of superiority, it is merely a question of difference. We could go into it but it would take hours and hours to discuss it beyond that.

Our concern, however, is essentially with what the environment can do, once we have paid attention to the other. I think it is because of this, that we are trying to do certain things in various schools, in various clinics and elsewhere.

Again we have to keep in mind that we probably have not paid enough attention to the very young, that plasticity of intellectual behaviour seems to slow down about age 3. In other words, you can do a whale of a lot for youngsters from about a few weeks on until they are around three years of age, and from that time on nobody is quite sure just how much can be done. Certainly, by the time they enter school, physically they are well on their way to adulthood, believe it or not, and mentally a good many of their minds set, a good deal of their development as far as curiosity and a hundred and one other things, has already been developed. In other words, Bloom who has worked intensively on this in the United States, says that we are likely to have about half of the mental growth by the age of three or a little later and physically the same is more or less true. This emphasizes the importance of the pre-school years.

I would like to digress here just for a moment to talk about the Eskimos. Did any honourable senators see the film which was made of the Eskimos and their life before they were given houses, when they were living in the igloo? If you have had the opportunity of seeing that film, I think you will agree with me that it was excellent. Considering what the Eskimo people had, they were doing a wonderful job with their children. They took a great deal of interest in them; the children were happy; the parents spent time talking to their children and playing with them; they gave their children as much as they had to give and they made them feel wanted. Outside the children were playing and, I would say, developing as much as could be expected in their environment.

I had to compare that in my own mind with some of the ascetic situations in which you might find a person making $25,000 a year; he brings in a nurse or he has read some psychology books—and my background is psychology—and he follows the suggestion that what he should do is leave the child in the crib and not bother him but just let him grow like a vegetable. In some cases the children will stare at a stark white ceiling for a long time, and everything will be nice and white and all the rest of it.

If I had the choice I would give my youngsters to the Eskimos and let them bring them up in preference to that sort of thing.

What I am really saying is that there is some evidence at the present time that what happens to a child starting from the age of two weeks and less is extremely important and may have some effect on what happens to the child when he goes to school. Family life is extremely important, and, frankly, we are not going to get anywhere if we depend on the school to do it or go it alone.

Early childhood life is so extremely important that continuous education to provide a good background for people in the family is exceptionally important. Certainly, the evidence we have had from research so indicates. If there is not a good pattern of child rearing, there will not be the results we should like to see.

Probably you are all familiar with the book Mother and Child. There should be a supplement to that suggesting some of the things we have learned from the studies that have been made so far. The mother, or father, or both, should provide a stimulating environment. Environment can be made stimulating by the use of toys and so on; and that should be started with the children when they are very young.

One of the advantages the middle-class child has is in the modern media, and perhaps the best thing we could do would be to provide all families with a television, in spite of the fact that some of the programs are terrible.

The Chairman: Welfare has become civilized to the point where television is accepted as radio was in another day: no home is complete without it.

Mr. Whitworth: In respect of schooling, we have found from the Newstart Program that you are no going to solve all the problems by any means by having a six-week preschool crash course; or by increasing the number of personnel involved with the teachers alone; or by having a modest shift in curriculum emphasis; you may want to have all of these things but no one of them is going to be any means adequate.

I am very much intrigued at the present time by at least two people in Newfoundland who are attempting to use drama for the disadvantaged. They are using drama to try to get people out of their shells, as it were. I do not know how well it is going to work.

I think the recommendations in the brief speak for themselves.

The Chairman: We will begin the questions now.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Whitworth, what is the Canadian Council for Research in Education? How many employees do you have? Where are the headquarters located? And who pays you?

Mr. Whitworth: We have our headquarters in Ottawa, at 265 Elgin Street. We employ seven people. Most of our money comes from the provincial departments of education. In addition to that we receive money from such organizations as the Canadian Teachers' Federation and the Canadian Education Association, the AUCC and, in fact, most of the national educational associations as well as a number of the provincial associations. The bulk of our operating money comes from the provinces.

Senator Fournier: Do you pass your research on to the various departments of education?

Mr. Whitworth: Our function is not to undertake research at the present time, because we do not have the staff or the money for doing so. We do put out publications. For example, we put out the Canadian Index of Education. We are now undertaking a survey of research and development in Canada which will be published this fall. We work with such organizations as OISC and the Alberta Human Resources Research Council.

Senator Fournier: You are not solely related to the departments of education, then.

Mr. Whitworth: No. Actually, we are as interested in the newer media at the present time as in anything else.

Senator Fournier: What is the history behind your organization? How did it start?

Mr. Whitworth: The Canadian Teachers' Federation and the Canadian Education Association must take credit for the beginning of it; they met informally to compare notes and to compare what they were doing, and they invited others to join them; it then was decided that there should be an association to promote educational research.

Senator Fournier: Were you a school teacher formerly?

Mr. Whitworth: I have taught in everything from one-room schools to universities.

Senator Fournier: That is good enough for me. Thank you, sir.

The Chairman: Senator, if you look at Mr. Whitworth's curriculum vitae, you will see that it is a very distinguished person.

Senator Inman: Mr. Whitworth, in your brief you speak of middle-class values of teachers and the general middle-class values or orientation of the schools. What do you mean by middle-class values and how do you relate that to the situation of the disadvantaged?

Mr. Whitworth: Senator, the things that you consider worthwhile; the way you look at eating, sleeping, drinking; the associations you make; all of these things form part of your way of life. The suggestion is that, according to these patterns, people do fit into groups—whether those groups be middle-class or lower-class. They form groups because of what goes to make up their pattern of thinking and their way of reacting and so on. These are the things that determine the values. It is true, however, that values can change from one generation to the next, as we well know at the present time.

Senator Inman: Mr. Whitworth, referring to your paragraphs 10 and 11, why should children from disadvantaged families feel inferior at school? Are they treated any differently? Are they made to feel different?

Mr. Whitworth: If I were to answer that question simply yes or no, I would be doing what I say I do not want to do; I would be generalizing. In a fair number of cases the answer is yes; but it is not necessarily so.

For example, as we all know, many successful people have been successful only because they grew up in poor families; they got the necessary drive there. We are all fully aware of that, but again we are generalizing and we are saying that just on the average this happens.

Senator Inman: I have another question I would like to ask. Do you think the teacher could have a lot of bearing on the ambition of a child from a poor family if she gave him particular encouragement and imbued him with a sense of ambition?

Mr. Whitworth: I think the only answer I can make to that is that we all know teachers who have done that. And most of us when we did teach had the feeling that we did help some youngsters and gave them ambition, but the thing that has always bothered me is this; if I had 30 youngsters in a class, I was a little bit worried because while I thought I was helping 20, I was not too sure what I was doing for the other 10. This is the reason why some of us favour team teaching so that they would come in contact with a number of people.

Senator Inman: Do you think that the teacher training period should be extended? Do you think that generally speaking the period of teacher training should be made longer?

Mr. Whitworth: I think briefly we have to suggest that in western Canada the teacher training is all in the university and extends over a period of about four to five years, but in a good many other places it is less than one year. It is in fact one academic year. Now if you are asking me whether we can take a young person who has nothing but grade 12 or grade 13, and take them for one year and then turn out a professional teacher, I would say this is just impossible. And if you ask them what they do, they say "we do the best we can in the time we have," and therefore I think there is need for in-service training afterwards and a great deal of it.

Senator Fournier: Nobody comes out as a professional teacher after one year.

Mr. Whitworth: No, we do not say that.

Senator Inman: In paragraph 4 you say that it is not entirely clear what you are trying to say with regard to the distribution of wealth in society in the poverty problem. What is your position on this?

Mr. Whitworth: I am sorry, I do not see the point you are referring to.

Senator Inman: It is on the first page, and I guess it is paragraph 3. It is the fourth down on the page.

Mr. Whitworth: Well, we are dealing—I still have not found the sentence to which you are referring.

The Chairman: Starting with the words "that there be a grant structure provided . . ."

Senator Inman: That is it.

Mr. Whitworth: That is dealing with the grants structure. The recommendation here is that there should be a grant structure provided, and that these would be available for people conducting a variety of mission-oriented research projects, and since if you made money available almost everybody would want it, I would suggest that there should be some consideration as to the likelihood of this research project making a contribution. In other words, if a person really comes up with an idea that they can make a better test, or something like this, this is good; but if they come along and have an idea that will not pass muster so far as the people who know something of the subject are concerned, then I am suggesting that this would be a waste of money. Actually this has happened too often in the United States, and I was basing this on that fact.

Senator Inman: Then referring to the same page, you speak of different programs. How much research have you been doing on these programs you are suggesting here, (a) and particularly (b).

Mr. Whitworth: You mean how much research has been done so far?

Senator Inman: Yes.

Mr. Whitworth: Very little either in Canada or in the United States. This is rather unfortunate because they have spent millions of dollars in this area down there, and yet when you ask me to name a specific case where they actually came up with something that we could recommend, based on research, I find there is still a lot of room for them to change. Part of the trouble would seem to be that we have got into a rut, and it is very difficult to get out of it, and if you do get out of it, there is no point in getting out of it unless you get into something else that is better. I think we really need a number of pilot projects to find out whether or not some of the suggestions that have been made are worth following through.

Senator Inman: Do you intend to continue following on?

Mr. Whitworth: Well, we would be very happy to do so if we can find money for people in research. We would do our best not only to persuade them to do it, but to help them to design a particular experiment.

Senator Carter: I would like to clarify some of the answers you gave to Senator Fournier. How long have you been in existence as a body?

Mr. Whitworth: As a formal body since about 1962.

Senator Carter: And do you do active research? Do you carry on active research or do you sponsor projects for somebody else?

Mr. Whitworth: We do not carry on active research unless you count surveys and participation in somebody else's research.

Senator Carter: Do you sponsor projects for other bodies then?

Mr. Whitworth: We do not have any money for research.

Senator Carter: You do not have any money for research at all?

Mr. Whitworth: Well, this is a true statement. The only thing we can do at times is find sources for other people.

Senator Carter: Can you tell us then what bodies are carrying on educational research in Canada?

Mr. Whitworth: First of all I would mention the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, which is by far the largest, and then there is the Alberta Human Resources Research Council. There are all of the faculties of education, but the amount of research they are doing is rather small. If you are interested in the amounts being spent on research in Canada . . .

Senator Carter: I would like to know what is being spent in Canada on educational research as far as you can give it.

Mr. Whitworth: I think the best indication I can give is that we are spending .2 per cent of the educational budget, and almost half of that is being spent in Ontario.

The Chairman: That is .2 per cent of $6 billion which is the educational budget. And half of that is being spent in Ontario.

Senator Carter: Who determines the priorities of the projects? Do you have a say in that?

Mr. Whitworth: Well, occasionally. It depends. You see, there is wide variety of sources for the money. A fair amount of this money, or at least a certain amount goes towards degrees, and therefore a person has to get a project of the right size and have this accepted. In the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, for example, the head of each department there determines what they are going to do, and so long as it is passed by the Council, the money is provided. The federal Department of Manpower also provides some money, and they say that they will provide money for research within a limited area. The same is true of a number of other bodies.

Senator Carter: So you have a number of bodies each going its own way?

Mr. Whitworth: Unfortunately there is truth in that.

Senator Carter: That is not the most efficient way of doing research. If you yourself were to draw up a list of priorities for research, what would be on your list?

Mr. Whitworth: Actually, this is going to take quite a long time.

Senator Carter: Give us the first five.

Mr. Whitworth: I will give you a few. Certainly, poverty is one; the use of modern media is another; work in teacher training is another; to provide a lot of money for private studies in order to find better methods of educating youngsters, whether it is through curricula or a lot of other things. I could go on, but really we have the feeling that the first thing we need is to get far more co-operation among the bodies doing research so that we can provide enough money for what we call mission-oriented research.

What I am really saying is that there is certain basic research, and this basic research should be carried on in the universities. However, in addition to that, there is all the mission-oriented research which can be a combined affair, and these should be major projects, that no one can do individually. We actually do hope to put out a statement that was drawn up at a Stanley House Conference a year ago, as soon as we can get 100 per cent agreement, but I think we are pretty well at the stage where it will be issued this spring, which will suggest a policy for research development in education.

Senator Carter: I take it you are not a co-ordinating body. Are you a clearing house for the distribution or dissemination of research?

Mr. Whitworth: We do some of both. We are not set up yet and we do not have, as far as educational research is concerned, a communications system which is adequate. If we did, then we or somebody else could act as a centre for that.

Senator Carter: Can you tell the committee what has been accomplished, what kind of results have come about from Canadian research in education?

Mr. Whitworth: This is always a good question. It is always a difficult question, because, in the first place, it is almost impossible to separate the research in the United States and other countries from research in Canada. But, certainly, there has been a great deal more emphasis on individual development. The methods have changed a good deal. There has been greater use of modern media, but not nearly as much as there should be. There is greater emphasis on concern for special cases or atypical children, or whatever you want to call them. Research has contributed, but the way research very often works is that there is a problem. The research people are asked for opinions and conduct research and bring back suggestions. Then the decision is one that is made in the light of the situation. I did not say political, although it may be political, but what I am suggesting is that it is a practical situation taking into consideration all the factors, such as cost and so on.

Senator Carter: You mentioned that if you were to draw up a list you would have poverty on that list as one of the first things. What approaches or what type of projects would you carry out with respect to poverty?

Mr. Whitworth: In the first place, I would have to suggest that poverty is related to individual differences. In reality, you would be concentrating on providing for people with individual differences. One of these large groups would be the people affected by poverty, but many of the people affected by poverty are no different from people in deprived homes of the wealthy.

Senator Carter: But in reply to Senator Inman you mentioned values.

Mr. Whitworth: Yes.

Senator Carter: I did not quite follow your answer but I take it what you were saying was that our whole educational system—our organization of grades, curricula, texts, visual aids, everything—is based on certain values, and those are the values of the affluent society. They are geared to those values, rather than the values you find in the low-income groups.

Mr. Whitworth: To a large extent this is true. I think there is some attempt made now to provide for some special categories is such as Indians and Eskimos. There is very little for people of different ethnic origins, but in reality we have the French and English and there is much in common between those and they are as you described.

Senator Carter: I have many questions, but I do not know if I have time.

The Chairman: We will pass on and see what time we have left. Senator McGrand?

Senator McGrand: Really, we have not much time. This field is so big and I am so interested in it, that I am afraid I would rather go down and have a talk with you some day.

Mr. Whitworth: That would be a pleasure.

Senator McGrand: But I am going to ask you this: What is the purpose of your research? What do you expect to find in educational research? Education, after all, is the training of people to live in a society composed of other human beings and the sentient life around, and to live with as little disturbance and as much co-operation as possible. You mention the Eskimos. You have said you would almost prefer to leave a child with an Eskimo than have it subjected to some of the sophisticated training the upper class gives its children.

Mr. Whitworth: No, I said I would rather leave them with a good Eskimo family than with a poor upper class one.

Senator McGrand: I am thinking of the poor upper class one. Going back to this question of what happens in the poor areas. It is pretty well accepted that people fight for territory. They want space, elbow room, and supply of food, and so on. That is probably the basis of all this competition that goes on between people. In our well-to-do communities it is rather sophisticated. If a child brings home the toy of a neighbour's child you say, "You had better take it back. That is not polite," but in the poor district you very often find the idea of "Finders are keepers." There is more primitiveness in the poor community than in the sophisticated community. This is such a big field.

Mr. Whitworth: This is an exceptionally big field, but may I go back to your first question? You asked what we hope to accomplish by educational research, or why we bother with it. I would like to divide it into two areas. First, there is the theoretical research in which we want to add to our store of knowledge so that we will know, for example, when we should start teaching certain children certain things, how their memory works, what is the best way to give them things they will remember, what is the best way to stimulate them to thinking. This is all theoretical, but this can be related to the practical, and the practical seems to me to relate to many of these things you were talking about. In other words, we do not know whether there is any reason why we should provide 12 or 13 years—both cannot be right—of schooling, whereas the U.S.S.R. provides 10 for elementary and secondary.

Somebody must be wiser than somebody else. We do not know what children are learning outside of school today. We used to think we did. We do not know how much they pick up from television, and so on, so we do not know what we should take for granted and with what sort of research. My daughter happens to be teaching a disadvantaged and emotional class, and I assure you that research should be able to tell her what she should do. I compare her with another relative of mine who is teaching an accelerated class.

Senator McGrand: The field is so big.

Mr. Whitworth: Yes.

Senator McGrand: You said that every house should have a television set, but I suggest that there should be suitable programs for the family on television. Families should not have television sets to enable them to look at crime and violence.

Senator Quart: Dr. Whitworth, first of all, what membership have you in the Canadian Council for Research in Education. I did hear Professor Joly speak about it at one time.

Mr. Whitworth: Professor Joly is our president.

Senator Quart: Yes.

Mr. Whitworth: Our membership is limited at the present time to association. We have another daughter association, the Canadian Educational Researchers Association.

Senator Quart: You revenue is from the grants you received?

Mr. Whitworth: Yes, that is right, or from the member bodies.

Senator Quart: Before I ask my question I should like to say that I thoroughly agree with you when you say that you would prefer your child to be with the Eskimos rather than with an incompetent teacher. With 23 grandchildren I feel that love and security are most important to a child in its formative years.

In paragraph XXVII you say:

The situation has changed drastically. In Quebec, for example, after the recent reorganization of the Department the first report of the Minister read: "The objective of the Quebec policy with regard to education is to assure to each one a maximum education of which he is capable and which corresponds both to his aptitude and ambitions, regardless of his state of fortune or the place of residence of his family."

And then you say that there are three demands that the schools must be concerned with, and one to them is the awakening of the child to cultural values. Are you referring there to the cultural values of the ethnic group, French or English, or what?

Mr. Whitworth: Yes, not to any special ones but the ones that are accepted by the community.

Senator Quart: Yes, and particularly the French and English ones, I suppose.

Mr. Whitworth: Yes.

Senator Quart: The second demand you mention is that of helping the child to adjust normally to his environment. Are you referring there to the English child in a French community, and vice versa, although in Quebec it would be principally the English child in the French community? Does this mean that you have to help him adjust himself to the community?

Mr. Whitworth: Yes, but of course, we have become acutely conscious of our physical environment at the present time, and I imagine they have included this in their thinking as well.

Senator Quart: I read the headlines only very quickly, but it seems that the education bill in Quebec will be delayed for a while for further study. However, a tremendous number of French Canadian families are opting for English training.

Senator Carter: We were talking this morning with the Canadian Teachers' Federation about schools and equipment. Is it your personal opinion that we are getting around to placing too much emphasis on equipment and facilities, and not enough on the teachers?

Mr. Whitworth: We are doing two things as far as equipment and facilities are concerned. We are making rather a lot of changes that will provide a whole new environment, and I think that if we can handle this then it is exceptionally good. If you are asking me a question as to whether we are spending too much money on providing establishments that are too posh, and things like this, then I am not sure that I want to answer it in any other way than to say that certainly we want to provide a decent environment in which the youngsters may grow up. Apart from that I think we should have to justify the sort of buildings we are erecting. We could save a great deal of money by having more of the same rather than allowing every city to have one of a kind. There are many places where there can be savings. I do not know whether this answers your question entirely or not, but to get back to the question of teaching I will say that we have become very much interested in the learning media, not as a substitute for the teacher but in the hope that the teacher will use it as a tool. If the teacher will use it as a tool for doing much of his record keeping and things like that, then he will be able to spend more time with the student as an individual.

Senator Carter: You said that you keep in touch with research going on in the United States.

Mr. Whitworth: Yes.

Senator Carter: Last night in one of the Ottawa papers—I believe it was the Journal—I read an article which described something new so far as I am concerned. It is headed "Performance Contract guarantees Education". This article tells the story of a ninth grader who started school last year with skills in reading and arithmetic expected of a third grader. During that year this organization brought her practically up to standard, and the family pays for results. If the pupil went from grade three to grade four the family pays a certain amount, and if the pupil went from grade three to grade six then the family would pay a certain amount more. Are you familiar with this?

Mr. Whitworth: I am familiar with the sort of thing you are talking about because there are three or four firms in the United States that are doing what you have mentioned. I did not read that article. I am still open to question. I am a bit skeptical so far, but if you are asking me whether we can increase the productivity of our schools then I will say that this is one of the functions of research in education.

Senator Carter: Yes, this comes back to the matter of research, and I wanted to lay a foundation. We have not the time to pursue it now, but is not this an area with which research should be concerned? We are spending now twice as much as we did ten years ago.

Mr. Whitworth: We are holding a conference with the Alberta Human Resources Research Council in Banff in late October, I expect, and one of the things that are going to be discussed is cost benefits. We do not interpret this quite as narrowly as some economist do, but we are concerned about what it costs us and what we are getting. When we consider the benefits we hope we will take into consideration all of the good by-products as well as have a concern for some of the bad side effects.

Senator Fournier: Did you say during your remarks that there is an organization known as the Canadian Foundation for Researchers in Education?

Mr. Whitworth: There is the Canadian Educational Research Association, which is really a data organization of our association.

Senator Fournier: I am still confused about this organization. Why do you have so many? Why do you people not work together, save money and get somewhere instead of working all apart in your own little private rooms secretly?

Mr. Whitworth: There is only one answer to that. I agree with you that this would be a sensible idea. I hope it will come about, but it was not possible at the time. The reason is expediency. You do what you can with a situation.

Senator Fournier: Will it ever be possible?

Mr. Whitworth: I am optimistic enough to think that it will be. The situation has changed to the point where it will be possible. We do actually hold a big conference with them every year and meet frequently. It is more a matter of formality now, but I assure you that at one time it was one of personalities.

Senator Fournier: We were discussing money spent for equipment and buildings. I am a former vocational teacher and there is a difference between academic and vocational teachers.

If you buy a $100,000 computer or $100,000 worth of typewriters, naturally you want the best. However, when training a motor mechanic, plumber or electrician we should dispense with buildings of marble and elaborate furnishing. A mechanic should be trained in the environment of a garage. There is nothing worse than training a young man in a marble building under beautiful conditions in a trade which calls upon him to work in a shed. The contrast is too great.

We have over expanded in the vocational schools, building fancy schools in rural areas where possibly children live in log cabins. They go from those conditions to a school with fine draperies, hardwood floors and tiles and do not feel like returning home at night.

Senator Quart: Has your Canadian council for research in education done anything in research of perceptual impediment, which is seemingly the great question of the day?

There are so many of these children in different classes suffering from this and the teachers do not recognize it very quickly. I know that some doctors in Montreal are very worried about this.

Mr. Whitworth: The Council for Exceptional Children is the only organization in Canada that has made a contribution along those lines. They have spent money and time, but have by no means solved problems.

Senator Quart: Is there not a camp somewhere in Ontario which provides summer sessions for these children who are very bright but may have a mental block in a subject such as mathematics and do not know why?

I think there are more of them than people realize. The child is called stupid, but it is caused by this mental block.

Mr. Whitworth: The work in Montreal is probably the best that has been done in Canada. There is good work done elsewhere, but more in Montreal.

Some children possess an I.Q. of 130 but have a block in mathematics, for instance.

The Chairman: Who carries this out in Montreal?

Mr. Whitworth: I cannot remember the name.

The Chairman: Is it a private institution?

Mr. Whitworth: No, it is in connection with the University of Montreal and McGill University.

The Chairman: It is not the government?

Mr. Whitworth: No, it is the university.

The Chairman: It is at the research level in the universities.

Mr. Whitworth: Yes.

The Chairman: When you ascertain the name of the organization will you please call Mr. Askwith?

Senator Quart: I understand Stanstead was recommended. It is not subsidized very much and it means $3,000 a year for a student with this particular impediment. They do have other students.

The Chairman: Mr. Whitworth, on behalf of the committee I wish to thank you for presenting a very thoughtful brief in research as to theory and practice. You have admitted the limitations that you suffer due to lack of facilities and broad understanding throughout the educational community.

Speaking for the committee I can tell you that we consider research to be most important in order to provide guides from time to time, or at least experiences that would point to the way.

True, we have not done as much as we thought we might from an educational point of view over the last ten years. I do not know why and I do not think you know. However, at least you are trying and we hope that some of the information that you have passed on to us today, together with that of the other educational groups, will be helpful in arriving at a conclusion as to how we can reach these young people in a better way than we do at present.

Will you tell us very briefly how you would go about solving the problems we are facing?

Mr. Whitworth: In the first place I am not an economist.

The Chairman: Disregard the economics.

Mr. Whitworth: There is need for a national director in this whole field of education related to poverty. He has to be an exceptionally good administrator and should be advised by a professional body of educators, psychologists and sociologists in addition to those who are interested in this. Funds will have to be provided to conduct research.

One of the arguments for research is that it is very much cheaper to conduct research to find out whether something works than to introduce it on a large scale,

The Chairman: But the United States government has a man named Allen who is a top educationalist and is doing exactly what you suggest we do here.

They have a greater percentage of poverty than we have.

Senator Carter: You said that we are spending .02 per cent in Canada.

Mr. Whitworth: I said .02 per cent of the amount spent on education is devoted to research.

Senator Carter: Could you quote comparable percentages for other countries such as the United States, Britain and Sweden?

Mr. Whitworth: The comparable percentage for the United States varies from .3 to .5. The highest is one-half of one per cent. We have been using .5 per cent for the United States. I can give you a few others, but not offhand. Sweden is the highest I know, and they are planning on moving theirs up. I will send you any figures that I have.

The Chairman: Is that satisfactory?

Senator Carter: Yes, thank you.

The Chairman: I said the United States are trying exactly what you had in mind, without any success.

Mr. Whitworth: With some degree of success, and I think this is the most we could expect.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

The committee adjourned.

CANADIAN TEACHERS' FEDERATION

Brief on

POVERTY AND PUBLIC EDUCATION IN CANADA

Presented to the

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

June 2, 1970

320 Queen Street
Ottawa 4, Ontario

HIGHLIGHTS OF THE BRIEF

This brief seeks to establish some workable definition of "the poor" in Canadian society and to indicate the subgroups within this general category with which public education is most concerned. Attempts are made to outline the potential of education for promoting the economic well-being of Canadians. It is concluded that education may, under certain circumstances, be a potent force in the eradication of poverty and should therefore receive even higher priority.

The brief then discusses the meaning of equality of educational opportunity and questions whether the children of the poor enjoy facilities and programs which are even as good as those enjoyed by the more affluent. It is concluded that the poor often get the poorer schools, programs and teachers, rather than the special and superior programs which they appear to require. These inequities tend to be compounded by regional inequalities in ability to finance education.

Throughout the brief particular emphasis is placed on the severe educational problems of the Indians, Eskimos, Metis and Negroes of Canada. While they often suffer the general problems associated with poverty, they have additional problems resulting from cultural differences. In general, it is suggested that the urban poor constitute the largest problem for the schools, but the native peoples, urban or rural, and the Negroes, the most intractable problem.

The Federation makes seventeen recommendations concerned with the alleviation of poverty in Canada, with particular emphasis on changes required in education. A guaranteed minimum income is recommended as an immediate necessity while longer-term remedies are being sought. It is pointed out that only the federal government is in a position to reduce regional inequalities in education by providing financial support to those areas where tax-paying ability is low. It is further recommended that resources for education be so distributed as to bring to disadvantaged children the special educational programs and facilities they need. In particular, renovation and/or replacement of substandard schools is recommended, along with the institution of kindergartens and preschool programs.

The brief also stresses the necessity of involving parents from low-income sectors of society both in the formal educational decision-making processes and in the local school itself. Also stressed is the necessity of promoting respect for the poor, particularly the native Canadians, through removing derogatory references in textbooks and substituting accurate information. Finally, some recommendations are made regarding the special training requirements of teachers of the poor.

PREAMBLE

1. This brief is presented by the Canadian Teachers' Federation on behalf of its 13 member organizations, which represent some 200,000 teachers in the ten provinces and the territories.

2. The teachers of Canada have not suddenly discovered poverty, have not suddenly noticed that there are inequalities and discrimination in Canadian society and elsewhere. Virtually since its founding in 1920 the Canadian Teachers' Federation has devoted a large proportion of its resources to studying and attempting to reduce educational inequalities. In Canada, the Federation has repeatedly focussed attention on the glaring regional disparities that exist in educational opportunity and brought these to the notice of the federal government. Abroad, the Federation has provided a program called Project Overseas, through which Canadian teachers offer summer in-service training courses for teachers in a number of African, Asian and Caribbean countries.

3. Since the relationship of poverty and public education is no new subject for teachers, about one-quarter of the Federation's recorded statements of policy are fairly directly related to aspects of poverty. These policy resolutions, broadly grouped, deal with (a) the basic rights of the individual student and teacher, (b) needed changes in the organization and financing of education if greater equality of opportunity is to be realized, (c) the distribution of income and (d) special programs of education needed to assist groups suffering particularly serious problems of discrimination or disadvantage. The specific items of policy will be referred to throughout the course of this brief.

4. Statements of policy alone often lack the vitality and immediacy of daily life. To restore vigour to its policies on poverty, to check upon the continuing relevance of these policies, and to uncover possibilities for new or redefined policies, the Federation asked its member organizations to prepare a series of studies dealing with various aspects of the relationship between poverty and education. Eight such studies were done and have now been published under the title The Poor at School in Canada. The majority of these studies are "observational" rather than statistical. They are so arranged as to enable the reader to enter a selection of schools for the poor in Canada and contrast the facilities, teachers and educational programs to be found there with those offered to the affluent by the same educational jurisdictions. The studies have certain advantages in that they are both current and Canadian. Consequently, continuing reference will be made to them throughout this brief.

5. Copies of The Poor at School in Canada have been provided to accompany this brief. Additional documentation made available to the Senate Committee includes bibliographies dealing with disadvantaged children and dropouts and the most recent CFT study of Education Finance in Canada.

6. In summary, this brief will deal with various aspects of the relationship between poverty and public education in Canada. We recommend it to your special attention as the work of an organization which has demonstrated a long-standing concern for and commitment to the disadvantaged in Canada and the world.

The Definition of Poverty for Today's Society

7. While in part it is the purpose of this brief to extend the definition of poverty in regard to the aspects affecting or affected by education, it is nevertheless necessary to begin with some working definition of poverty. In our view, the kind of poverty with which we must be most concerned, simply as members of a common society, is that which involves an involuntary and continuing economic status which is considerably lower than that enjoyed by the bulk of the population. The important ideas here are really quite simple. The poor lack money, they cannot choose between having or not having money, and their status is, by comparison with that of their fellow citizens, low.

8. It should also be noted that the poor are not defined simply as those with low incomes, but as those with incomes significantly lower than average. If this distinction is not made, it is not logically possible to talk about the eradication of poverty without also recommending the eradication of economic stratification. The overall question of stratification and social class is extremely complex and, in the final analysis, is a political question, which must receive a political answer.

9. Notwithstanding, it is clear that many persons, including teachers, are concerned with the special problems of those whose incomes are barely sufficient to provide the necessities of life, or in many cases, are insufficient. Daily, teachers of the poor see the effects on children of these low levels of income, in the child's lunch bag or in his clothes. In Martin's study of "Disparities in Urban Schools", for example, the teacher of Hillside, the poorer school, remarked "It is too bad the poor children have such home lives—Did you see the lunches some of them bring to school? Bread and butter, that's all."¹ Another observer, in the city of "Agripolis", noted that the students at Trackville Junior High have "plain sandwich fare brought in paper bags. Most do not have fresh fruit included."² The observer in another school remarked upon the concern shown by teachers in Lo-Soc School: "One of the teachers commented that I should have gone to Mrs. A's class because one of her little girls had come to school that morning with no books and very thin-soled shoes. When the other teachers heard this they were very concerned and wanted to know if the child's parents knew that they could get boots at the Welfare."³ Finally, in one of the case studies reprinted to CTF it was noted that children of the X family "are always clean and neatly dressed, although their clothing is obviously second-hand and the alterations not made in a very skilled manner... They (the children) had recollections of feelings of inadequacy and humiliation and somehow felt that this related to their poor clothing."⁴

10. Teachers also experience at first hand the frustration occasioned by the apathy and lack of interest in school that many low income parents exhibit:

The school keeps parents informed through regular formal report cards... After a set of report cards has been sent home, a special opportunity is given for parents to visit the school and discuss their children's achievement with the teachers. Many parents, however, do not take advantage of this arrangement. Some have no contact at all with the schools.⁵

After waiting an hour for a parent to come to the school to talk with her about one of the pupils, Miss Olsen observed disgustedly:

I was supposed to meet Mrs. Butt this afternoon and she didn't turn up. What can you do? She's not one bit interested in Henry's school work.⁶

Many parents and grandparents of these children are of little or no help at all in urging the youngsters to remain in school. Indeed, Indians in general never force their opinions on others. If anything, they act as an obstacle to further education simply by not offering any encouragement.⁷

11. Can a child learn well if he is hungry, or cold, or ill-clad? Can he study well in a home that is crowded, noisy and provides little encouragement? Let us say honestly that no educational program, however well-designed and forward-looking; no teacher, however sympathetic and competent, can compensate for these primary deprivations. Moreover, there is a growing body of evidence to suggest that malnutrition, in particular, if it occurs at an early stage of the child's development, may cause irreversible damage.⁸ And at any time it may be a source of learning disabilities:

Those who have worked with undernourished or hungry children know that they exhibit behavioral alterations. These include apathy, lethargy, inability to pay attention, and perhaps, over-concern about food to such a degree that responses to classroom stimuli do not occur. A child in such condition no longer meets the expectations of his family or teachers. He begins to live in a world of his own and may seek recognition or gain attention by ways that disrupt learning experiences.⁹

12. In view of the evidence presented here, the Canadian Teachers' Federation recommends that some form of guaranteed annual income be established which would enable those presently defined as poor¹⁰ to achieve the goals of adequate housing, clothing and nourishment. Since the economy fluctuates, it would probably be unwise to specify an exact amount. Similarly, we do not insist upon a particular means of distributing this income, since several alternatives might do equally well. However, we do feel that the recipients should not be humiliated or robbed of all dignity because they need this money and that the method of distribution should act as an incentive to greater achievement at school and in the wider society. A guaranteed income would appear to be preferable to the family allowances, which seem to provide incentives of a less desirable sort.

13. Since the guaranteeing of income for the poor requires a redistribution of the total income of society, it may be noted in this connection that the Canadian Teachers' Federation has reported to the federal government's Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs its commitment to the principle that "the progressive character of income tax should be strengthened."¹¹

14. In sum, then, the Canadian Teachers' Federation defines poverty as a problem which has its basis in economic insufficiency and argues that an immediate start must be made on the problem by ensuring that there is enough cash in the pockets of the poor to handle the basic necessities of life. This minimum must be attained if other social programs, including education, are to have their full effect.

15. On the other hand, unless it is desired that there should always be a large segment of Canadian society which cannot become self-supporting, longer-term solutions to poverty must also be sought. To achieve such solutions, attention must be given to the resources other than cash to which the poor need equal access—housing, jobs, health and legal services, and education. What are the priorities among these items and what are the priorities within each? Discussion of these questions follows in the next section.

¹⁰It is recognized that this definition may change as society itself changes.

¹¹Canadian Teacher's Federation. Brief on the White Paper on Tax Reform. Presented to Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, March 12, 1970. p. 2.

Education and Economic Well-Being

16. Education is at something of a disadvantage in asking for priority as a potential way of helping the poor, since its benefits are generally of a long-term nature. Education does not have the immediacy of, say, a new house. Yet there are two main bases on which education may claim considerable priority:

1. Education is a source of power for the individual
2. Longer periods of education have been shown to be correlated with higher incomes.

17. While the second of these has received the most attention, it may be that the first is of greatest relevance in alleviating the economic problems of the poor. Our reasons for suggesting this would be as follows: A man or woman who is broadly educated has non-financial resources which, nevertheless, may be of considerable monetary value. Those who are well-educated know where to find assistance, the services to which they are entitled, their rights and privileges as citizens. In brief, they know how to find the information they need and to use it to their advantage. And they have sufficient confidence to insist upon their rights. This kind of knowledge may be as relevant to ensuring equal access to various services for the poor as the actual provision of the services themselves.

18. This view takes on additional importance when one considers the implications of the correlation between high levels of formal education and high incomes. The basic problem is that the monetary value of a particular level of education is related to the general level of education achieved by the population. Thus there seems to be no minimum number of years of education which, if achieved by all, would ensure prosperity for all. That is to say, a degree is cheap if all have degrees. Thus estimates of the length of a minimum education are constantly being revised upwards.

19. This line of reasoning implies that if education is to help the poor to economic well-being, there must be qualitative as well as quantitative goals for education. It is not enough to say that everyone should have 12 or 14 or more years of education, or to run "stay in school" campaigns. This approach only holds time constant and lets achievement vary. But if the poor are to be helped, it is achievement that must be equalized, not time. Many educators now believe that it is possible to specify the general level of verbal and quantitative skills which must be attained before special training can be successfully undertaken. Moreover, they believe that virtually every individual can attain these minimum levels of skill and thus reach the threshold of economic self-sufficiency.¹² If all but the severely handicapped can indeed be brought to a level of skill at which they can enter special training programs for the various occupations which are available in society, a real beginning on the eradication of poverty can be said to have been made.¹³

20. Education, then, can contribute to the eradication of poverty if efforts are devoted to enabling all, or virtually all, members of society to achieve a minimum level of general intellectual competence on which various sorts of special training for different but necessary and desirable occupations may be based.

21. This approach stresses the need for general intellectual attainment and thus provides a vantage point from which to criticize policies which do not appear to conform to this goal. There is a particular program of the federal government to which the Canadian Teachers' Federation wishes to direct attention in this regard. This is the program which provides substantial weekly allowances, under the Occupational Training of Adults Act, for adults attending vocational courses at technical institutes and elsewhere. We would suggest that the terms of this act are too narrow and that the length of training allowed is too short: "To take a person from illiteracy to job competence in two years is often impossible."¹⁴ We would therefore recommend that the time limit be increased and that the benefits be extended to adults properly enrolled in programs designed to upgrade their standing in elementary and secondary subjects.

22. In summary, we as educators have faith in education and in its power to enhance the well-being of the individual. And we would suggest that both as a source of power and knowledge for individuals and as the basis for specialized occupational training programs, education has a high potential for providing the poor with the means to escape their poverty. If it is to achieve this potential, however, education needs to receive greater priority from all levels of government.

23. The next sections deal with the barriers in the way of achieving the goals set for education and, also, outline the particular groupings of the poor with which public education is most concerned.

Poverty as a Problem for Public Education

24. It has been suggested in the previous section that education is in many ways almost as good as money in the bank; it may therefore have some potential for relieving the poverty of even the elderly and the severely handicapped. Certainly, it has special potential for assisting the adult world in general. However, in so far as teachers in the publicly-supported educational systems in Canada are concerned the greatest potential for a long-term solution to poverty through education lies with the school-age children of the poor. They are both the numerically largest group in the poverty sector and the group most amenable to change. At the same time, children of this group present the schools with the most severe educational problems.

25. It is difficult to give any exact figures regarding the number of children at school who could be classified as poor, not only because, as has been pointed out by the Economic Council, the definition of poverty through reference to a specific level of income is arbitrary, but also because accurate statistics are lacking. As a consequence, one can only make rough estimates regarding the proportion of children at school who are from low-income families.

26. The Economic council, in their Fifth Annual Review, estimated that in 1961 there were 916,000 nonfarm families, 150,000 farm families, and 416,000 individuals who had to spend more than 70 per cent of their income on food, shelter and clothing.¹⁵ They estimated that the total number of people involved was 4.2 million (non-farm) and .5 million (farm). Assuming that the average family included four members and that 40 per cent of the low income population consisted of children 16 and under, one arrives at an approximate total of 1.9 million children 16 years and under from low income homes. Thus for 1961 one may estimate that approximately 27 per cent of the population 0-16 (6,812,179) was from a family in poverty. This figure employs the minimum estimate of low income. If the maximum estimate were used, the figure would rise to over one-third. Thus one might say that in 1961 about 30 per cent of the children attending school or approaching school age were from families with very low incomes.

27. More recent data from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics suggest that this proportion probably decreased between 1961 and 1967.¹⁶ Using the same proportional relationships as for 1961 one arrives at a minimum estimate of 1.5 million children from poor families, representing about 24 per cent of the population aged 0-16. One might also speculate that the distribution of poor children throughout the school system has changed since 1961 and will change still further in the next decade. There is a well-established trend toward retraining a larger proportion of the students through secondary school. Since most children of affluent parents were already being retained to the end of high school or beyond, an increase in retention must mean that a higher proportion of poorer children are now staying in school.¹⁷ Thus while the overall proportion of poor children may have dropped, the proportion attending high school has probably increased. It would also be of interest to explore the extent to which birth rates continue to vary with income levels, since this is the sort of information one needs to have in order to predict the future size of the poverty problem for the schools. The latest study of enrolment¹⁸ predicts a continuing drop in enrolment in the elementary schools over the next ten years. Will the proportion of the poor in this student population increase, decrease, or remain the same?

28. These speculations merely reinforce problems raised by the Economic Council and other bodies regarding the lack of statistics on poverty and its correlates. We really don't know how many children at school come from poor families and therefore may present learning problems of particular kinds. Nor can we say definitely whether quantities are increasing or decreasing. Even at the local level, where one might expect such important data to be available, accurate information was often lacking.

Considerable difficulty was met in obtaining some of the very basic socio-economic data for the two sectors of the city. This was a surprise, considering the prestige which most local educators accord the social science departments of the university. As the department head of Sociology of Education succinctly concluded, "This is an area that is completely unexplored in Agripolis."¹⁹

Data regarding the socio-economic status of the two areas is not readily available. The most useful data source for this report was a study compiled in 1967 which identified twenty "local areas" within the city, and provided comparative socio-economic data for each. Unfortunately the most recent data available at that time were from the 1961 Census.²⁰

29. Moreover, while we have defined the poor as those who lack money, we have carefully not defined the children of the poor as those who lack learning ability. Many children from low income homes do fairly well in school. However, the incidence of learning problems among the poor is undoubtedly higher. For example, the study undertaken in an urban area of British Columbia provides a table showing that achievement on standardized reading and arithmetic tests is consistently lower in Poverty elementary School than it is in Affluent elementary School.²¹ A study conducted in another western Canadian city found similar results.²² That the learning problems evidenced in the early years of school persist throughout is supported by the multitude of studies around the world which have shown a relationship between school retention and socio-economic status.²³

30. The magnitude of the problem of poverty for the schools can, then, be said to equal the number of children attending school whose parents lack adequate income and who exhibit learning difficulties of various sorts.

31. Another approach to the question of the magnitude of the poverty problem in education might be through creation of a typology of poverty subgroups and the exploration of the particular types of school-related problems associated with membership in a particular subgroup. Table 1 is a first attempt at establishing such a typology.

Table 1. Towards a Typology of Poverty Subgroups

Poverty Subgroup	Incidence is Predominantly
	Rural	Urban
Unemployed or Under-employed parents		x
Parents living on marginal lands	x
Widowed or seperated mothers	x	x
Immigrant Parents		x
Indians and Metis	x	x
Negros		x
Eskimos	x

32. The learning problems of children from the different groups described in Table 1 might vary considerably. For example, for immigrant children the major problem might be language difficulties, whereas for the Canadian-born child of under-employed parents transiency may be a more significant problem. One might also point out that the problems vary in numerical incidence, in severity, and in persistence. For example, children who are of Indian, Metis or Eskimo extraction constitute a relatively small proportion of the low-income population. Yet a number of CTF's member organizations gave the problems of these children priority because of their severity. As well, the severity of the problems faced by immigrant children was noted; however, this problem was considered to be less serious since it was not viewed as persisting over an indefinite period of time. In general, it was the opinion of our members that the educational problem presented by Canadian-born urban poor of European or British extraction was numerically largest, but that the educational problem presented by the native Canadian (Indian, Eskimo and Metis), rural or urban, and by Negroes, is most severe and least easily solved.

Defining Equality of Educational Opportunity

33. It has been pointed out in preceding sections that the learning problems of children from low-income families may be more severe and more persistent, and may affect a higher proportion of the total number in the group. These learning problems may differ among the various poverty subgroups, as they become entwined with problems arising from ethnic, racial and cultural differences. They may also be compounded by the addition of emotional problems:

Ron was never observed in the gym without a ball under his left arm and... no one ever attempted to take his "assurance ball" (?) from him.²⁴

34. Many of these problems, it is now thought, arise out of the early family experiences of the child²⁵ and thus present education with the problem that children do not really start school on an equal footing with each other. If children are not equal to begin with, what kind of definition can one give to "equality of educational opportunity"? Clearly, it is not sufficient to provide only equal facilities for children who may vary so vastly in their readiness for formal learning. Special programs of many sorts are needed to counteract the school-related deprivations and disadvantages endured by the poor.

35. The next sections of this brief will be devoted to discussions of equality of educational opportunity in Canada, with special attention to two questions, reflecting "minimum" and "maximum" definitions of that concept:

1. Do children of the poor get the same facilities and treatment at school?
2. Do children of the poor get better facilities and treatment at school?

These questions will be discussed under the following headings, which we would call themes in the relationship between poverty and education in Canada:

Regional Inequalities

36. The problem of poverty in Canada is undoubtedly much compounded by the gross variations in productivity and income among different regions of Canada. Regardless of the intent of the people in these areas, or of their governmental representatives, their financial resources are simply not sufficient to match the facilities that can be provided in other parts of Canada. As was pointed out in the conclusion of one of the observational studies conducted for CTF in an eastern province, "Programs to accomplish the desired objectives, however, will be costly and will involve facilities, agencies and experts not currently available in a province where all funds for education are strictly limited by the financial situation of the province itself."²⁶

37. There is no need to belabour in this brief the extent to which these gross regional inequalities exist in Canada. Their effect on education is illustrated by the figures in Table 2, which compare the ten provinces on the bases of ability to pay (personal income per child aged 5-9) and expenditure per pupil.

38. The Canadian Teachers' Federation is of the firm belief that the federal government is the only agency in Canada with the power to bring about redistribution of income which would enable the poorer provinces to bring their educational facilities up to at least the average standard which the wealthier provinces can afford. It therefore recommends that the federal government provide financial support for all levels of education (elementary, secondary and post-secondary) in regions of the country where there is a clear deficiency in tax-paying ability, relative to the rest of the country.

School Facilities

39. As was pointed out in the preceding section, the part of Canada one lives in makes a difference to one's educational opportunities. The child in British Columbia has more than twice as much spent on his education each year as the child in Newfoundland. And this difference is closely correlated with retention in school: in 1961 68 per cent of the 15-19 year olds in British Columbia were still in school, compared with 52 per cent in Newfoundland.²⁷

40. But we have been aware of this situation for a long time. What has not been so evident is that in the same province, in the same city, and under the same operating authority, it is frequently the poor who get poorer schools. Once again, we are short on the needed statistics, and must turn for evidence to the observational studies which were conducted on our behalf:

Because of the limited size of the school playground [at Hillside]... the majority of the children are forced to play on the streets and sidewalks during the recess and lunch breaks. Higher Levels is a modern school... Ample playground space is available... The Hillside pupils are continuously interrupted by the traffic on the streets.²⁸

Trackville Junior High is a red-brick two-storey building located about 35 feet from a main truck artery... the play area is undeveloped... Both upper and lower corridors are dimly lighted.

Across the street from a shady park is a single-storey school that was built in 1951 [Middletown]

... In the summer the front lawn is attractively green and flowers border the walkway to the main entrance on the west ... In the winter ... most of the activity centers on the skating rink and jam pail curling ... On entering the building ... the visitor is greeted by colourful papier-maché and ceramic samples of handwork displayed from glassed-in cases.²⁹

The two schools ... are both in relatively older areas of the city, and are thus traditional-style structures. The school located in the higher socio-economic region of the city has a park-like setting among lawns and trees, and is surrounded by a prestigious residential district ...

The contrasting school is located directly on one of the main traffic arteries of the city, and is in a setting of old homes—many in poor repair—and heavy industry ...

Not only does Affluent Elementary have pleasanter surroundings, but it also has a greater site size. Its 461 students are accommodated on a site of 4.83 acres ... While this is not large compared to most standards, it exceeds the 2.18 acres ... provided for the 504 children at Poverty Elementary School.³⁰

41. Similar results were found in an earlier study in a western Canadian city:

... Inner City school libraries are converted classrooms or even smaller areas ... The Inner City school sites are dwarfed by comparison with the established standards for new schools ... The very poor gymnasiums and changing facilities in the Inner City schools ... cripple the Physical Education program.³¹

42. It is apparent from these studies that many of the schools in Canada are community schools in the worst sense of that concept. The children of the poor may have few if any books at home—so why not omit libraries from their schools? They regularly play in the streets at home—so why make the school's playground significantly bigger or better? Surroundings at home may be drab and dreary and run-down—a depressing run-down school should fit in perfectly. Better to concentrate resources in the affluent areas, where the parents might otherwise complain.

43. It will no doubt be pointed out that the disparities in facilities are accidental rather than intentional. While Canadian school systems were going through a period of rapid expansion in the nineteen-fifties and early sixties, funds were not available for replacing or renovating older schools. Moreover, it is as a result of certain trends in urban development that the poor have fallen heir to the older, less adequate schools. And finally, variable zoning requirements contribute to the perpetuation of small school grounds in the inner city by raising property values to commercial rates.

44. It will no doubt also be argued that replacement of inadequate facilities has begun. On the other hand, the process is hardly proceeding with undue haste. As one study points out:

Many of the Inner City schools have not been renovated or redecorated, nor are they presently planned to be ... The holding off of such corrective work for even as little as six years means condemning a substantial number of the children ... to taking their entire elementary schooling in that very condition of inequality of educational opportunity.³²

45. The Canadian Teachers' Federation therefore urges local and provincial governments to recognize the urgency of the need for renovation or replacement of substandard schools and to proceed with the necessary building programs immediately. It is also suggested that the designs for any new schools which are to serve the poor incorporate such features as libraries, imaginative playgrounds, at-school study areas and works of art, thus providing a beautiful and stimulating environment for children whose home environment lacks those characteristics. Furthermore, it is suggested that the buildings be designed to encourage parental involvement in the school and its program and to permit use of some part of the facilities for emphasizing the positive values in the cultural identity of the particular community. (For example, there might be an area set aside for displays relating to the ethnic background of the children.)

46. It is further suggested that some experimentation be conducted with the idea of a "school without a building." One of the major problems in educating children of the poor is that they do not stay put:

... children move in and out of Poverty Elementary more frequently ... From September 1, 1969 to January 31, 1970, 134 students transferred into Poverty School ... [and] 101 students transferred out . . . Many of those transferring out were the same children who had transferred in earlier in the same school year.³³

But as John Macdonald has pointed out in The Discernible Teacher, there is no reason why the school must be a slave to the great God of Proximity.³⁴ Where the transiency occurs within a city, as much of it does, some attempt might be made to gain greater continuity of program for the transient children by making certain that they attend the same school throughout their early years, perhaps by providing transportation facilities. Where distances are too great, special resource teachers might be assigned to move about with the children, easing their transfer from one school situation to another.

47. In summary, then, it seems clear that school facilities do not at present meet even the minimum definition of equality of educational opportunity (i.e., equal facilities). Yet it is to be hoped that efforts will be made in the near future to bring them closer to the maximum definition (i.e., special facilities to meet greater needs).

Special Programs for Children of the Poor

48. Buildings alone will not solve the educational problems of children from low income families, although they can provide the spaces in which appropriate programs may take place. The question of what constitutes an appropriate program is, of course, not settled. In fact, in view of the feeling which now pervades educational thinking—that there is a need to adjust continually for individual differences—there is probably no way of ever settling the question. That is to say, there is no one program, or set of programs, which would immediately do away with the learning problems of the poor.

49. The mistaken assumption that a particular program might demolish the educational problems of poor children at one fell swoop may lie behind the failures of so many of the compensatory programs in the United States:

A study conducted for the U.S. Office of Education of all compensatory programs for the disadvantaged reported on between 1963 and 1968 found that of the 1,000 programs examined, only 23 were found to have yielded "measured educational benefits of cognitive achievement."³⁵

Head Start programs in particular, have been widely criticized.

50. Yet, while it seems to be true that the hastily implemented programs of preschool compensatory education in the United States have not been overly successful, one should not therefore discard entirely the idea of preschool education, for it remains certain that many of the learning problems of poor children have their roots in the experiences which they have had, or lacked, in their earliest years. These problems ought, in logic at least, to be amenable to solution through improved kindergarten and preschool education. Certainly, as may be seen from Table 3, there is a general lack of such facilities in many parts of Canada. Moreover, in a number of provinces the provincial grant scheme does not cover kindergarten facilities. As a result, local districts tend to establish kindergartens on the basis of demand (which usually comes from the more affluent families) rather than of need.³⁶ It is therefore the feeling within the Canadian Teachers' Federation that greater provision should be made for the establishment of kindergarten and preschool programs in Canada and that, in allocating resources for these facilities, priority be given to communities in which the greater proportions of children from low income sectors of society live. The highest priority of all should go to children who suffer the additional disadvantage of belonging to an ethnic, cultural or racial minority in which the language of the home is not the language of the school.

51. The solution to the educational problems of the poor does not lie exclusively in the preschool, nor can it be found in any particular level of the educational system. It seems, rather, that solutions may be found as the programs in the schools take on dimensions such as the following:

- (a) parental involvement
- (b) culturally differentiated textbooks and curricula
- (c) avoidance of streaming
- (d) intensive training in language skills.

Parental Involvement

52. Parental involvement in the school is very likely to be one of the keys to pupil achievement. A number of studies have demonstrated that achievement may improve swiftly when the school takes the trouble to show parents how to reinforce achieving behaviour:

A New York City program, STAR (Supplementary Teaching Assistance in Reading), used paraprofessionals to train parents to read to their children . . . The children, whose parents were trained one hour per week during the school year to read to them, scored higher in nine different reading tests than did a control group of matched children who received two hours of remediation per week from professionals.³⁷

53. The studies done for CTF suggest that the schools in poorer areas seem to have little contact with the parents (see paragraph 10). Yet contact might be brought about fairly simply, and in a way which could directly improve children's achievement. For example, in a recent paper to the American Educational Research Association, Dr. Robert Hawkins described a system through which parents deliberately reinforced their children's achievement by giving or withholding rewards on the basis of notes received daily from the teacher. Achievement gains in skill subjects were frequently astonishing under this system.³⁸

54. In the various programs being developed to assist disadvantaged children in Canada, involvement of parents is usually a key feature:

Drop into St. Paul's School in downtown Toronto on Monday or Thursday evenings . . . Parents are teaching other students how to paint.³⁹

Three groups of volunteers work with children who have special problems . . . The National Council of Jewish Women conduct classes for pre-school children two mornings a week. On these mornings the mothers attend and are given help with problems that affect their children.⁴⁰

The nursery schools has two Cree-speaking children for every English-speaking child. Many Indian mothers stay to learn sewing and other activities while their children attend nursery school.⁴¹

55. While parental involvement at the level of the local school is essential, some thought might be given to the extent to which low-income parents are involved in the formal bodies which make decisions about educational priorities, such as boards of education. Parents of the poor stand little chance of gaining access to these decision-making bodies if a property qualification must be met. But even where this is not the case, potential candidates from the lower income group may find the cost of running for elected office prohibitive. These questions, again, are not open to ready solution. Presumably, however, some means must be found whereby the representatives of the poor may have both formal and operational participation in the decisions which affect the educational opportunities provided for their children.

56. While true for all low-income groups, this point is particularly true in the case of ethnic and racial minorities. The situation of Indian parents in Canada is a case in point. It seems that originally the Indian communities had a voice in the operation of the federal schools for Indians through school committees. Where the responsibility for educating Indian children has been transferred to provincial public schools, however, this direct liaison between home and school has often been lost, and replaced by the indirect mediation of a representative of the Indian Affairs Branch:

... band councils still need to deal with the IAB to implement programs . . . In most Indian communities, also, few Indians, if any, are on local school boards where decisions affect their children.⁴²

57. The effect of this exclusion from the decision-making process is to increase the alienation of Indian parents from the schools and to hold back the development of schools which would truly serve the needs and interests of the local community. In turn, this tends to keep native communities socially marginal:

Most Indians, particularly in the north, are unaccepted by white people socially.⁴³

Some parents resent their children learning the worse parts of the white man's ways . . .⁴⁴

In view of these problems the Canadian Teachers' Federation strongly recommends that further provision be made for the involvement of Indians, Metis, Eskimos and Negroes in those policy-making bodies which determine the education of their children.

Differentiated Curricula and Textbooks

58. The failure to date of education to help adequately children of the poor can be traced not only to unequal facilities and lack of parental involvement, but also to the very nature of the programs which have been offered; while these programs have undoubtedly been prepared in good faith, they may nevertheless be quite inappropriate for many, perhaps most, poor children. The child who is poor will not, for example, likely recognize the kind of "normal" home life which is portrayed in many reading texts, where children have plenty to eat, good clothes, rooms of their own, pets, grass to play on, and a father who comes home from work every night. The stereotyped portrayals in these books take for granted certain values which, even where they are held by the disadvantaged sector, cannot be achieved. Take, for example, the supposedly simple matter of cleanliness. It's really very easy to be clean—or is it? Consider the following excerpt from a CTF study:

Not too many mothers of six or seven children living on welfare could manage, especially in the winter time, to wash the children's clothes too often, even if they have seconds to change into. Many Indian homes, particularly those of the squatters, are extremely substandard, and water is not an easily accessible commodity. The load of washing must be scrubbed laboriously by hand on a washboard, perhaps in the same tub of sudsy water, then rinsed in a small basin of hot water. Even when thus washed the clothes fail to look sparkling clean, not to mention the holes or patches or the fitting or styling of the clothing on the backs of some of the Indian children, who must attend school with comparatively well-dressed and well-fed non-Indians.⁴⁵

59. A more serious deficiency in the curricula and textbooks of the dominant sector of society is that they may portray the other sectors in a distorted or erroneous way:

Research done by the University Women's Club of Port Credit (1968) on the Canadian Indian in Ontario's school texts showed that there are "enormous omissions" . . . The little information given about Indians is chiefly on economy and technology, and includes "almost no material on religion, values, ethics or aesthetics."⁴⁶

One result of these influences may be that the children whom the schools are intent upon helping develop such a feeling of inferiority that communication between teacher and children virtually disappears:

Walter, Shirley, Dorothy and Betty-Anne . . . liked the school and remembered it as a pleasant place . . .

... They all felt they were "dumb" in comparison to other children. This concept persists and they feel they have done quite well in life considering they are a "dumb" family.⁴⁷

It might be noted that both Shirley and Dorothy qualified for senior high school programs, but did not attend.

⁴²Lee, op. cit., p. 118.

⁴³*Ibid.*, p. 117.

⁴⁴*Ibid.*, p. 120.

60. Another unfortunate result of the standard textbooks is that children in the dominant society also receive a distorted version of the nature and achievements of other groups in Canada. "Our teachers and other 'educated' citizens who have been raised on these same or similar textbooks could hardly be condemned for their share in the treatment of the Indian people as 'citizens minus'."⁴⁸

61. There is an obvious need for differentiated curricula and texts—but a dilemma is created by the fact that it is not economical to produce texts in small numbers. However, it should at least be possible in the short term to remove discriminatory sections from present texts and begin to add in sections appropriate for children from other than urban middle income groups. The long-range solution may lie in doing away with general purpose textbooks and replacing them with a multitude of reference books and one-unit books. The library thus replaces the textbook and leaves teachers free to organize material and adapt it to the special needs of their pupils. The library may also become a resource centre which allows teachers and pupils to develop new materials as needed and, in effect, to write their own textbooks.

62. The federal government could provide valuable assistance in the meantime by helping various ethnic and cultural minorities in Canada to locate and record their lost history and thus begin the restoration of their cultural identity. Provided it has the will, the government has many means of accomplishing these aims, including the Canada Council and the National Film Board. In developing the suggested materials it should be kept in mind that there are two major goals: (1) to help Indians, Eskimos, Metis, Negroes and the poor generally to learn about and respect themselves and (2) to help other children to learn about and respect all their fellow citizens, including those whose heritage and style of life is different. If discrimination in Canadian society, whether conscious or unconscious, could be ended, a major step would have been taken towards the elimination of poverty.

Avoidance of Streaming

63. It has been pointed out in preceding sections that children do not start school equal. What is worse, however, is that the spread in ability grows ever wider as they move through school:

Discussions with teachers in both schools lead one to believe that the differences in educational achievement between poor and more affluent children become more pronounced as the children become older...⁴⁹

This initial spread in abilities increases over the years so that it is approximately double this amount by the time children approach the end of the elementary school.⁵⁰

If the effect of schooling is to increase the degree of inequality, it certainly becomes a matter of interest to question why this should be so.

64. It is increasingly being suggested by educational authorities that one of the causes of this increase in the range of achievement is the practice of streaming, or grouping, on the basis of general or special ability. Some of this problem may be traced to the over-dependence on the I.Q. test which was to be found until recently in most schools. It was mistakenly thought that I.Q. tests recorded inherited mental ability, rather than the amount and type of learning which took place after birth⁵¹ and that I.Q. results were absolute rather than relative. I.Q. test results were therefore treated as predictors of achievement and children were streamed on the basis of this prediction. The result was to give rise to the phenomenon which is often called the "self-fulfilling prophecy," through which the constantly failing expectations of the teacher are inevitably reflected in the constantly falling achievement level of the pupil. In this kind of system, pupils from homes of low socio-economic status, who often have low I.Q. scores, get started in a slow stream and rarely escape:

The comparison of the Inner City-suburban samples showed that there was a disproportionately high percentage of Inner City pupils in the 7-year "slow learner" stream of the elementary Continuous Progress Plan and a disproportionately low percentage of Inner City students in the 5-year C.P. program. In fact, there were 25 times as many Inner City pupils as there were suburban pupils in the 7-year program for "slow learners." On the other hand, two of the Inner City schools sampled had no students at all in the beginning year of the 5-year "accelerated" stream.⁵² ⁴⁸Lee, op. cit., p. 109.

65. Streaming and grouping, it might be noted, seem on the surface to be eminently practical solutions to the problem of dealing with individual differences through group instruction. If students of roughly comparable ability are grouped together, it is thought, the teachers' problems will be much reduced. And if the groupings are by subject as well, the problems will be reduced that much further. But there are invidious side effects to these groupings. For one thing, children in the lower ability groups and streams, even if they are referred to as "Monkeys" or "Moon Walkers", are usually very well aware of their academic merits, or lack of them, and realize their stupidity. Moreover, groupings tend to obscure the logic of the problem, which is stated thus by Bereiter and Englemann:

If the point is accepted that disadvantaged children are behind other children in certain developmental aspects, then it follows by simple logical necessity that they must progress at a faster than normal rate if they are to catch up. Although this conclusion is not a popular one, there is no conceivable way to contradict it except by denying that disadvantaged children are behind.⁵³

This problem of unequal beginning abilities and increasing inequalities does not get solved when graded schools are exchanged for nongraded schools, although the public stigma of failure is removed. There is little evidence to show that nongrading procedures bring about impressive improvements in skill subjects. It would appear that a further reorganization and reorientation of elementary education is required if the massive gains in the achievement levels of disadvantaged children which seem to be needed are to be made.

Emphasis on Language Skills

66. The final dimension of potentially effective programs for the disadvantaged is implied in the last section. This is the necessary emphasis on language skills. There is really no place in Canadian society today for those who do not possess a high degree of verbal skill. At least, there is no place among the occupations which are most desirable and which pay best. Physical skill can rarely be substituted. Thus if education is to make inroads in the problems of poverty there must be an even greater concentration on the teaching of language skills than there is at present. And here we may echo the recent words of the U.S. Commissioner of Education, James E. Allen Jr.:

Imagine, if you can, what life would be like if you could not read, or if your reading skills were so meager as to limit you to the simplest of writings, and if for you the door to the whole world of knowledge and the inspiration available through the printed word had never opened.

For more than a quarter of our population this is true... These individuals have been denied a right—a right as fundamental as the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness—the right to read.⁵⁴

67. It may be noted that in the CTF studies considerable emphasis is given in most of the classrooms to reading and arithmetic skills:

... although a formal timetable listing specific subjects and periods is displayed prominently in the classroom, Miss Brown has increased the time spent on mathematics, language and reading and has decreased the time spent on other activities.⁵⁵

But more is obviously needed than time:

Germaine has a serious reading problem and Miss Brown attempts to help her in the traditional way, which does not appear to remedy the situation.⁵⁶

And that "more" will require much larger expenditures on developing new learning materials and on providing additional teachers with the specialized training to offer intensive initial and remedial programs in skill subjects. Where the children to be taught do not speak, as their first language, one of Canada's "official" languages, the teacher's special training should include a knowledge of that first language, whether it is Cree or Italian, and a knowledge of how to teach English or French as a second language.

Current Programs

68. The bleak portrait of the programs of education offered to disadvantaged children in Canada that was drawn above does not hold true everywhere. Many teachers have become concerned over just these problems in the past few years and have begun to move toward a solution. New programs have been designed and implemented in many parts of Canada. Inner city schools such as Duke of York Public School in Toronto have become well known for their innovative approaches to teaching poor children.⁵⁷ The E.N.O.C. program in Hamilton⁵⁸ and a higher horizons program in Winnipeg have been developed through co-operative efforts on the part of teachers and principals to deal with emerging problems. Similar programs are to be found in the Atlantic provinces and in the west of Canada. For example, the British Columbia Teachers' Federation Inner-City Schools Committee is planning a summer program to meet various special needs of urban children from low-income areas.⁵⁹ It may be noted that many of these programs exhibit similar features—reduced class size, specialists in language teaching, community and parental involvement, nutritious meals and snacks, field trips, male “identity” figures, use of volunteers, paraprofessionals and social workers, provisions for adult education and day care. These programs are all very worthy. But they are only a drop in the bucket compared with what is needed.

Teachers of the Poor

69. The final theme to be found in the relationship between poverty and education is the one with which we, as a federation of teachers, are most intimately concerned. This theme concerns the professional preparation and practice of the teachers of the poor. And if we accept as a rough estimate that perhaps a third of the children in the public schools come from homes of one or another of the poverty subgroups identified in an earlier section, it will be agreed that the proportion of teachers in this category is rather large.

70. A number of problems arise when attempts are made to ensure that good teaching reaches the poor. Many of these problems may stem from the fact that teachers too are human beings, as anxious as any of their fellows for congenial surroundings and satisfying work. As a result, there has been a distinct reluctance on the part of teachers generally to seek or stay in schools in isolated areas or in schools where the children do not respond quickly to the usual teaching methods. This problem was compounded in the past through somewhat dishonest recruitment procedures which did not provide teachers with an honest picture of the situation they were likely to encounter.

71. The comparative studies undertaken for CTF and elsewhere illustrate this reluctance of teachers to remain as teachers of the poor:

The teacher population, [at Glengarry Elementary] all female, is far from stable. In fact, the principal says that it is difficult to get teachers to remain in the school.

Nearly all the teachers in the area [at Rosedale Elementary] have taught here for many years.⁶⁰

The teaching staffs were also compared for length of service in their present schools. The median length of service at Affluent Elementary was 3.0 years, compared to 1.0 years at Poverty Elementary.⁶¹

The turn-over rate of teachers is high; in certain instances there may be as many as two or three different teachers within the same academic year.⁶²

Don't tell me you are still at . . . !

Good heavens, why don't you transfer to a better area?

I've heard about that school: I don't see how you can stand it.

Why do you stay?⁶³

72. A concomitant problem is that the teachers in the poorer schools often have less training:

Employed in Trackville Junior High School are eight men and five women. Six have degrees and five are working toward their degrees in evening classes. No one has a major in special education.

[At Middletown Junior High] the full staff complement is fifteen. Twelve have degrees and seven have two or more degrees.⁶⁴

Of the present teaching force at Affluent Elementary . . . 56 per cent have . . . at least four years' university training, compared to . . . 42 per cent at Poverty Elementary.⁶⁵

Presumably, one of the reasons for this disparity is that the better qualified teachers find it easier to get the kinds of positions they prefer.

⁶⁴ Milner, op. cit., pp. 30, 40.

⁶⁵ Martin, op. cit., p. 6.

73. A more subtle problem exists in the fact that teachers in schools for the poor do not usually live in the same area as their students. Thus they tend to look upon the adult community that surrounds the school from the point of view of outsiders, seeing the parents as shiftless, apathetic, lacking interest and responsibility and, in general, inferior:

Most of the teachers at Hillside have a different feeling about the area which the school serves than they do about the children in the area. None of the teachers live in it, and for the most part, they speak of it disparagingly.⁶⁶

Parent-Teacher conferences are scheduled in response to a full-blown crisis. Under these circumstances teachers meet a few parents. Only one staff member visited the homes of his students.⁶⁷

The isolation of the school from the community which thus develops does not augur well for the improvements in schooling that are needed. Teachers who are out of touch with or hostile to the community from which their pupils come may not develop that particular sensitivity which is required in difficult situations. For example, they may not recognize the subtleties involved in such overt behaviours as stealing or fighting. And they may adopt disciplinary modes which reflect this imperfect understanding.

The philosophy behind the treatment of misbehaviour and consequently the method of punishment used by each principal is different. The principal at Hillside usually carries a strap in his pocket and he often uses it on misbehaving pupils . . . For example, Harrison and Larry got "strapped" for fighting in the basement of the school, and Keith received a strapping for talking across the classroom while the principal was teaching a science lesson . . .

The principal at Higher Levels has a different attitude toward the pupils who behave improperly, and consequently he has a different method of dealing with them. The strap has never been used at Higher Levels.⁶⁸

74. One might well ask how the very natural distaste which teachers have for difficult environments might be overcome. It is possible that financial incentives might be the answer in some cases. However, it seems that other approaches may be more fruitful. For example, the temporary or rotating appointment suggested in one study might be an acceptable solution in some cases:

Alex Sim, for instance, recommended for the nomadic Indians a corresponding educational service complete with nomadic teachers; while R. W. Dunning . . . suggested a teacher-rotation system which was actually tested in British Columbia some years ago and proved successful although many obstacles such as the problem of seniority or the voluntary mobility of teachers had to be overcome.⁶⁹

Another solution, although less clear in its ramifications, is the possibility of training persons from the community as teachers and teachers' aides. This is a debatable solution, since it might limit the individual to employment in a specific region, thus restricting his chances of mingling with the broader society. Thus, for example, it sounds sensible to suggest training Indians to teach in Indian communities; but it would be unfair to insist that they teach nowhere else.

75. In all probability, the most lasting solution to the problem of attracting competent teachers to schools for the poor may be sought in terms of the following:

- (a) improved working conditions
- (b) emphasis on aspects which present a challenge and require imaginative solutions
- (c) specialized training.

Each of these will now be discussed in turn.

Working Conditions

76. Teachers agree that working with children who are disadvantaged is physically and emotionally exhausting. It is interesting to notice that in the projects specifically planned to help disadvantaged children that were described in paragraph 68, the two first steps taken almost everywhere were to reduce class size and hire specialists, including not only librarians and language specialists, but also persons in new and imaginative positions such as the "crisis" teacher described in one of the CTF studies:

Mr. Y is a "crisis" or "resource" teacher. He takes care of youngsters who, for some reason or other, cannot function in a classroom situation for very long. The children, mostly boys, are sent down to him at regular intervals or at a crisis

⁶⁶ Martin, op. cit., p. 6.

⁶⁷ Milner, op. cit., p. 30

⁶⁸ Martin, op. cit., p. 8.

⁶⁹ Lee, op. cit., p. 111.

moment. Mr. Y talks to them or just lets them play until it is decided that they should return to class.

When Donnie decided to leave there he started off down to Mr. Y's room again. (It was always an alternative if we couldn't go somewhere else.)⁷⁰

Other personnel that have been brought into experimental programs include social workers and psychologists.

77. It would seem from the studies conducted for CTF that the question of class size is crucial. The pupils in a number of classes seemed to spend a considerable time just waiting, for events to start happening or for the teacher's attention:

The pupils who got books asked the teacher's permission to do this by raising their hands and waiting for her to ask them what they wanted. Four or five whispered across the classroom. The teacher spoke to those who were whispering. She said, "Stop talking and finish your maths. If you're finished there must be something you can do."⁷¹

Ron begins tapping his feet on the wall in front of him. He picks up chalk and begins doodling on the board... Teacher then moves to Ron's desk and begins helping him with a problem. He poses penetrating questions. Ron answers the questions easily. Ron intermittently lifts his head to daydream in the direction of the student at the board. Begins making faces at a student across the room.⁷²

It might be noted that Ron is the boy whose "cumulative folder is monotonously repetitive with D's and C's."⁷³ Pupils were also discouraged at times from continuing on in their work, even when able and eager to do so:

Eddie, one of the children working math, asks Miss Brown if he has to work beyond page 85. When she tells him that he does not, he closes his text, puts it in his desk and asks Miss Brown if he may get a book. "Sit still for a minute, please," she responds. He then lies across his desk and smiles at Tony, who is still working.⁷⁴

An interesting contrast is found at the Higher Levels school described in another study, where the teacher has, in effect, reduced class size by turning her students into teachers:

One big difference was that at Higher Levels the teacher often encouraged specific students who were finished to help others who were having difficulty with their work.⁷⁵

78. Improvements in working conditions of the kind suggested above might help to make teaching in schools for the poor sufficiently pleasant to attract highly qualified teachers. These improvements, of course, are not inexpensive.

Career Commitment

79. It is also noticeable that the special projects allow teachers who do not wish to participate to move to another school. This is an important aspect of improving the teaching of the poor. Schools for the poor should not be staffed by persons who are trying to transfer out, or who have been attracted only by special working conditions or extra money. Rather, it is to be hoped that in future these schools will be staffed by teachers who have committed themselves to a career in this area and who approach the community and the children with neither scorn nor sentimentality, but with genuine respect. As one study points out, "there is some indication that an increasing number of teachers are planning for themselves a career in 'innercity' schools."⁷⁶

80. An added incentive to making the teaching of the poor attractive to career teachers is the opportunity and need for innovative approaches. It is suggested that teachers be made aware of the challenging aspects of "difficult" teaching situations and be assured that the new techniques and approaches they develop will be as welcome there as in the schools for the affluent.

Special Training

81. One fairly certain way of bringing about career commitment is through providing teachers with a broad understanding of the learning problems of the poor, of the underlying social and economic conditions, and of the special techniques which may be used or are particularly required in such situations.

⁷⁵Martin, op cit., p. 13.

⁷⁶Inner-City Schools Committee, B.C.T.F., op cit., p. 102.

The provision of this knowledge is in part the responsibility of in-service training facilities. However, in view of the size of the problem, one questions whether special training programs for teachers of the poor should not be incorporated within the regular preservice teacher preparation programs. A recent survey by the Canadian Teachers' Federation suggests that it is the exception rather than the rule to include courses, or even parts of courses, dealing with disadvantaged children in the regular training programs. Out of some 33 English-speaking teacher education institutions replying to the CTF questionnaire, 20 reported that no courses or parts of courses on Indian and Metis education are planned at present. Nineteen report the same situation in regard to the education of inner city children and 23 in regard to Eskimo education. In addition, 18 institutions reported that they do not provide any courses in preschool education.⁷⁷

82. As in other cases throughout this brief, the Federation recognizes the particular urgency of the problem as it relates to the native peoples of Canada; it therefore strongly recommends that courses of study be established which will better prepare teachers of Indian, Metis and Eskimo students to deal with the needs of these students. Moreover, it is suggested that this is an area in which the federal government, perhaps through the Canada Council, could provide direct financial support, by subsidizing the work required to develop and put into operation these special programs.

Summary

83. Through this brief the Canadian Teachers' Federation has attempted to draw to the attention of the Senate Committee the more important of the complex ways in which poverty and public education are intertwined in today's society. As far as possible, statements have been documented by studies of the current situation across Canada. In the course of the brief a number of suggestions have been made regarding ways in which education might assist in the alleviation of poverty. For the convenience of the Committee, these recommendations are collected and re-stated in formal terms below.

Recommendations

1. THAT some form of guaranteed annual income be established which would enable those presently defined as poor to achieve the goals of adequate housing, clothing and nourishment.
2. THAT the progressive character of income tax be strengthened.
3. THAT education be given priority among possible long-term solutions to the problems of poverty.
4. THAT benefits similar to those provided under the Occupational Training of Adults Act be extended to adults properly enrolled in programs designed to upgrade their standing in elementary and secondary subjects.
5. THAT the federal government collect statistics on the educational characteristics of the population more frequently than once every ten years and that priority in the order of census analyses be given to data dealing with education.
6. THAT analyses of the family background of children of various ages attending school be prepared from census data and published.
7. THAT the federal government provide financial support for all levels of education (elementary, secondary and post-secondary) in regions of the country where there is a clear deficiency in tax-paying ability, relative to the rest of the country.
8. THAT plans be implemented immediately to renovate or replace the substandard schools which still exist in many parts of Canada and which prohibit the offering of modern programs of instruction.
9. THAT greater provision be made for the establishment of kindergarten and preschool programs in Canada and that priority in their establishment be given to communities where the children are poor.
10. THAT efforts be made to involve low-income parents, on both formal and operational bases, in the education of their children.
11. THAT, in particular, further provision be made for the direct involvement of Indians, Metis, Eskimos and Negroes in those policy-making bodies which determine the education of their children.
12. THAT the federal government provide financial assistance to native Canadians attempting to record the history of their people and culture.

⁷⁷ Canadian Teachers' Federation. Questionnaire on Innovations in Teacher Education. Preliminary results, 1970.

13. THAT the federal government contribute financially toward the development of curricula for Indian, Metis and Eskimo children which will include support for the valuable aspects of their own culture.
14. THAT sections of textbooks which are apt to further the discriminatory aspects of Canadian society be removed from future editions.
15. THAT teachers of children from homes where neither English nor French is the first language acquire some knowledge of the language of the home.
16. THAT courses of study be established which will better prepare teachers of Indian, Metis, Eskimo and Negro students to deal with the needs of these students.
17. THAT the federal government provide financial assistance to institutions of higher education to enable them to develop appropriate courses for teaching the teachers of Canada's native peoples.

APPENDIX "B"

SUBMISSION TO THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

by

The Canadian Council for Research in Education 265 Elgin Street,
233-2740

Para. 1 The following recommendations are intended to suggest plans of action. They are derived logically from the treatment in the pages which follow. C.C.R.E. suggests that education can play an important role in the development of human resources and that research is necessary in selecting the alternatives for education programs which will meet most needs of society and of the individual.

Recommendations

1. That in planning steps to be taken to alleviate conditions of poverty, serious consideration should be given to making optimum use of education's potential.
2. That in order to ensure that decisions taken to reduce the numbers of those living under conditions of poverty be as rational and sound as possible, relevant research endeavour must be stepped up so that factual data and related information will become available as bases for those decisions. As research projects and pilot studies are the fastest, most reliable and most economical means of testing alternatives, they should be fostered and funded. Education, interpreted broadly to include both formal and informal education, must be one of the chief considerations in any hypothesis proposed.

3. That there be a grant structure provided under which research grants are made available for a variety of "mission-oriented" research projects directed at different aspects of the problem. That only research proposals designed with fully adequate analytical and methodological bases directed or likely to contribute to our understanding of the situation for the disadvantaged be funded. This is to be interpreted broadly enough to include the development of tests, devices and media which are needed to undertake valid research.

4. That research efforts be directed towards the following:

- (a) Determining suitable programs for teachers of relatively homogeneous disadvantaged classes.
- (b) Determining of suitable materials for the preparation of regular teachers who will have a few disadvantaged in a normal heterogeneous class.
- (c) Developing of other teacher preparation programs, i.e. for teachers in nursery schools, kindergartens, special classes for various atypical children. It is appreciated that a fair percentage of these programs will be for the disadvantaged, drop-outs, etc.
- (d) Carrying out pilot projects and the operation of experimental schools and classes designed to test various programs and methodology designed for disadvantaged youth.
- (e) Working with the newer media to discover how best these can be used as contributors to alleviate inequality of educational opportunity and the development of new media as required.

Para. II Some writers and politicians have expressed the opinion that the advanced Western nations now have the potential to provide a reasonably high standard of living for every man, woman and child within their borders, and others see little reason why this cannot be extended throughout the world. They believe that the quotation, "For ye have the poor always with you" could well be made obsolescent. Yet at the same time they are acutely aware of pockets of poverty, of slum areas, of many families living at the subsistence level, and of an increase in disparity between the "have" and the "have not" areas and nations.

Para. III Although lack of income is generally the most immediate and most obvious concomitant of the condition of poverty, the "war on poverty" cannot be won simply through increasing the G.N.P. and dividing it more equitably. A more just society might be attempted through ensuring that every family earn more than $3000 a year within a viable modified free-enterprise economy with some governmental control and with an acceptable taxation structure—a difficult task.

Para. IV Towards achieving this, education must be accepted not only as one of the factors necessary to economic advance, but as one of the means for stimulating disadvantaged youth to prepare themselves for economic independence and acceptance in the mainstream of middle class society. Education normally acts as the badge of entrance into many economy walks of life, and it may be the tool that unlocks many doors. Its correlation with poverty is high and negative; therefore it must be an important consideration in any attempts to reduce poverty.

Para. V This submission was not fashioned to provide a solution designed to eliminate poverty. Rather it was aimed at a consideration of how education can contribute to the individual through: ensuring that he can develop according to his nature; enabling him to compete without handicap in meeting job requirements; and being socially accepted, as these are requisites for the better life. Social research, with limited financial support, has had limited success in providing solutions to our problems. It has nevertheless made it clear to most researchers, and to some others, that family life, community organization and the schools can contribute to an important extent to the educational accomplishment of the children. Numerous research projects indicate that differences in school performance of children are attributable to factors located within these three areas. It is true, however, that not too much is known as to the relative contribution of each, or in what ways they work together or at cross purpose.

Para. VI Emphasis herein is on the disadvantaged, of whom the majority live in poverty areas, or with families in poverty. It is the hope of those concerned with educational improvement that they will eventually be in a position to suggest the kinds of programs which educational institutions might introduce under specified conditions to bridge the gap between the disadvantaged and their more affluent confrères, and in addition to provide information useful to federal, provincial and other planning bodies involved with problems of the poor.

Para. VII Discussion herein is essentially limited to considering contributions which formal education can legitimately make. It is assumed that appropriate well qualified persons will make the case for the home and for other institutions of society since no one of these singled-handed can be counted on to shoulder responsibility for effectively reducing the number of poverty stricken and disadvantaged members of society.

Disadvantaged Youth Among Persons Living in Some Relevant Information from Research Conditions of Poverty

Para. VIII Perhaps we might consider making a start towards identifying those needing special attention through ranking everyone in terms of being advantaged (assuming we could devise criteria to do it) and selecting the lowest 15 per cent of all ages, or 20 per cent of youth, to form the category "non-advantaged". If then we selected a second group of the same size using simple economic criteria, it is likely that a fair percentage of the members would be the same as selected for the first group. But many of those selected in the first grouping would not be selected in the second; and some of those selected by the second means should not have been included as they were not handicapped though poor. Our challenge is therefore to devise ways and means of selecting those "not-advantaged". In this we are most probably not looking for a single criterion but for profiles of characteristics which will identify youth needing special attention.

Para. IX Our disadvantaged population will be made up of a fairly extended variety of individuals, and even though the categories are not mutually exclusive but exhibit considerable overlapping, it appears desirable to establish such categories. There will be many disadvantaged essentially because of low economic status and everything that goes with it, whether living in congested or isolated communities or as left-out families. Some of these will be identified as coming from marginal rural land, others with congested city-centre areas or even sections of suburbia. There are also those with feelings of difference because of racial origin, some having a separate culture which makes it difficult for them to adopt the regular Canadian pattern. In addition, about two per cent are mentally or physically handicapped or emotionally disturbed to a degree where special attention is warranted.

Para. X Looked at another way, the population will also include potential dropouts, many of whom can be identified during their first few years at school, and the left-outs (mainly youth from the wrong side of the tracks with feelings of alienation from attending a heterogeneous school where the majority are affluent youth whose values in many ways are similar to those held by the teacher).

Para. XI It is likely that programs for the various types of disadvantaged should differ; and whether or not they need to be directed towards the community as well as the school may be an important consideration.

Para. XII Let us now turn to review some of the findings to date from research and development projects and observations in this area. In considering youth as disadvantaged because of a poor environment it is understood that cruelty, parental separation, accidents and such may be included although they are not separated out in this report. Nor do we consider the special problems of those with learning handicaps, nor suggest that differences in learning ability among normal pupils are exclusively the result of environmental differences. The position adopted here on heredity and environment is interactionist—the heredity factors are important for understanding and diagnosis; the environmental factors can be manipulated and are important in devising programs and providing treatment. A profile showing the native ability, interests, aptitudes and drive of each student can provide a basis for ensuring suitable education experiences and providing individual treatment.

Para. XIII Although most studies of the disadvantaged have been concerned with those who fail to achieve satisfactory progress in school, more information is needed concerning the behavioral characteristics and cognitive endeavour of those who achieve as well or better than their more opulent classmates. The "rags to riches" dream, based essentially on a minority, who in true Alger book fashion rose from newsboys to become industrial moguls, has often been used to extol rugged individualism, and to absolve society from responsibility for the ne'er-do-well. There is need for more studies concerned with drive and the impoverished.

Para. XIV Many studies conducted in this area during recent years have been concerned with the characteristics of the population. They have focussed on home environment, family status, language, cognition and intelligence, on perceptual styles and patterns of intellectual functions, and on motivation and aspiration. The usual home is described as noisy, disorganized, overcrowded and austere, and lacking such cultural artifacts as books, art work, and variety in toys. As compensation there is a lack of strain, acceptance of one's lot, a relatively low level of sibling rivalry, and the security of belonging to a large family. The children generally display anti-intellectualism, with fear of parental authority, especially in those homes which are ruled autocratically by the mother.

Attempts to Identify the Disadvantaged as a Special Interest Group

Para. XV In attempts to identify the disadvantaged group, individual and culture free intelligence tests have been used. Since intelligence tests are generally composed of items which reflect native ability, school achievement and social background, they cannot be expected to measure potential of the disadvantaged. Nor should the scores be contrasted with scores from youth of good backgrounds as measures of native ability. Careful assessment indicates that poor living conditions may lower the I.Q. by as much as 20 points in exceptional cases—the difference between being feeble-minded and normal. The culture-free tests have yielded little better, and no more consistent, results.

Para. XVI Perhaps one appropriate use for intelligence tests is as indicators of the effectiveness of remedial programs. Achievement tests also have been used in attempts to identify the disadvantaged, but likewise have proven equally inadequate. Teacher opinion and socio-economic scales also leave much to be desired. Language tests can contribute to an understanding of the pupil but have limited value in diagnosis. One can only conclude that at present we should use as many objective data as available and supplement these with observations of home conditions and pupil behavior to decide which children need special attention, and the sort of help they need.

Para. XVII Studies to date indicate that in the long run we should go beyond the usual dimensions of cognitive testing and incorporate the testing of interests, aptitudes and creativity, etc. We will probably end up with profiles of abilities, personality characteristics and interests in part resulting from observations.

Language Development

Para. XVIII Many psychological and sociological theorists postulate the general premise that the educational hardships commonly observed among socially disadvantaged children can be overcome to a great extent through appropriate school experiences. They assume that the sooner these are begun the better, although the degree to which this is stressed depends on whether they consider that mental growth is linear, a continuous chronological development, discontinuous, or whether, following Piaget, to them mental growth is conceived as a fixed sequence of transitions through related stages, with each stage possessing a unique non-overlapping character.

Para. XIX Many of the studies which have been conducted in the field of language development have been designed to determine social class differences or to discover deficiencies of the underprivileged. Group differences have favoured youth from the higher socio-economic levels in practically all aspects of language studies. Usually the language models of lower socio-economic levels are meagre, restricted and grammatically incorrect. There is also limited divergence and elaboration in such children's thinking and they are generally inept at labelling, discriminating, categorizing and generalizing. In terms of semantics (following the American school) they seldom rise in their thinking beyond the first level of communication, which is basically a one-to-one correspondence with concrete manifestations of reality. In simple terms they are bound up in the limited world with which they come in contact, and have little interest in abstractions or ideas.

Para. XX There is some evidence to indicate that delay in the acquisition of certain language forms can result in difficulty of transfer from concrete to abstract models of thought and will result in persons who are inferior in abstract conceptualizations and categorizations of visual stimuli, and in their establishment of systems of values.

Para. XXI Since language is man's means of communication with the outside world, youth with an impoverished vocabulary may feel so alien to the school climate as not to exert themselves to become part of it; or they may be frustrated because the language gap is too great; or, again, they may adjust to the new as to a separate world, eventually either to adopt the new or to revert to the old.

Para. XXII Current attempts to adapt the school program to the needs of the disadvantaged child generally fall into one of three categories: those supplementing regular courses with special comprehensive guidance programs; those using special materials; and those using available remedial and developmental materials under the direction of effective teachers. The opportunity for introducing such programs as these or others is probably better today than at any previous time as education goals aim to provide suitable school offerings for all children. Three programs which may be considered representative of those designed to compensate students for poor backgrounds are: The Demonstration Guidance Project, begun in 1956-57 in New York City for 717 pupils in junior high school and continued to 1962. It was a saturation program of compensatory educational services which provided for modifications, small classes, remedial instruction, cultural activities, counselling, and clinical and home services. The Higher Horizons Program, 1959-62 undertaken in selected depressed areas in New York was intended to "provide the kind of education that would enable disadvantaged children to compete with other children on an equal basis". It involved 64,000 children at all levels. A comprehensive battery of scholastic aptitude and achievement tests, personal and social development scales and professional staff evaluations have provided an extensive data bank for further research. The Philadelphia Pupils' School Community Coordinating Team conducted a two-year study which placed major emphasis upon language arts and included special in-service training for teachers, innovations in instructional procedures and materials, and grouped pupils on reading ability test results. None of the results were conclusive, but better than average progress was generally reported.

Para. XXIII These and other studies, including Canadian projects, have all provided some evidence that compensatory educational services normally have some effect on the academic growth of children although the results leave much to be desired as it is impossible from the findings to determine which of the main types of service contributed to positive results, or whether the enthusiasm and special interest of those taking part was the most important factor.

Para. XXIV To date, then, we lack both conclusive evidence and validated specific methodology that could provide a basis for decision-making which would ensure the setting out of school procedures which could be counted on to overcome effects of most hardships. It may be that the theoretical bases of the programs are still weak, that implementation of the programs has been faulty, and that evaluation instruments and procedures have been inadequate. Certainly the "compensatory education" thesis should not be dropped. Nor, again, does the evidence suggest that present programs are not worthwhile but rather that there is great need for more work in the field, including carefully controlled experiments, if we are going to isolate the factors which contribute the most for the least expenditure, and those of most value irrespective of cost.

Para. XXV Studies should begin with pre-school children, some of whom need nursery school and kindergarten experience more than others. Some home situations result in inferior habits of hearing, seeing and thinking. Research evidence indicates that many children from substandard homes are seriously handicapped in communication skills and find adjustment unnecessarily difficult in the ordinary middle-class oriented school. Teachers who are not fully aware of the situation will have trouble in communicating and in providing learning experiences at the growing edge of learning for these youngsters. Teachers with middle-class attitudes and values who do not have lower-class orientation and cannot accept other than middle-class children, can actually block learning. Teacher training should therefore be directed towards instilling this sort of understanding as one of its aims. Suitable films and tapes could be used in this.

The School

Para. XXVI The school is a creature of society which reflects the tacit or stated wishes of that society though with some lag. At the turn of the century one of its functions was the selection of those who would progress to its higher echelons. The aims of education were directed towards producing cultured individuals from those it found worthy, and secondly, towards preparing as many as necessary for the professions. True, there was some degree of snobbishness in this, but no one was unduly concerned as large percentages dropped out from grade five on with only the selected few reaching university. The schools were not blamed for this—they were to impart prescribed information and adjudge success with this. There was usually no problem of the dropouts finding manual or trade jobs. Blame was officially and unofficially imposed on children who, for one reason or another did not meet the standards as measured by examinations designed to test the acquisition of prescribed information and cognitive skills.

Para. XXVII The situation has changed drastically. In Quebec, for example, after the recent reorganization of the Department the first report of the Minister read: "The objective of the Quebec policy with regard to education is to assure to each one the maximum education of which he is capable and which corresponds both to his aptitudes and ambitions, regardless of his state of fortune or the place of residence of his family". Such a statement puts an entirely different emphasis on the function of the school and reflects new aims of education. To meet current demand the schools must be concerned with: awakening the child to cultural values; helping him to adjust normally to his environment; and preparing him for the later professional or technical training he must possess. It must stimulate and encourage him to cooperate with his fellows so as to be ready to help establish a civilization and culture for the glorification of man, while preserving the biosphere so that man's world will be a welcome home for generation after generation.

Para. XXVIII Although schools have for some time been adding courses and classes for atypical children they still have a long way to go in providing for individual differences inclusive of youth with strong and weak aptitudes, of which some are essentially cognitive and some are related to creativity and other abilities. For the disadvantaged the school may provide for: remedial instruction; cultural enrichment intended to expand normal school activities; and efforts to overcome anti-learning attitudes and frustration. Pre-school activities including training in verbal skills and cultural enrichment may be provided, most probably separate from the school system. The above statement does not state what is and what is not education. The School Act and Regulations may provide rules and regulations concerning the teaching of religion, political and racial beliefs, discipline measures deemed acceptable, etc. but each school has a great deal of elbow room without transgressing the prescribed limits within which teachers and classmates may bend or direct the intellectual growth of each pupil.

Para XXIX With a large majority of teachers interested in ensuring that all of their students do well and mature as well-rounded citizens, the teachers should have help in making diagnoses, in knowing how to deal with relatively uncomplicated personality and emotional problems, and in having someone to whom they can refer more difficult cases, whether frustrated, emotionally disturbed or otherwise needing special attention. Although considerable work has been undertaken in this area there is still need for further efforts.

Para. XXX We have noted that the school is limited in its contribution, not only because the home, the peer group, and other institutions of society such as the churches are important contributors; but because most of the time the school first sees the disadvantaged child at age 6 or 7 and has him in charge along with many others for perhaps 12 years, 200 days a year, and 5 hours a day. Here most of the time is given to a school routine related to a fairly fixed course of study, examinations, etc. By the time the child enters school the other institutions have already had an important influence on his development and this continues throughout his school career whether their sphere of influence works with the school or against it.

Pre-School and Post-School Education for the Disadvantaged

Para. XXXI If we consider education as a lifelong process in which instruction may be given within or without the regular school system and of which some is informal, some formal, some educators should be concerned with meshing the two. Early schooling is an important part of all conditions designed to facilitate intellectual development.

Para. XXXII Currently there are several theoretical positions which have important implications for early schooling. Some behavioral scientists contend that the first few years of life are a critical period for development as it proceeds in a sequential and invariant order, that is, in "stages" or "levels" and relates to hereditary potential and physical maturation in the development process. The work of Piaget, Montessori and others is particularly relevant here. They suggest that deficiencies in environmental stimulation and opportunities to learn can result in irreversible damage. Some others, however, regard the developmental process and cumulative with each succeeding increment or stage building from the previous one. Bruner, for example, considers that the development of human functioning reflects the mastery of techniques transmitted by the culture or sub-culture of which the child is a member. Language is the primary technique for intellectual development and plays a powerful role in knowing, representing and integrating. Language deficiency results in the production of a disadvantaged child.

Para. XXXIII Perhaps this is enough to suggest that there are several theoretical positions vying for general acceptance and considerable difference in projects and policies formulated according to which position is accepted. However, while all agree that what happens during the first six years is important, there is no agreement as to the possible vital importance of being exposed to a stimulating, dynamic, yet sympathetic environment during the first few weeks, or first year, or the desirability of nursery schools at age 3 and 4 with kindergarten at 5 and 6. There is also considerable evidence to indicate that we have underestimated the learning potential of the average child.

Para. XXXIV Since there are disadvantaged children in most schools, and special schools for the disadvantaged, the necessity of providing specialist teachers for the latter will normally be accepted—the first is often unrecognized. Certainly teachers reared in upper middle-class homes and schools with middle-class values can hardly be expected to understand lower-class youngsters. Their professional training of one year with emphasis on subject matter and methodology does little to prepare them for problems in what is to them an alien situation. Without emphasis on individual instruction and some appreciation of the problem, many disadvantaged will be pressured to become dropouts. For them there is no simple solution.

Para. XXXV Major efforts at the post-secondary level are essentially of the last two decades and have not yet reached their peak. These enlist high school graduates, non-matriculants, etc. Data from the U.S.A. show that greater numbers are enrolled in "schools" in the factories, stores and other such endeavour than in the formal education school system. In Canada numbers in community and junior colleges, trade and technical schools, and organized courses throughout the government, business and industry are rapidly rising. These courses may be pre-service, in-service, or other, and may be directed towards upgrading or rehabilitation.

Para. XXXVI Many of the courses mentioned above are of value to the disadvantaged, although perhaps those directed towards overcoming functional illiteracy and offering pre-service training are among the most important.

Para. XXXVII Although there are classes directed towards family education, it may be that greater efforts should be made in that direction, and in new ways, conducted by a new sort of social personnel using the newer media. There is considerable evidence to indicate that attempts to have youth bridge the gap from a setting with cultural ties to an alien "middle-class culture" may fail and be a frustrating experience ending in alienation and maladjustment.

Para. XXXVIIa The problem of comprehending learning disabilities of disadvantaged children and of finding compensatory programs requires a theoretical framework. Without such framework and the setting of goals we lack a basis for evaluating success of our efforts. Such a design might postulate that behavior patterns reflect the interaction of the individual and his environment, and that disadvantaged children live in an environment which fails to stimulate growth and produces unproductive and inappropriate behavior patterns and responses. The school can contribute to diagnosis and remediation of such responses and patterns. One problem in research is to identify needs and evaluate promising practices. There is need for more carefully designed studies, including those aimed at discovering methods and techniques suited to the disadvantaged pupil's way of life and his cultural milieu. The research undertaken should include both studies aimed at discovering basic information generally applicable, and applied studies which discover appropriate techniques for such special groups as those in marginal rural areas, those handicapped by language difficulties, Indians on reserves, etc.

Para. XXXVIII Opportunity for introducing special curricula for such minority groups as the underprivileged is today better than ever before as it comes at a time when there is a move towards providing suitable school offerings for all children.

Para. XXXIX Work in this area is going to cost money. Such efforts are not something teachers can undertake in addition to their regular duties, but an additional educational investment which can be expected to produce economic returns in the form of law-abiding, wealth-producing members of society. At the same time efforts should be aimed at reducing the number of misfits, unemployable youth, and anti-social problem cases. For the many law-abiding citizens who live at or near the subsistence level, it is hoped to provide more of the amenities of an opulent society. For younger children the aim is prevention, for older ones it is predominantly rehabilitation-oriented. Is this expecting too much of the schools and other social institutions?

Para. XL The Canadian Government has gone on record as favoring efforts towards the elimination of poverty and the helping of the large numbers of functionally illiterate who cannot meet job requirements of modern industry. Among other things, this assumes that more years at school will be reflected in a higher level of living and greater national prosperity. Educators are generally more concerned with individual development and the full life than economic adjustment. However, these objectives are not entirely in conflict. Nor are they necessarily opposed to society's wish to produce democratic law-abiding citizens.

Para. XLI Education has always been considered as strong medicine. Yet there is neither agreement as to just what education experiences should be offered, nor how they should be presented. It is here that research and development are most needed and should be incorporated into the on-going education process.

Para. XLII Current effort such as the survey by Dr. Ryan for the Vanier Institute and Economic Council and the NewStart program are valuable and represent desirable approaches. But they are not enough. There is need for a subsidized major mission-oriented program which makes provision for selecting and funding promising pilot projects and other research endeavour. Increasing numbers of researchers and developers could pool their findings and provide guidelines for still further endeavour.

Para. XLIII There is no quick or ready solution to poverty. If we are to help the disadvantaged we must see that they have more education. But before we can educate them we must first learn how to go about it. To make progress towards solving identified problems of the disadvantaged we must devise a coherent and effective approach which will integrate research and experimentation, diffusion and dissemination, and provide for evaluation.

Para. XLIV Work in this area could be interminable. Urgency in reaching even tentative solutions suggests that goals be set, plans be laid and ample funds be provided.

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Tuesday, October 28, 1969:

"The Honourable Senator Croll moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to investigate and report upon all aspects of poverty in Canada, whether urban, rural regional or otherwise, to define and elucidate the problem of poverty in Canada, and to recommend appropriate action to ensure the establishment of a more effective structure of remedial measures;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisors as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time;

That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to adjourn from place to place;

That the evidence taken on the subject during the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Bélisle, Carter, Cook, Croll, Eudes, Everett, Fergusson, Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), Hastings, Inman, Lefrançois, McGrand, Pearson, Quart, Roebuck and Sparrow.

After debate,

In amendment, the Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Burchill, that the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by striking out paragraph 4 thereof and substituting therefor the following:—

"That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to adjourn from place to place, and notwithstanding Rule 76 (4), to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate."

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion in amendment, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

The question being put on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck, as amended it was—

Resolved in the affirmative."

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

Clerk of the Senate.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

THURSDAY, June 4, 1970.

Pursuant to adjournment and notice the Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.00 a.m.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Croll, (Chairman); Fergusson, Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), Inman, Lefrançois, MacDonald (Queens), McGrand, Pearson and Quart. (9)

The Honourable Senator J. A. Sullivan, not a member of the Committee, was also present.

In attendance: Mr. Charles Askwith, Administrative Officer.

The following witnesses were heard:

Canadian Nurses' Association:

Dr. Helen K. Mussalem, Executive Director;
Miss Trenna Hunter, Past President.

Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada:

Miss Jean Leask, Director in Chief;
Miss M. Christine MacArthur, Assistant Director in Chief;
Mrs. Rita Egan, Chairman of the National Advisory Nursing Committee;
Mr. F. W. Troop, Treasurer.

The briefs submitted by the Canadian Nurses' Association and the Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada were ordered to be printed as appendices "A" and "B" respectively to these proceedings.

At 11.50 a.m. the Committee adjourned until Tuesday, June 9, 1970, at 9.30 a.m.

ATTEST:

Georges A. Coderre,
Clerk of the Committee.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Ontario.
Thursday, June 4, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9 a.m.

Senator David Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I will call the meeting to order. We have the Canadian Nurses' Association. On my right is Miss Trenna Hunter. She is the past president, and next to her is the very distinguished executive director, Dr. Helen Mussallem.

Would you please proceed.

Miss Trenna Hunter, Past President of the Canadian Nurses' Association: Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I would like first of all to express our appreciation from the Canadian Nurses' Association for this opportunity to present the brief.

Dr. Mussallem is with me and although she says I am to be the chief speaker and she the back-up person, I wish that it were reversed because she is in the position of being the Executive Director of the Canadian Nurses' Association. However, we are both happy to be here and to speak to the brief.

You have had the brief. I am sure that many of the observations and proposals in it are beginning to have a very familiar ring and you must have heard similar ones from a number of other groups.

In preparation for the submission of this brief, I undertook, as a former public health nursing director, to visit again in the homes of some of the poor in my city, to see whether or not the face of poverty has really changed since my last contacts with such groups.

I found that very little change had come about in the last few years. Poverty is still poverty with many of our people. I chose to visit in some of the poorer sections of the city and I asked if I might visit with a public health nurse.

The home that we went to was on the ground floor of a very dismal, unpainted,

2-storey house in a poor part of the city. The mother, who met us at the door, was young, in her 30's. She had been rather pretty but was beginning to be a little faded. She had six children. She was on social assistance and there was no husband in the picture.

When we went into the living room we found a cheerless room, dirty green walls—it seems to be in my observation the walls are always green in these poor homes—a very bare floor and very little furniture, a sagging chesterfield with the stuffing coming out of it, and this is typical too of a poor home. The chesterfields always sag.

In one corner was a television set turned on... it was the middle of the morning... and in the other was a wood-burning stove and the pile of wood in the corner took up a fair space in this poor room. There was no sign of a toy, a picture or a book or anything of this sort that would indicate that any of these things really mattered to people. A little round-faced pretty child of three was sitting on the chesterfield and at the moment the picture she was watching was a French cooking class. The child could recognize the flour and she said proudly to me "Flour, eggs" and so on as she watched the cooking class. I do not know how much she was getting out of it.

It was a dismal, cheerless place to be called home. The two girls in the family, 10 and 11, were going to a social adjustment class to try to see if something could be done about their lack of friends, and the fact that they were so unpopular at school and so unhappy at home, and the nurse was interested to hear the mother say that at last they were beginning to get a friend or two but it was not the sort of home that one would think of bringing any one home to or indeed that anyone would hurry home to; and illness had been constantly with one or another member of this family.

Now, there are thousands of similar families, some worse and some a little better off and they are scattered from the shores of Newfoundland right through this great country to some of the remote fishing villages in British Columbia.

You have heard about many of these and I am sure that you are well aware of the problems and feel deep concern for some of the solutions; and I thought as we reviewed our brief, we would try to remember we are really talking about people and families like this and not just about statistics.

Looking at the brief, on page 1...although I am not going to read very much of the brief, I want to review some of the recommendations here and add some examples possibly so that it will be a little more meaningful.

In our first summary we have indicated that the professional nurses of Canada are concerned with the total health care of individuals, not only individuals but family and community, and although most people, when thinking of nurses in our traditional role, think of the care of the sick, we think that it is of equal importance to think of the nurse in her role in the prevention of illness and maintenance of health.

There are a large number of professional nurses, 82,000 at the moment, and I think, Dr. Mussallem, there are many more than that who are actually nursing but are not members of the C.N.A. Is that right?

Dr. Helen K. Mussallem, executive director, Canadian Nurses' Association: There are about 130,000 registered nurses.

Miss Hunter: About 130,000 registered nurses, and by the very nature of our job as nurses, we are constantly exposed to various aspects of poverty. The very weight of our numbers and the fact that nurses are, of all the professions, probably closer to the patients, closer than the doctors, closer than the social workers and closer than other people in the helping profession, they have therefore greater knowledge maybe of the things that are happening to some of these people.

We could not begin to document all of the situations and so in our brief we have tried to set out only broad and general impressions.

An axiom of good medical or nursing care is to treat the cause rather than the symptoms and I think that is our appeal today, to try to think of the prevention of many of these illnesses.

However, when we come, as nurses, to think about some of the causes which are rooted in economic conditions, we feel that these are very much beyond the jurisdiction of nursing care and many non-responsive to the healing arts.

We know that we are making observations and recommendations that are costly and as we are not economists we do not feel competent to recommend how many of these costs should be met. We do believe, however, that the health of our population is of vital concern to the people of Canada. The cost of health service is rising and you are aware of the Task Forces' job of trying to do something about rising costs.

Looking at these figures again in 1957 the total bill for health care was $1.7 billion. In 1967 it had risen to $3.7 billions and in 1972 they expect it to be $6.2 billion, a rise of 10 per cent per year. No wonder that we must all look at the cost of health care.

It has been well documented in many studies that poverty is a major contributing cause to ill-health and certainly an impediment to the maintenance of good health. If we could do something about poverty as a contributing cause to ill-health, undoubtedly the total cost of health care could be decreased because we would have lesser numbers involved in the poverty programmes.

The nature of the recommendations we propose to make later in the brief are summarized in these first few pages, in three paragraphs really.

First: that provision be made for the education and effective use of more public health and other types of nurses as a means of preventing illness as well as speeding recovery; and that more effort be devoted to experiment to seek better methods of bringing health care—we have said—to the poor because our brief is about the poor but certainly we would feel that this was necessary for all segments of population, and that simultaneously greater efforts should be made to coordinate the knowledge and services of health and welfare agencies at the delivery level.

We are always concerned about duplication and fragmentation and too many people trying to do the same job with others being left out and thirdly that more consideration be given to establishing an economic level at which good health can be maintained, not only by the dependent poor, that is those already on some form of assistance, but also by the independent poor, whose meagre, but hard-won, savings from an earlier period in our economic history are depreciated by inflation.

In our brief then we have given something about the background of the Nurses' Association and you have read that, and we have gone on to a definition of poverty which we have taken, I am afraid, from somebody else's definition, and then we have tried to go in again to why Canadian nurses are concerned about poverty and health, a repetition of what I have just said.

On page 13 of the brief we have our recommendations in more detail and we have made statements in paragraph 48:

Professional nurses are not economists but they can be considered front line workers in helping those embedded in poverty to extricate themselves and to have opportunities to lead healthier lives.

And we are wondering whether or not this statement can be challenged or is this something that we can think about? There are large numbers of public health nurses—not nearly enough, of course—but of all the health professions probably they are the largest in round numbers and so their contacts are many and varied.

As I have said before, they are very close to the people they serve. Nurses are accepted. I am always surprised how well they are accepted in the homes of most of the people in their community. They have become well-known and people do turn to them for help. Could we then think of them as frontline workers?

Now, I think I need not go any further in going over the brief but both Dr. Mussallem and I would be glad to add to any of the points raised or offer some illustrations of some of the things that we mean.

The Chairman: Doctor, have you anything to add?

Dr. Mussallem: No, thank you.

The Chairman: I have Senator Fergusson, Senator Fournier and Senator Quart and Senator Inman.

Senator Fergusson: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. We are certainly very grateful to the Canadian Nurses' Association for coming before us and giving us their help and the knowledge that they have is certainly very specialized because they are not theorists. They are meeting the very people that we are hoping to help and I found the brief most interesting.

There are a great many things I would like to ask but I thought I would like to ask you one thing about Alberta. You spoke about Alberta in paragraph 33. You say:

Alberta has provided us with one example of good institutional care for the elderly...

and certainly from our studies and from what you have said the elderly are a large proportion of the people that need help.

Would you tell us a little bit more about what they do in Alberta and what their programme is.

Miss Hunter: I am not as familiar with this as I might be and I do not know whether Dr. Mussallem is, but they do have very good residences for their elderly people.

Senator Fergusson: Do you think that is the way to take care of them?

Miss Hunter: That is part of it. Personally I think that elderly people should be maintained in their own homes as long as they possibly can be, with the kind of help that they need; home-making services, housekeepers who can come in and help for a few hours, such programmes as Meals on Wheels, for those who temporarily cannot provide meals for themselves, visiting nurses services for help they may need in that way if they are ill and in all ways they should be maintained at home as long as possible.

Then I think housing is the next thing for them at some sort of rent that they can afford. This is one of our problems. And then they also need attached or available some kind of nursing facilities should they become ill and no longer able to stay in that kind of facility and that Alberta has too; so that they can move from the housing into a nursing institution or hospital, if you like, and back into their home again.

Senator Fergusson: All part of the same complex.

Miss Hunter: Yes, yes.

Senator Fergusson: They are not going to a strange place?

Miss Hunter: Yes, that is right.

The Chairman: Doctor, do you know anything about it particularly?

Dr. Mussallem: I could not add anything more than what Miss Hunter has said.

The Chairman: What they do have to my knowledge is that they have what they call cottage housing—no high-rises—four or five in the family and in a community with medical services and other services available in that immediate community. It is sort of a community of its own.

Senator Sullivan: Mr. Chairman, you remember Senator Gershaw spoke on that when they were beginning a few years ago.

Senator Fergusson: And do they not have a community kitchen?

The Chairman: Yes, but go ahead, Senator Fergusson. We will all add to it as we go along.

Senator Fergusson: For instance, you mentioned Meals on Wheels. This is something in which I have been greatly interested for years and I know from having visited some of these places in all parts of Canada, they are all, as far as I can recall, volunteer organizations that are doing it.

Why I am asking you this question is that in New Zealand I saw it being done and the only voluntary part that was being done was the delivery of the meals to the patients, or clients, whatever you call them, but everything else was done by the government.

Do you think this should be government-supported or do you think we should let it continue as voluntary, or do you think perhaps doing it in a voluntary way is sort of pioneering and perhaps if we could sell the idea well enough, the government might take it over?

Miss Hunter: My experience with Meals on Wheels is that it is voluntary too.

Senator Fergusson: That is mine, too.

Miss Hunter: But the meals are paid for by the individual.

Senator Fergusson: Yes.

Miss Hunter: At cost, of course.

Senator Fergusson: Yes, but there is always some expense for administration.

Miss Hunter: Yes. As a matter of fact I was delivering Meals on Wheels myself last Friday as a volunteer in our community because it is a church organization that does the actual work of delivery and it certainly fills a real need for a number of people.

Now, whether or not government should be doing it I think is difficult to say at this time.

Senator Fergusson: It is quite a burden on the volunteer organizations to have to undertake it because if you undertake it you cannot do it for a little while and then drop it.

Miss Hunter: No.

Senator Fergusson: You have to keep on.

Miss Hunter: No. It takes dedicated people to keep it going. I have also visited Meals on Wheels programmes in England and it was volunteer effort there but they had volunteers cooking the meals too, and I think that is more difficult.

I think if you make some arrangement whereby you are using a set-up that is there already, like a restaurant or some such service...

Senator Fergusson: Some of them do cook for them. Down in Fredericton where I live they cook them themselves.

Miss Hunter: Yes. It is hard to maintain that interest always, I think, and therefore maybe it would be wise to have some help from government.

Senator Fergusson: But it is quite a popular thing to appeal to people, is it not?

Miss Hunter: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: I remember in New Zealand people told me that sometimes people only had a turn. You know, there were so many volunteers who were willing to do this. Perhaps I would only have two days this week and not again until six weeks from now.

Miss Hunter: Yes, that is right.

Senator Fergusson: But the people were so keen about it, they would say "Do not let me lose my place because I want to keep it. My husband will come down and do it, if it is necessary."

Miss Hunter: It is a service which seems to appeal to volunteers.

Senator Fergusson: And a valuable service, I would think, too.

Senator Quart: May I just have a supplementary on this? In England, where we were living, the WBS pioneered that and I visited with them many of these places, but I know in Canada your VON, who will be here later, do it in some places too.

Now, Senator Fergusson mentioned about the volunteers versus government. Now, I know meals are being cooked in one locality by restaurant caterers who charge so much to the customer. Now, if the government took this service over as delivering meals, let us say, would it not be the next step to say "Well, we want the meals for nothing"? And do you not think that the volunteers do just a little more for the patient in many other ways? Just by saying "I will do a message for you" or I will do this extended service for the party to whom they deliver the meal, the elderly person or whatever it is.

Now, I may be very wrong, but do you not think that if somebody was paid to do the job, let us say, they would do the job of delivering and then it would stop there. They would not take on any additional services, whereas the volunteer is not paid. She is doing it through dedication of some sort, that she will follow on and probably help that person in a much greater way.

I know it has been done in one community. When the person recovered sufficiently not to want Meals on Wheels, they found her a job.

The paid person would not do that, in my opinion.

Miss Hunter: I like the idea of the volunteer help doing it, I must say.

Senator Fergusson: I do not entirely agree with that because I think many nurses are very dedicated people.

Senator Quart: Oh, yes.

Senator Fergusson: If they saw the need they would also follow it up.

Senator Quart: Oh, yes, I agree there too.

The Chairman: Go ahead, Senator Fergusson.

Senator Fergusson: I did mention the fact that nurses are the people that really come in contact with the part of our citizens who are suffering from poverty, but you know, most of the nurses do not come from that area. Is there any problem about the fact that the nurses usually are not from the same socioeconomic background as the poor? Does it make for lack of understanding?

Miss Hunter: Lack of educational opportunities?

Senator Fergusson: No, I am thinking about the nurses.

Miss Hunter: So that they themselves becomes nurses. Is that what you mean?

The Chairman: No, that is not what was meant.

Senator Fergusson: No, it is the other way around. I am wondering if it is harder on the nurses who have never had this background to understand the problems of the poor people. Do you find that at all. Is there a feeling at all of people saying: "It is their own fault if they are poor, they could do better."

Miss Hunter: The fact that they might be trying to impose their standards, you mean, from their own personal background?

Senator Fergusson: And whether it is difficult for the nurse.

Miss Hunter: Yes. I do not know that it is difficult. As a matter of fact being a director of nursing for some years and having to decide where nurses would work in an area—a great number of people prefer to work with the poor because they feel there is so much they can do in helping them more than they can with the middle class or upper class people.

No, I do not think it is a problem.

Senator Fergusson: I just wondered if you had found that at all. That is all right, then. Thank you.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman, I have three short questions this morning but I will come back later. The witness has said there are approximately 130,000 nurses in Canada and in your Association you have 82,000. Where are the other 48,000? Why do they not belong?

Miss Hunter: Dr. Mussallem will explain about the registration.

Dr. Mussallem: Actually, this is in the Province of Ontario. In the other provinces members that apply for registration and become registered nurses are also members of their association.

In the Province of Ontario you can be registered at the College of Nurses of Ontario without becoming a member of the Registered Nurses Association of Ontario, which is one of the ten Federated groups of the Canadian Nurses' Association.

Senator Fournier: Well, I do not know if I understood the answer plainly but I still come back to my first question. You have 130,000 registered nurses?

Dr. Mussallem: That is right.

Senator Fournier: And in your Association you have 82,000 members.

Dr. Mussallem: Yes.

Senator Fournier: Where are the other 48,000?

Senator Sullivan: Married and have children.

Dr. Mussallem: No. The other 40,000 registered nurses are in Ontario. They do not belong to the Canadian Nurses' Association. They are licensed to practise nursing as a registered nurse and they have chosen not to belong to the Registered Nurses Association of Ontario.

Senator Fournier: Do you have the same situation in all ten provinces?

Dr. Mussallem: No, it is unique to Ontario.

Senator Fournier: All right. Now, next question is: as I understand it in your Association your nurses are working mostly in hospitals.

Dr. Mussallem: Yes, roughly 80 per cent, Senator.

Senator Fournier: ... Are in the hospitals.

Dr. Mussallem: ... Are in the hospital service, that is right.

Senator Fournier: And the others are providing home care and are they on the road and in the field?

Miss Hunter: They are working in various other fields. If you look at paragraph 37, there are 7,900 nurses engaged in public health work in Canada and there are others working in industries, in doctor's offices, for example, and in various kinds of clinics and outpatients services and many other places besides hospitals.

Dr. Sullivan: Giving the doctors advice?

Senator Fournier: The other question is: you mentioned, I think, in your statement that in the last five years you have seen very little change as far as the poor were concerned?

Miss Hunter: Yes.

Senator Fournier: I would like you to elaborate on that because of the fact that we have spent so much money on welfare. Is not all this money reaching the right people? Where is it going? With all the money that has been spent all across the country for welfare, you would think you would have seen some improvement with the poor when it comes to health, and then you mentioned the case where you visited the home.

Miss Hunter: Yes.

Senator Fournier: I can visualize this home as you saw it. Now, I was wondering whether if you added a few more hundred dollars to this home you would improve the situation or would it be a case where sometimes the woman in charge of the home has a tendency to let everything go? That may be the way you find them. Would more money resolve the situation if you gave another $500?

Miss Hunter: More money alone, no. I don't think so, not alone. I think many other factors enter into it. I think they need more education, more help with managing homes. Some women just do not manage well and they need assistance to help them to learn.

For example, their knowledge about how best to shop. How best to spend their food dollars, how to get the most for their money for their children. These things they have to learn. It is not always nursing that can do this kind of job, but some kind of help in the home. No, not money alone. They need other things as well.

Your first part of the question: is the money going to the right people? Well, I cannot answer that. I think it is going to the people who have demonstrated the need for financial help but there are also many other people who are not on any kind of welfare. They have no social assistance. They are what we call the independent poor. They are either under-employed or they are not working enough to have a sufficient income, but not as much as if they were on social assistance. They still would rather work than accept any kind of social assistance.

There are some of the other independent poor, the people trying to live on old age pensions alone, the people who have had savings and just trying to get by on that amount of money and these people do not have the additional aids they would have had they been on social assistance.

For example, in the Province of British Columbia these people on social assistance have medical coverage—well, I guess other people have medical coverage now—but along with medical coverage, should they require a prescription for medications, that is provided for them. They can get glasses. They can get appliances of various sorts, whereas the independent poor person who has no medical coverage of that kind—true, now as I say, most provinces have medical coverage. They can get their doctor paid for but they cannot get their medications paid for nor some of the other appliances paid for.

So, they struggle along, you know, trying. The price of various things has gone up so I feel their plight is no better than it was five years ago and sometimes worse because of the general cost of living increase.

Senator Fournier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I pass.

Senator Quart: Miss Hunter, in your brief at pages 9 and 10, paragraphs 28 and 29, you say we ought to capitalize on the concern of poverty groups and make use of their natural leaders to teach basic health practices and worth with public health agencies.

Now in mentioning this I am really thinking more about the Indians than the poverty group and is it not true that the most vociferous and influential of these leaders, especially those of the Indians, want nothing to do with government departments and agencies?

I received a letter—maybe you know her—from Mrs. Celia Pope of Toronto. I have been corresponding with her for years regarding these things, but she mentioned in connection with some of the attitudes taken, particularly by Indians, would it not be a great advantage rather to use the St. Yvettes Co-operative as a sort of starting point to get them doing their own things and all this sort of thing?

Also does the Canadian Nurses' Association encourage Indian girls to become nurses as well as the males to become male nurses? I had the opportunity last week of seeing one graduate at Cornwall and there is a real field for that and would probably take some of them off the unemployment list.

Miss Hunter: Certainly, I would think...

Senator Quart: Is there any manner or means where you contact any of these Indian girls maybe to become nurses?

Miss Hunter: I think there are Indian students, are there not?

Dr. Mussallem: Yes.

Miss Hunter: In every province probably.

Dr. Mussallem: The opportunity is available for all, and there are a number of Indian girls that are in schools of nursing across the country and of course they have to meet the educational requirement.

This has been a problem in the past, but I understand it is improving. I would also like to mention that a good many of the provinces have made a concerted effort to attract more men into nursing. Unfortunately the percentage has risen very slowly as far as Canadian male graduates are concerned. I think about 50% or more of the men now practising nursing in Canada have graduated from outside Canada; Great Britain or one of the other countries.

Senator Quart: Are there many male nurses in Canada?

Dr. Mussallem: Yes, I can give you the exact figure, if you wish. I think there are around 500. It is a very small percentage of the total practising and that number is rising very slowly.

The Chairman: How does that compare with the percentage in other countries?

Dr. Mussallem: It is slightly lower than the United States and much lower than France and England.

Senator Fournier: Could you give us the reason for that?

Dr. Mussallem: The reasons are hard to give, Mr. Chairman. One makes generalizations. I would suggest there are cultural reasons. There are different opportunities for men in Canada.

In discussing it with individuals, if you could generalize, just on casual observation, it appears that being a nurse is not considered in Canada at this moment just quite the appropriate occupation for a man, but this would be a personal observation.

Senator Fournier: Is money a factor in that?

Dr. Mussallem: Money is not as much a factor at this time as it was 5 or 10 years ago, although it has some bearing.

Senator Quart: There was an article about this male nurse at Cornwall and would it be because the training period would be perhaps one male nurse with probably 75 or 80 women.

Would it be possible to have training for them, if you have sufficient numbers, even across Canada, to have them trained together rather than with the girls? I do not know, I think their feeling would be not to want to train with the girls but probably that is one of the reasons because I spoke with this gentleman and I told him he was "Blessed art thou amongst women" because he was the only one. I said to him "Are you going to miss them?" He said "Look, I am so happy to be rid of them, I am going to sneak out by the back door," so I was wondering if that would be a factor.

Dr. Mussallem: It is a factor, Senator Quart, but they are allowed to choose their own school. Some of them choose to go where they may have a friend going. Others of them have gone through on their own but the numbers are still very small.

Senator Inman: Well, Mr. Chairman, I too would like to congratulate the nurses for contributing this brief to us. It is most interesting and most informative with regard to the question of our study on poverty.

On the first page, in speaking about the 82,000 nurses for our 21 million people, what better inducement could you suggest to induce people to train to be nurses? We know there is a shortage of nurses and girls are not going in for it like they did a few years ago. Have you any suggestions to supplement that and to attract them to the profession?

Miss Hunter: Again I think this is Dr. Mussallem's field more.

Dr. Mussallem: You are quite right in saying that the percentage of young women going into or choosing nursing as a career is dropping. The absolute numbers are increasing. There were over 10,000 young women and men who entered our schools of nursing last year.

You mentioned a shortage of nurses and I think at this time and women in history we have to look at these words rather carefully. Over the past three years in the major cities across Canada and in some of the smaller cities as well, there has been reported to us something for which we were unprepared, and that is that there were no staff positions available for nurses.

Now, it may be termed over-supply. It may be termed a poor supply, but in such provinces even now where we thought there would always be a shortage, such as Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, they are reporting that in their major cities they have more nurses than can be employed.

We are not suggesting that if there were more nurses, and there are more nurses, that they should be employed, but for all the budget positions available through from Vancouver to Montreal and across, a staff nurse at this moment cannot get a position.

Now, you talk about shortages and again among Canadians where you make a positive statement you can always dispute it.

In the outlying areas, the least desirable, shall we say, living areas for young women there is a shortage. They are unable to attract them. Your question: should we not be attracting more nurses or what can we do to induce rather more students to enter schools of nursing, I think we have to take a serious look at the situation at this time. This has developed very quickly.

Senator Fournier: May I ask a supplementary question?

The Chairman: Please just one moment. Let the doctor finish her story for the moment because she is getting into it.

Senator Fournier: I thought she had. I am sorry.

Dr. Mussallem: Yes. Well, actually this is one of the areas in which we are now working with one of the sections in the government, the Manpower group, in order to find valid statistics to make sure that this is the situation and if it is, we would hope that there would be new programmes opened up so that there would be more available nursing positions, but I know again this goes back to economic programmes and to the provinces.

Senator Fournier: I would like to clarify this point. I am not a doctor or a professional person. I am just a common layman, but when I go to a hospital I understand, from my point of view, that a nurse is somebody who is going to take care of me on a sick bed, and you mentioned that many nurses could not find staff positions. What is a staff nurse? Is she the one that actually works with the patients or is she in the administration business? It makes a difference with me.

Dr. Mussallem: Yes. Thank you for asking the question. A staff nurse is a term that we use that is the first level position and the person who works at the bedside, if it is in the hospital. A person may be called a staff nurse in the community as well. This is a common term and this is where there are no vacancies.

There are, however, many vacancies in the head nurse, supervisory director of nursing positions in hospitals but a staff nurse is sometimes called a general duty nurse, a variety of names.

The Chairman: A patient nurse.

Dr. Mussallem: Yes.

Senator Sullivan: Mr. Chairman, I will only be brief. You made a statement that you thought there were fewer staff positions. Now, with the nursing sisters of St. Josephs and the different hospitals that they have had all over the country, there are fewer and fewer sisters occupying staff positions in the hospitals today and there are more positions open for staff nurses as a result of that.

Now, how do you correlate what you said with that particular finding? I can see that definitely with St. Michael's Hospital, St. Joseph's Hospital. I could name you a dozen.

Dr. Mussallem: Mr. Chairman, I did not wish to imply when I used the words "there are fewer staff positions..." There are a limited number of staff positions. I am not suggesting that the numbers have been reduced. If I could just re-state my comment: at the present time in these major cities across Canada there are no openings for nurses who seek employment as staff nurses. I am not suggesting that they have cut down the numbers but we have an oversupply of nurses, if you want to put it that way.

Senator Inman: Well now, to go a little further with this. I come from Prince Edward Island which, as you know, is a very small province and mostly rural. I am a great admirer of nurses. There is one thing we have been finding down there, and that is, it is very difficult to get a nurse to go to the country to nurse in the home.

Now, they used to do that a great deal. Today they do not want to do it. Could you comment on that a bit.

Miss Hunter: Yes. I think that is somewhat what Dr. Mussallem was saying. There are no positions in the major centres but there are vacancies in the outlying areas of every province, both in the public health field and I am sure in small hospitals and it is like everything else. You know, the lawyers, the doctors and various other professional people seem to want to not go out to the furthest reaches of our country.

The Chairman: At this point, Doctor, is the income, broadly, for nurses being maintained or has it been increased? Is it the income that is troubling them?

Dr. Mussallem: In the outlying areas or generally?

The Chairman: Generally.

Dr. Mussallem: I think if I could make a general statement, over the past five to ten years nurses' salaries have improved. There is no doubt about that and no question about that, and it is all documented. The problem perhaps is, and again it is a generalization, that nurses were rather reluctant to press for higher salaries until quite recently and people tell us—again, this is not my quotation but what other people have said—we are ten years late in starting, so that when salaries are increased this time it adds such a heavy burden to the health costs that hospitals and many agencies cannot cope with this.

Whether or not nurses are paid sufficiently for the responsibility they have and the education is a moot point. I think we could argue all day on that.

The Chairman: I was not asking that. That is their business.

Miss Hunter: May I just interrupt for a moment? I do not think I quite answered Senator Inman. I am always surprised, though, Senator Inman, with the fact that you can eventually fill positions in some of the remotest areas.

I work on the Committee of the Canadian Red Cross that is responsible for the outpost hospital nursing service in the far parts of the country, and I am just intrigued with the kind of job that those nurses do in the outpost hospitals where there is no medical person anywhere near except by radio-telephone, and they have to fly their patients out or get them by boat.

They always seem to be able to fill those positions eventually with the most venturesome kind of nurses who like this pioneer kind of work.

I think with our Indian and Northern Health Services—sure, they have vacancies every so often but they do eventually fill those positions.

Senator Inman: I was thinking really in a case where we will say there is a woman who is very ill on a farm and perhaps for some reason—she has a lot of young children—does not want to leave her home and it is difficult (and this I know from experience)—it is very difficult to get a nurse to go out there.

Miss Hunter: Yes, I see, to stay.

Senator Inman: But they used to do this.

Miss Hunter: Yes, that is true.

The Chairman: Senator, did you ever try to get a doctor to go out?

Senator Sullivan: You can't even get a doctor.

Senator Fergusson: Dr. McGrand always did.

The Chairman: Senator McGrand's kind have gone but he is here.

Senator Inman: I have another question. In an ordinary community of four or five thousand people, how many nurses would you think should be there to serve a community like that; that is, just for ordinary living?

Miss Hunter: Are you thinking of nurses staffing hospitals or public health nurses?

Senator Inman: I was thinking of public health nurses.

Miss Hunter: In a community of four or five thousand people. Again, so much depends on what you expect of the public health nurse. Is she to do the home nursing and bedside care as well as it come up. Is she to do the school nursing? Is she to do the prenatal clinic?

It depends; so it is hard to set a ratio.

Many years ago I think our American counterparts undertook to set a ratio of public health nursing to population. I said it has been one of the things I have been troubled about all these years because they set a figure and everybody sort of took that figure, and regardless of what they were expecting of them, they stuck to this figure and said, "One nurse to five thousand." It was quite unrealistic in many cities, depending on many factors. Has she a long way to travel; is it a city area; and what is she expected to do? So I think it is hard to set a ratio for that reason. It is depending on what you expect of her.

Senator Inman: On page 20 you speak about educational programming. How many trained leaders are there in this program?

Miss Hunter: Is this the particular one for the Northern Health Services that you are speaking of?

Senator Inman: Community.

Miss Hunter: On Appendix 5, yes.

Senator Inman: Yes. The medical services branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Miss Hunter: I do not know how many. The reference is in the medical services branch on the next page there of the Department of National Health and Welfare. I do not think it is a great number at all but it is certainly a start and they are very pleased with the way this program has taken on.

Senator Inman: It is an excellent program and I was wondering how people are taking to it.

Miss Hunter: I think very well from what they report.

Senator Inman: Then on page 22 you speak about grants. Are there many candidates for these grants:

That the Council conduct and provide grants for research in the medical, biological, and related sciences...

Miss Hunter: Again, Dr. Mussallem I think I can speak to the candidates for such bursaries as we have, the ones that we do have.

Dr. Mussallem: All I can say, Mr. Chairman and senator, is that very few nurses have qualified or have received money from these grants. This is one of the great problems facing us in nursing today in Canada, to provide advance preparation for nurses for leadership positions and I would just say parenthetically that Canadian nurses have set up a foundation into which they put money to grant scholarships.

There are Dominion-Provincial matching grants as well as grants by a variety of agencies, but the grants from this Council I would have to say to date have been zero insofar as granting to a nurse per se. Some have gotten them from other means.

Senator Inman: You speak of public health nurses and you mention the load is very heavy on them and I know that, too, from personal experience.

What would you think of having a nurse's aid as we call them, or nurse's assistant with them to help?

Miss Hunter: Yes, I think...

Senator Inman: Is there any possibility of that?

Miss Hunter: I think this is being done in many centres, Senator Inman, yes; nursing assistants and nursing aids to do a lot of the clerical, maybe routine housekeeping kind of jobs that no longer need be done by the professionally-trained person.

Yes, that is done.

Senator Inman: Well, is there anything being done to induce nurses to go into the public health field? What induces them to go in the first place?

Miss Hunter: What does? Well, I suppose, again, a variety of reasons. I hope that many of them go into it because they feel prevention is more important than cure—not more important, but that we should be spending a good deal more time on prevention than on curing.

Senator Inman: And they are also interested in people.

Miss Hunter: They also like the freedom of working rather more independently and getting right out into the homes of the people rather than seeing the people when they are in the hospital bed and ill. That is one of the reasons.

I suppose other reasons would be desire to do this kind of work as against the more formal setting of the hospital walls. That is part of it, and they may have many other reasons.

Senator Inman: Well, with the guaranteed annual income, in a way, if that did happen, it would make the work of the public health nurse a little easier and she may find not such bad conditions perhaps in the homes she has to see and work with now.

Miss Hunter: Certainly lack of income is a real problem.

Senator Inman: Do you think that would be a good thing?

Miss Hunter: Lack of income, from whatever source, is a real problem when you are trying to help people solve their health problems.

Advising people to have dental work done, for example, for the children when there is no hope of paying for it is certainly rather frustrating.

Senator Inman: Well, it must be very discouraging for public health nurses and I know this because I have been along with them sometimes and gone into the homes to find that there is just nothing there; not even enough food for the next meal.

Miss Hunter: This is true.

Senator Inman: Now, the guaranteed annual income may help them to a great extent.

Miss Hunter: I would think so. An income from some source is certainly going to be helpful but I do not think it is the whole answer as we said earlier. I think they have to have education and help of other kinds.

Senator McGrand: You referred earlier in your remarks to two girls, ten and twelve, or so, who were attending a social adjustment class.

Miss Hunter: Yes.

Senator McGrand: Now, of course, I can understand there are many reasons for this sort of thing going on. Would you give your personal opinion and list in order of importance the things that lead to this sort of thing, because, to me, it is part of the culture of poverty, is it not?

What are the most important things that cause this sort of thing in these homes?

Miss Hunter: I am not sure what you mean by "causes."

Senator McGrand: You referred to two girls that were attending social adjustment classes.

Miss Hunter: Yes. I think I understand the question. The reasons why these children would need this kind of treatment.

Senator McGrand: Yes. How did they get that way?

Miss Hunter: Well, again, one would almost have to be a psychologist or a psychiatrist to understand the behaviour of children or why these two children needed and other children would not need attention.

Senator McGrand: Well, it is something that grows up in the environment?

Miss Hunter: Yes.

Senator McGrand: ...in which they are in.

Miss Hunter: Yes.

Senator McGrand: I understand. Now, we have been told that the poor of the nation is about 20 per cent of the total population but they represent about 75 per cent of illnesses.

Miss Hunter: Yes.

Senator McGrand: What proportion of our hospital beds are occupied by these people that represent 75% of the illnesses? Have you any idea about that?

Miss Hunter: I do not think there is any way one could say.

Senator McGrand: Well, tell me this. How adequate is the medical care in these slum areas of our cities? We have had these people before us and they have told us a long story, how they cannot get medical care—of course, they thought a doctor should come to their house and see them whether they had any money or not. They did not understand just how they could work their way out of this thing but how adequate is the care of these people in the slum areas?

Miss Hunter: Again, I suppose it depends on where the slum area is of the city or of the town or what part of the country it is in, but I think many people now, with the advent of medical care plans across this country that we have had in the last few years, would think that takes care of the poor. They have got this coverage. They can get to their doctor. But that is not always true because...

Senator McGrand: That is what I want.

Miss Hunter: ...availability is one thing, is it not; and accessibility is another?

Just to illustrate, for example, I went with a Chinese nurse some time ago when we were talking about this whole matter of poverty, and she works in our Chinatown.

The Chairman: In Vancouver?

Miss Hunter: In Vancouver; and she said this man that she was following up happened to be a tuberculosis case who should report to the Central Clinic for his diagnostic X-rays and this little Chinese nurse said to me, "You know, it is just about as hopeful for me to get that old Chinese gentleman who lives in one of the rooming houses to go up to the Willow Chest Centre for X-rays as it is for him to go on a trip to China."

She said he never moves away more than three blocks from his home where he lives. He does not know how to take a bus. He does not know how to get to it. So there is availability. He has got the clinic but how to get people to use it?

Senator McGrand: Well, I can understand that with a Chinese who lives in a certain environment. I am thinking of people in Ottawa and downtown Toronto in the slum areas; these are the people we have had before us. And they tell us this pitiful tale that they cannot get medical care.

I wonder if there is any basis for it, or is it just a complaint?

Miss Hunter: Well, no. I think there is a basis for it and I think there need not be. My illustration happened to be of another race with a different language, but I think it is true about many other people.

One thing, they get very apathetic about their own ills, do they not? They do not want to get out and really seek care.

Senator McGrand: They have impetigo; they have other skin diseases. They have allergies, perhaps more than other people. They perhaps have malnutrition and they have a lot of respiratory diseases.

Miss Hunter: Yes.

Senator McGrand: Viruses, pneumonias, or whatever you want to call them. Now, prevention, of course, is better than cure, if you can get it. In your experience how adequate is this care that is available to them? How adequate is it in these areas?

I was going to ask you this. Is it more home nurses going in to see them for an hour like the VON does...

Miss Hunter: Yes.

Senator McGrand: Or for half an hour or an hour. Now, to have established in these slum areas a small community health centre where they can go and meet these people. Now, a lot of these people feel out of place when they go to the large hospital.

Miss Hunter: That is right.

Senator McGrand: They feel out of place. They feel they are not wanted. That is the problem.

Miss Hunter: That is very true.

Senator McGrand: What is the answer to this question of rejection?

Miss Hunter: I think that you have given one of the ideas certainly, what they call storefront clinics or neighbourhood centres or something of that sort. We certainly should be experimenting with that type of program I think because it is very hard to get people to these services.

Senator McGrand: Then I have just one more question.

The Chairman: Wait, senator. You asked one question and we must get the answer. You asked Miss Hunter her view as to how adequate was the service or the availability of service to the poor. I think it is important to get an answer to that.

Senator McGrand: Well, she has given an answer. She has satisfied me.

Miss Hunter: Well, again, I do not think you can generalize. I think in some areas it is adequate and in some of our rural areas of the country I suppose it is not adequate, because it is not available to them. It is too hard to get to. I think there is just no answer for the whole of Canada in that regard.

The Chairman: Well, with the medical services and the hospital services that we have, our general concept was that they would be available to people of this country in the full.

Now, where are we failing? Are we not able to do it or have we got the services where the people are not?

Miss Hunter: Sometimes they are not decentralized enough for the people to use them. I think that is part of it and that is what Senator McGrand is saying. We need them closer to the people; that is one thing.

The Chairman: Well, let us leave the rural areas for the moment.

Miss Hunter: Well, in the cities, too?

The Chairman: In the cities, too.

Miss Hunter: I mean in the cities, too.

The Chairman: Well, what do you mean exactly? Take your City of Vancouver.

Miss Hunter: Yes.

The Chairman: And tell us what you would have changed to make it available.

Miss Hunter: Again, as I say, I would have some of these services decentralized into a community, into an area, into a shopping centre, for example, where people go instead of having them travel too far for them.

If you have an appointment for a small child in a family and you have a little troupe of pre-school children and you have to get not only the sick child but your little group of children all the way to a clinic or a doctor's office across the city, it is not easy for mothers to do that.

The Chairman: The Medical Association were here last week and said exactly that.

Miss Hunter: Yes; and to decentralize more.

The Chairman: But so far in our tours of the country we only found one store-front clinic in the whole country.

Miss Hunter: I know.

The Chairman: This is not a new problem. It has been there for some time and we have only found one. We had them here before us last week and this is not a new need. Is there anything you nurses are doing about it?

Miss Hunter: Well, I think that we have tried, in our public health work, to work with some of these people who are fearful and who are needing the medical help and medical care and just cannot get to it, but this takes a long time and this is why one of my appeals here is for more staff to work with hard-core families.

In one area development program, which is this business of decentralizing into an area, we found that you had to make many, many visits to one family in order to get them on their way towards medical care that they needed and not always do you have the time to spend doing it but part of it is this, trying to get them motivated, to get out and look after their illness, whatever it is.

Senator McGrand: I will finish in this way. You mean, to use an expression, instead of taking the patient to the hospital, you take the hospital facilities to the patient?

Miss Hunter: Partly, yes.

Senator McGrand: In selected areas?

Miss Hunter: Yes.

Senator McGrand: Within a reasonable distance of the hospital, a sort of travelling—I would not use the word "travelling clinic"— but you take the services there in the store-front.

Miss Hunter: Yes. I think more of that needs to be done.

The Chairman: Well, what the psychiatrist said—what was his name?

Senator Sullivan: Capon.

The Chairman: What he said in effect was, what you have to have is a supermarket approach in these areas for the medical care.

Senator Sullivan: He wanted you to do that before you brought in this report.

The Chairman: That was his view and we felt that he was pretty well on the ball.

Senator Pearson: I was talking to a rural practitioner about medical care in Saskatchewan. After we got Medicare going in Saskatchewan, there has been a gradual cutting-down by the province of all the little hospitals we had around the country.

In the pioneer days of Saskatchewan there was a doctor about every 15 miles so there was available medical services there but now it is all concentrated in the cities or in the large community centres; that is, 50 miles apart, say.

You are talking about spreading the thing out so that you can get in touch with the people rather than concentrating it now.

Miss Hunter: Yes. I am not thinking of hospitals, though, senator. I am thinking of the screening.

Senator Pearson: Yes. But could they use those hospitals for the nursing services to work out from there; not just the medical? I do not wish doctors to be there but nurses to be located there so they could give service to a large community from that area.

Miss Hunter: You mean over and above your rural health unit offices?

Senator Pearson: Yes, that is right.

Miss Hunter: Yes.

Senator Pearson: Or combine them. The other point I would like to make is that there is a lot of care needed in the small towns in rural areas of older people or even out on their farms, et cetera. They cannot get the services at all. They refuse to move from their homes because they are older people and they have lived there all their lives, and it is almost an impossibility in the country to get these people services of any kind, and yet they have to have them. They have to have day care in some cases that you cannot get in a little town.

Could it not be that you could train a number of your unemployed people to give just house care and give them a uniform so they appear as an official?

This would help out the welfare people themselves by just giving them those duties. I do not think you need a full nursing training program but enough training to be able to look after some of these elderly people in their homes.

Miss Hunter: I would not limit it to getting the unemployed to do that, senator. I think this idea of home-makers is an excellent idea.

Senator Pearson: I think if you get down to the people who are on the welfare side, that is the younger ones in the welfare families, get them a temporary sort of a job like this with a uniform where they are knowledgeable; they have to be trained by nurses to know what they are doing.

Miss Hunter: In many countries of the world, particularly Finland and Northern Scandinavian countries, they do have visiting home-makers on the staff of the health departments, just as they have nurses and other personnel, and they do give this kind of the very thing you are saying. So many hours maybe or longer if the person needs them and I think it is an excellent idea to have an extended home-maker service; not professionally trained but with training, yes.

That is a very good idea.

Senator Pearson: But you have to have recognition by giving them a uniform.

Miss Hunter: Yes, exactly. They are on the staff and they receive their payment from the same source as other public health people do.

Senator Pearson: And the district nurse goes around once or twice a month or something like that.

Miss Hunter: Yes, that is an excellent idea. We applaud that.

The Chairman: Just before we get around again there was one little matter that cropped up when you were talking. You made some observations particularly about people or welfare about their shopping and budgeting habits.

I have the impression that—I think most of the Committee share this—the people who have appeared before us, who have been living on welfare allowances for a period of years, have almost been miracle workers. You really cannot teach them very much about shopping or about budgeting and they have a great awareness of diet.

Now, that is what we have been hearing here. Is that wrong?

Miss Hunter: You may have noticed that there is an omission in the brief and again purposely about this whole field of nutrition because I believe that everybody needs more knowledge about how to feed your family and nutrition, and not only the poor. Therefore we did not stress it in this because our brief was concerned more with the people who are poor but I think everybody needs more knowledge about nutrition and how to feed their family.

I think that a lot of people who are managing on a very low income do, as you say, exceptionally well and are miracle workers with their dollars, but there are many that are not managing very well.

Some of the diets one sees when you happen to go into a home at mealtime are pretty poor diets. They could do with a lot more help.

The Chairman: Well, just while we are at this, we are going to ask you to do something for us. If you take a look at the brief presented by the Department of Health and Welfare—it is in our records so I am sure the doctor has seen it.

Dr. Mussallem: Yes.

The Chairman: You will see there "Family budgets in Canada," and there is a chapter set aside for that.

Now, we take you at your word, that you are the closest to the people and you are in the front line of the workers and you have the greatest knowledge. I mean that. I marked it down. You said it pretty well, and I agree with you.

Senator Quart: You are going to get good beside treatment.

The Chairman: I agree with them.

Senator Sullivan: You had good nursing care when you were sick, too.

The Chairman: Yes, I agree with all of this. For that reason I would ask you to do this for us. The Economic Council set down what they called the poverty line of one, two, three, four, five persons. That is in the brief.

Miss Hunter: Yes.

The Chairman: The Department of Health and Welfare have done some budgeting. We would like you to prepare for us a budget for one, for two, for families of three, for families of four, and for families of five. You will take a family of two with two children, if you take them at four and six, and then use a little higher age for the family of five or six, but do it on a uniform basis and let us have an urban and rural budget for what you consider to be adequate or whatever you consider adequate. At least adequate is the term I can use for these people so that we can examine them when we have to come to some decision on the poverty line.

Now, you can do that for us, doctor?

Dr. Mussallem: Yes.

The Chairman: I appreciate that very much. You understand what we are getting at?

Dr. Mussallem: Yes, I am familiar with that. If we have any difficulties, we will come back to you.

The Chairman: Senator Fournier, you are back on.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman, I am not clear yet on this staff business. It takes me a little time to get things right.

We read in the newspapers very often practically right across Canada that there is a shortage of nurses. Now, according to the figure that you have given us this morning in your submission, I would like to believe there are a surplus of nurses somewhere in Canada, yet there is a tremendous shortage.

In my own province in my own city at the moment we have a hospital of 206 beds. There is a whole floor has been closed for over six months and they tell us the reason is a shortage of nurses. This is pretty well right across the country. You see a whole floor closed and a long waiting list of demands and they tell you there is a shortage of nurses. It does not quite agree with what you told us this morning.

Now, in New Brunswick we have raised the standard of the nurses, with which I concurred.

I had a daughter who comes from the old group and in order to become a nurse she had to complete her Grade 12 and you had to have four years of training at the hospital. In my home city you started with a class of 50 people—and I want your opinion on this because we have changed the system—we started with a class of 50 girls every year who had completed Grade 12, for a four-year training period at $5 a month. Actually those girls during their training—they were being trained in the hospital—were rendering a lot of services while they were doing their training starting by making the beds and so on, and then the medical profession would give them lectures and then from time to time they would train under university professors and so on.

Out of a class of about fifty it usually ended up with about twenty because there were drop-outs and most of the drop-outs were because some of these girls had not the aptitude to become nurses.

You could train these girls, give them all the training that you want, and all the university training you want, and if they have not got the aptitude to become nurses I think you are going to be a failure. Sometimes they say teachers are born. I believe there is something in that.

Senator Sullivan: That applies to any profession.

Senator Fournier: Well, you might not agree with me but that is my opinion. I have facts to prove that if you are not born to be a nurse and if you have not got the aptitude, you are not going to be good any more than you can become a professional doctor like Dr. Sullivan, who succeeded because he has got the ability. Others have got the aptitude to become mechanics or in the law but to become an expert in the field, you must have the attitude and aptitude. This is my belief.

Now, to get back to my story. The result now is that we have done away with this, with which I agree...

Senator Fergusson: Is that the senator's question?

The Chairman: No; I am waiting for the question.

Senator Fournier: The question is coming. Because I want to know your opinion on that, and I want to give you what we are doing now. We are training nurses now with grade 12 and we train them at university which is good. They come out of university with a certificate of nurses but the point is now that one of these girls, whether they have the aptitude or not, go through university because there is a prestige by going to university. There is a prestige to live as a nurse and there is nothing wrong with that. It is something to be proud of; but the fact is that at the very moment in my province in my home town these girls who graduate from the university are not the best type of nurses that are needed.

They are not the type that would actually make the beds and give the actual care to the patient that is sick in the bed. They are good for administration; they are good for staff; and that is the only thing they will do: staff work and administration. In the wards...

The Chairman: Senator, here is a national expert sitting right there, a recognized world expert, and she can tell you.

Senator Fournier: Do not forget in your answer I want to know why there is a shortage of nurses and why we have to close a whole floor because there are no nurses available.

Dr. Mussallem: Well, Mr. Chairman and senator, I am presuming that the city or town to which you are referring is not a major city. This is where there are problems in attracting girls to smaller centres.

The Chairman: Yes, it is a smaller centre. It is not major but it is not minor either.

Dr. Mussallem: With respect to the other comments made by the senator, problems related to drop-outs in the previous course, a class of fifty had twenty left, because the remaining thirty did not have the aptitude, I know this is not subject to long debate here. I am well aware of the focus but since the question was asked I would wish to explore further whether indeed this was the reason for leaving. We have found over the years...

Senator Fournier: That is one reason.

Dr. Mussallem: ... on an examination of drop-outs, the expression of the student of why she left and her actual reasons, and those the Director of Nursing gave, are very often quite different, so I do not wish to dispute what you said, but I would question whether there were thirty that did not have the aptitude. Perhaps it was the educational program; perhaps there were other reasons.

Senator Fournier: Money was a factor also; there is no question.

Senator Sullivan: It applies to any profession.

Dr. Mussallem: We know at the present moment and over the past four or five years now that there has been a trend across Canada for nursing students to enter programs that are under educational auspices.

We have had criticism and will have criticism that the girls that come from the St. Yvette program in Quebec and junior community colleges in the West or the Institute of Technology, for example, in British Columbia and Ontario are not as good as other kinds of nurses. This is something we have to live with.

All I can say is, unless you give me two hours, that I believe that good education will provide the best opportunity for a person to reach their potential, whether it is nursing, medicine, law, and so on.

Likewise, a nurse that has an opportunity to go into a university program or any kind of program, should be a better person and a better nurse. Should be. We cannot compare one with the other because they are different people going through different programs, but if we believe that education does help people reach their potential then we have to believe this.

Now, you have said these girls are not prepared to carry out such functions as bed-making and so on, and I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this is a time in history that we have to look at the utilization of manpower because it does affect the poor as well as other segments of our society. Should nurses be carrying out these kinds of functions at this time or could they be done better by other people?

Is society right in spending the amount of money required to give a nurse preparation at this level and then use her for doing tasks which could be done by someone that is less well prepared and less expensive to society? I do believe this is very poor utilization of manpower, or whatever it is. I could go on, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I said you were an authority on it. You have made your point.

Senator Sullivan: Very well.

Senator Fournier: That is a very good answer. I am quite pleased with your answer.

The Chairman: Well, we have very competent people here. Senator Pearson.

Senator Pearson: Let us take in our Province of Saskatchewan, our provinces are having great difficulty financing the hospital itself. Consequently the nurses are not getting an increase in pay like everybody else is to a great extent. They are moving out into other industries. Industry is paying far better prices for these girls than the hospitals can possibly afford. And we find that the hospital nurse is disappearing because of lack of money.

Dr. Mussallem: Mr. Chairman, I think if I could just comment on that if I may?

The Chairman: Yes, very well.

Dr. Mussallem: I think there are several factors that are involved here. If nurses' salaries are high, then they should be working at the top level.

I cannot speak for any one province but if nurses are used for nursing activities and nursing functions and these less well repaired people are used and utilized for routine functions and as more technology comes into the hospital, we will find that the work of the nurse, not the real basic function of the nurse, being with people and helping them, but many of the routine chores that she has been doing can be eliminated and perhaps—I only say "perhaps" because this requires very deep study—the number of nurses that are in hospitals at the present time are sufficient if there was sufficient auxiliary assistance either through machines or through people, to support the work of the professional nurse.

We have done a great deal of lip service to studies which say nurses are working at this level. I do not believe in this context we have done as much as we should have in Canada because Canada is unique in its hospital insurance programme, which started in Saskatchewan, and in its Medicare now. If any country in the world needs to take a good hard look at this, it is Canada.

The Chairman: Well, Doctor, just while you are at it, we are here not only to learn from you but perhaps you can pick up a few ideas from us.

We had before us the social workers who, of course, for the last many years have been turned into clerks because of the lack of staff and their inability to do what social workers were doing. I think they are doing it in the polytechnical schools in Toronto, they are training people who will do something less than a social worker to prepare the work for the social worker so that they can devote themselves entirely to it.

Now, is that not some leadership?

Dr. Mussallem: Yes. Please be assured that we are learning a great deal from you, as you said, and this certainly has been the trend in health services and others.

The one thing we have to guard against is a great proliferation of these people.

Senator Sullivan: Very much so.

The Chairman: Do you want to ask a question, Senator Sullivan?

Senator Sullivan: No. I would just like to make a remark and it is not prefatory that the Canadian Nurses Association have been doing a wonderful job and have and will continue to do so. Their responsibility is going to be much greater, as you have heard a week ago, in that they are going to train nurses to become medical associates in all the teaching hospitals and take over a great many functions of the teaching staff of various hospitals. They are going to have that responsibility.

We are starting it now at the University of Toronto. We are going to start at McGill. We are going to start at the University of Montreal. So the nurses not only have more responsibilities to assume in the future but they will handle them as well as they have in the past.

That is all I have to say.

The Chairman: Thank you, Doctor. May I, on behalf of the Committee, say it has been a delight to have both of you here this morning. We appreciate very much the pains you took to prepare your brief, the concern that you showed and you have given us a great deal of information. We are looking forward to the report from you on the family budget. Thank you.

Dr. Mussallem: Thank you very much.

—Short recess.

—Upon resuming at 10.35

The Chairman: I will call the meeting to order and Mr. F. M. Troop, who is the treasurer of the Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada will introduce the delegation.

Mr. F. M. Troop, Treasurer, Victorian Order of Nurses: Yes, Mr. Chairman and Honourable Senators.

May I first introduce the people who are here. On my left here is Mrs. Eagan who is Chairman of our Nursing Advisory Committee and Miss Christine Macarthur who is our assistant director in chief and Miss Jean Leask, who is the director in chief of the Order. I am the honorary treasurer.

Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, when the Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada was requested to submit a brief to the Senate Committee on Poverty the request was considered by the members of the National Board of Management. In their review of the terms of reference as outlined by your Committee for preparation of submissions, it was the consensus that any material which the Order could submit would be limited since we have no statistical data to substantiate factual statements nor do we have personnel or funds to undertake any formal study of poverty.

However, our services are directed to many individuals and families in the lower income group and we are concerned about existing poverty situations in Canada and as a result of subsequent discussions with members of your staff, it was agreed that a submission of more limited scope could be prepared for your consideration.

In our brief we have restricted our comments to the area of health and some of the factors affecting health. We have not submitted definite recommendations. It seemed to us that examples of specific instances which nurses from many parts of Canada have encountered in their home visits which gives you a better picture of some of the hardships that people on low income are suffering.

These examples have been included as an appendix to the brief and have been submitted in the words of the nurses themselves.

We appreciate the action taken by the Senate in establishing a Special Committee which will initiate specific action for the mitigation of poverty in our country and it is our privilege to appear before you today and present a brief on behalf of the Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada.

Miss Leask and Miss Macarthur will answer any questions that you may have in detail about their service. Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator Fournier?

Senator Fournier: Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not really know what to say or what question to ask. All I can say is that I know that the CON are doing a tremendous job across the country because we have them at home and they are what I would call the working nurses; the nurse that goes from home to home and sees what is taking place. I know this is what is taking place in my home town. They certainly have a lot of respect from everybody. I am well aware of the financial difficulties they have because I used to be on the Finance Committee for my region. It is quite a problem every year to find money to keep one nursing going for V.O.N., to buy her a car and provide her a decent salary.

I do not know why, but it is still a problem. I really do not know what question to ask except to congratulate your organization for the work they are doing and I hope that you will carry on. I certainly recommend anybody support you financially. It is a problem to finance the V.O.N. through charity in some region every year because there are so many organizations. They are doing a tremendous job among the poor people, those who cannot afford to go to the hospital, these who need medical treatment after they leave the hospital where you have no convalescent home.

Senator Quart: Mr. Chairman, I would like to second what Senator Fournier said with regards to the V.O.N. We are very happy to have them with us today.

On page 2 you mention that you have a few branches of the Victorian Order which is administering these services—that is speaking of these services in the home—as an adjunct to the nursing service. As a result, more people can be helped in their own homes. In providing nursing service, conditions arising in related areas, such as economic, housing, social, reflects on the efficacy of care.

Do you consider this as a field where home-makers could be used to alleviate some of the work of the V.O.N.?

Miss Jean Leask, Director in Chief of the Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada: Mr. Chairman, I think we have said on many occasions that the work of the visiting nurse has become almost more dependant on having housekeeping or home-making services also available in the community. This is particularly true where we are developing a coordinated home-care program where we are taking patients home from hospital early or patients who did not ever need to go into hospital, in lieu of hospitals keeping them at home.

The partnership of the physician and nurse is still perhaps the basic one in the care of patients but we still have to add these other services and I believe that home-making services is one which we have, on many occasions, said should be developed.

Perhaps the group knows we are administering home-making services in five of our branches now. They have been developed at the request of the community and were not being developed by any other agency in the community.

The Chairman: What branches, please.

Miss Leask: We have the north shore branch in British Columbia, which is north and west of Vancouver and Surrey. Those are the two in British Columbia. In Ontario we have the Guelph, Wellington, Dufferin branch which is a branch serving to entire counties and the homemaking service, as well as the nursing service, is provided for the entire county so it is a rural as well as an urban service.

We have the only home-making service in Winnipeg, which is limited to serving people who are ill at home since another agency provides the family service and our service is both a part-time and a full-time service.

Then Montreal has a limited service also that they administer and it again is poor people who are ill at home. I believe it is limited to elderly people.

Miss Christine MacArthur, Assistant Director, Chief Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada: Elderly patients.

Miss Leask: Elderly patients, who require part-time service, so we have done this experiment or developed these services in these areas because we believe it is very necessary.

Senator Inman: I know that the V.O.N. are dedicated nurses but do you find that the home-makers would be a little less anxious to go into the homes of the poor.

Miss MacArthur: I do not think we have found that. I think in many instances the home-makers are being used in these homes particularly the elderly poor and that is where the emphasis has been placed on in our service; for part-time home-making services that could help these elderly people, who are on a limited income, remain in their own home with this additional part-time help.

Senator Inman: So the development of home-making organization would be a great help to poor people.

Miss MacArthur: Yes, to the whole population certainly. We feel it is a service which needs to be developed if we are going to keep people at home as an adjunct to these services.

Senator Inman: At the bottom of this page you say:

Since services are given only when requested, it can be assumed that there are many instances when poor people could benefit from a visiting nursing service, but they are not aware it is available to them.

How do you think this could be made available to the poor people? Perhaps they do not go out, perhaps they do not read newspapers. Perhaps they are out of touch.

Miss MacArthur: We do have material that is sent out to branches. We have a TV filmette by which we try to inform people about our services but in many instances when we are in the home the nurse is greeted by the information: "well, I wish I had known this service was available a few years ago or a year ago or a month ago when we needed this type of service". It is still very difficult.

Senator Inman: Through what organization is this information brought to them eventually? Is it brought through the churches or schools.

Miss Leask: I think we use all available type of communication. I think what we feel is that the poor people—I think this is found in other services—tend perhaps to ask less for these services because they are more hesitant to ask.

I feel we are trying to look into ways in which we can meet more people. Perhaps we have not thought enough about the method ourselves.

Senator Fergusson: I can say one thing. You do not have a Victorian Order in Prince Edward Island, do you?

Miss Leask: No.

Senator Fergusson: This is why I was bringing it up. They do have in New Brunswick and I know one way that people learn about it is at the time of the United Appeal when the Victorian Order takes part in the United Appeal and our Board of Directors, of which I have been one for a long time, are requested to take part in giving publicity to why we need money for the United Appeal and what this group does. This information reached a great many people. It goes over the radio and television. It goes in the papers and I think that is a very good way of getting information but where you do not have it, you do not see it probably the same.

Senator Inman: I would like to have it.

Senator Fergusson: I am sure you would. You would not be exposed to this the same way we are.

The Chairman: Well, Senator Inman, this is the time to ask why you have not got it. Go ahead?

Senator Inman: I have been trying to promote such a thing.

The Chairman: Well, here you are promoting now. What is the answer? We think we know, but go ahead.

Miss Leask: I think the Victorian Order is a voluntary organization which is established at the request of communities and supported by communities and Prince Edward Island is a small province with a small population and have a well-developed health department and it is out understanding that type of service of visiting nurses or bedside nursing care is given through their department.

I think we do all have to consider—and I am not saying this is the answer—but perhaps in Prince Edward Island this service is being given adequately through the Department of Health. I do not know, but overlapping of services or having duplication of services is something we are all trying to avoid at present but I do not know what your situation is that way.

Senator Inman: Well, it probably would be that way. We do have a very efficient Department of Health and Welfare. We do have a good number of Public Health Nurses. I know they do give good service because I have travelled around with some of them into the homes.

Miss Leask: I think I might say if there was a need or request, we always answer any requests and interpret our service, and if there is a need we are perfectly willing to establish the service.

Senator Inman: I am not going to stop trying to promote.

Miss MacArthur: We have made several visits to Prince Edward Island and have met with groups there some years ago. I think the last one was in the early 1950's. We have never gotten to the point where the community felt they could support this service either by request for service or by financial support so that is why we have not been established there primarily.

Senator Quart: May I ask a question, not that I am from Prince Edward Island, I am from Quebec, but I know a lot about your order.

This is a voluntary order and therefore would your work be more effective if funds were allotted to make the organization less dependant upon voluntary groups such as municipal and provincial groups? Do you get any federal grant for the Victorian Order of Nurses?

Miss Leask: We have a federal grant for the national organization but since health is under the provincial government, money to support our branches comes from provincial grants.

Senator Quart: But not entirely, of course.

Miss Leask: It is federal to provincial and then it is paid by the provincial. In each of our provinces where we are established, that is the nine provinces, there is a provincial association with its branches and it is these provincial associations which are the liaison with government or which approaches government for support of these branches. The amount of government support which we are receiving is increasing.

Senator Inman: But it is not adequate at all.

Miss Leask: In some provinces the money which we receive from government is now—Manitoba, for example, is 55 per cent.

The Chairman: Which province was that?

Miss Leask: Manitoba is 55 per cent. I believe Saskatchewan is approximately 54 per cent. The average is 37 per cent across Canada from provincial sources and this varies. One province is only 3 per cent.

Miss MacArthur: Three per cent in British Columbia.

The Chairman: British Columbia gives you 3 per cent?

Miss Leask: In fees for services. Now we get more grants from British Columbia.

Miss MacArthur: This is in relation to actual fees for services.

Senator Fergusson: As long as you have given so many provinces, would you tell me about New Brunswick? What percentage do they give?

Miss MacArthur: Eleven per cent. That is in fees for services. It is not grants. New Brunswick gives us very high grants.

Senator Fergusson: I know. We have been very happy about it lately.

Miss MacArthur: With your grants I think New Brunswick would be about 6 per cent of the total which comes from Government.

Senator Inman: At the bottom of Page 3 you speak of the concept of poverty and apart from the hard-core poor, one could think of poverty in a little different concept. Poverty is a bit different. There is always the real hard-core poor but apart from them, do you find a different concept of poverty today? Is it that people are asking for more services, for more money to raise those levels?

What is your concept of poverty?

Dr. Mussallem: I think, Mr. Chairman, and Senator Inman, we would feel that there is hard-core poverty but I think some of the illustrations we gave at the back indicated that many people who are working at the minimum wage, for example, are in poverty because this is not sufficient to meet the rising costs of food and services and things they have to buy. There is a group of what we call the medically indigent and I think the V.O.N.'s association call independent poor or who are the border-line people.

I think there is this gray area between people who are what we call the hard-core poverty and people who have sufficient but there is, I think, a large group efficient, who are what we call the medically indigent who cannot make ends meet or if they have a big drug bill they simply cannot pay it and there is very little help for these people.

Senator Inman: The other night I was not sleeping very well and I was thinking about poverty and I was wondering—the Chairman has suggested this—supposing everybody was given a guaranteed annual income and yet those who could not live on that and could work and wanted to work, and they could work to the point they felt they were able to, to increase that and if they were not taxed on that up to a certain point, I wonder how that would work? What do you think of that; everybody getting a guaranteed income and then allowing them to work to provide enough for their needs, or is that too much of a dream?

Dr. Mussallem: I do not think we have really thought about that. I do not know whether Mr. Troop would have any ideas on that or not but I think what I would feel personally is that one of the difficulties for the person who is earning a marginal amount at the present time is there is no assistance if they get into difficulties. We assist the person who is eligible to go on welfare but these other persons do not have that advantage and perhaps the guaranteed annual income would be one of the answers.

The Chairman: We call those the working poor.

Dr. Mussallem: Yes, that is correct and this is the group that would be helped by a guaranteed income.

The Chairman: That is the problem of which I think Senator Inman has been speaking in her own terms.

Miss Leask: I do not think we have really thought about that.

Miss MacArthur: I think the guaranteed annual income would go a little way to helping alleviate these problems but I think there are many other implications and that these people in the low income bracket educationally do not have the preparation for meeting the exigencies of everyday living and that they need a lot more. They need help in the home, how to manage, how to shop, how to budget, how to prepare meals; all of these things would not be included in any guaranteed income for these people.

Senator Inman: No, but would not the guaranteed income give them a little bit of hope.

Miss Leask: That is right.

Miss MacArthur: That is right.

The Chairman: I have Senator Pearson, Senator Quart, Senator McGrand and then Senator Ferguson.

Senator Pearson: I would like to know; are the Victorian Order of Nurses all graduate nurses?

Miss Leask: Mr. Chairman, the very large majority. We have a small group of nursing assistants employed in the Victorian Order in our larger branches. I think the total number of nursing assistants employed is about 25.

The Chairman: Out of how many?

Miss Leask: There are 788, or approximately 790 nursing positions across Canada and so the remainder are graduate nurses and the majority of them have public health preparation. As of December 31st last year I think there was 61 per cent of our staff who were prepared under Public Health Nursing either at the certificate or diploma level or a degree level.

Senator Pearson: Are you attempting to increase your number of assistants?

Miss Leask: No, I do not believe we are. I think there are many factors to be considered in giving care to patients at home. In the first place the person who goes into the home must do everything that is needed for these patients.

Now, we might have a patient who required a function which could be carried out by a nursing assistant, I will say, a bed bath, but that patient might also require an intermuscular injection. When you are doing a service in the community, you cannot send two people into that home. Therefore you have limitations on the type of patient that can be cared for by a nursing assistant.

We feel that in our larger branches where there is adequate supervision and where we have a larger group of nurses then we can employ nursing assistant. In a small branch where our nurses take night calls and week-end calls...

Senator Pearson: What do you mean by a small branch?

Miss Leask: I am thinking of up to six nurses. The nursing assistant does not have the preparation to deal with the emergency of night and week-end services and therefore your regular staff have to take their turn at this and it is not really, from a standpoint of care, satisfactory or possible to employ a nursing assistant in that group.

I think we might have a small increase in our group of nursing assistants but in the care of people at home you do need somebody who can go into the home and act independently and it has been our experience that the caseload that we carry, which could be done by a nursing assistant, is limited because more and more we are taking patients who need complicated treatment home from hospital and this cannot be done by this type of worker.

Senator Pearson: Do you take in rural areas very much as compared with the city?

Miss Leask: We have extended within the last ten years, particularly in some provinces into a number of rural areas. I believe in doing my annual report this year I went back ten years and in that time we were mainly in urban centres.

For example, in Ontario we only served one community but now we serve I think it is fifteen.

Senator Pearson: Fifteen.

Miss Leask: Yes.

The Chairman: Counties.

Miss Leask: Entire counties and we have also recently extended into one or two areas in Nova Scotia. We serve Cape Breton County now. We serve Kings County.

Senator Pearson: You are working out of a centre in each county.

Miss Leask: That is right, or we may have several centres. We have a central administration with several satellites. It has changed our pattern of administration too and I think we are trying to expand it and serve rural areas. Better transportation and better roads have made this possible.

Senator Pearson: I notice you work with the Saskatchewan Assistance Aid program. How does that program help you?

Miss MacArthur: Since 1947 the Saskatchewan Government has been paying the Victorian Order for nursing visits to people receiving welfare assistance and this has changed a bit over the years with the change in legislation but we are getting payment for people receiving social assistance for all our visits in Saskatchewan.

Senator Pearson: With you getting assistance to help you out, does the government then insist that you take certain programs of theirs or do you work on your own entirely?

Miss MacArthur: No, it is entirely on our own.

Senator Pearson: You work on your own program.

Miss MacArthur: Yes.

Senator Pearson: You are not under the domination of the province at all?

Miss Leask: No. I think it has been our own program that we carried out. They paid our costs for making the visits. For example, we will say in Regina we do a costing each year in every branch of how much it costs us to make a visit and in Saskatchewan the province has paid us on a fee for service basis, the cost of the visits that we make to patients eligible for social welfare but there has been no interference in our organization or our standards. Is this what you mean?

Senator Pearson: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: Is this the cost that you charge patients who can pay?

Miss Leask: That is right. It is the same fee we would charge.

Senator Pearson: How do you arrive at that cost fee?

Miss Leask: We have a formula which has been developed firstly in the United States by what is now the National League for Nursing and the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, and I think another insurance company, when the Metropolitan Insurance Company paid for services to certain policy holders and they established a formula for costing visiting nurses services in order to establish a fee.

Now, this has been refined through the years. It is based on the expenses of providing the services and of course the number of visits. This is basically what the formula is. Certain costs are deleted or deducted but we would be glad to give you a copy of our formula if you want it.

The Chairman: No.

Miss Leask: This is done each year annually in each branch and it is verified by our accounting department in the national office and it is on this cost that the local fee is based so that the local fee varies all across Canada but it is based on the cost in that community.

Miss MacArthur: The average cost for all branches in 1968 was $4.97. It varies from three dollars something to up to $4.97.

Senator Pearson: That is per day?

Miss MacArthur: Per visit.

Miss Leask: The average.

The Chairman: Is the travelling mileage included in that?

Miss Leask: Yes.

The Chairman: Everything is.

Miss Leask: All across.

The Chairman: Just while you are on that question, Senator Pearson, as between the staff—I am only interested in numbers—take a city like London, how many people would you have there?

Miss Leask: We would have at the moment I think sixteen nurses.

The Chairman: How many would you have in Ottawa?

Miss Leask: Twenty-five.

Miss MacArthur: I think it is twenty-four or twenty-five in Ottawa.

The Chairman: Well, let's take Regina.

Miss MacArthur: We have, I think, thirteen in Regina now.

The Chairman: Now, something else is coming up. Regina is larger than London. You have got thirteen in Regina and you have very many more in London. Why would you have that?

Miss Leask: I think they are about the same size.

Miss MacArthur: We employ staff according to the need for services and increase staff as there is more demand.

We use relief nurses until the service demands we increase staff and then we increase staff so there has been more demand in London than there has been in Regina.

Senator Quart: You mentioned staff and your visiting nurses have to be graduate nurses, but I was very surprised to see, when I received a brochure from your Ottawa office about the organization of the Victorian Order of Nurses several months ago, that it is not necessary for any of them to be nurses. They are simply there for administrative purposes or whatever you call it. Maybe administration is wrong but principally I suppose they are there for grants or making presentations to governments and so on. Is that correct?

Miss Leask: You mean our Board?

Senator Quart: Your Board, yes.

Miss Leask: All our Board Members, as Mrs. Egan and Mr. Troop are, are volunteers serving voluntarily. Some of them may be nurses, as Mrs. Egan is a former nurse, but their services are all given on a volunteer basis.

Senator Quart: Of course, I was very surprised to realize that there are so many men on the Board.

Miss Leask: Yes, I think we are very fortunate. I suppose we have several thousand volunteers. If you counted all our Boards across Canada I think it would be in the thousands.

Senator Quart: One little incident, at Woodstock where you had your regional VON meeting, I was amazed to realize that the contribution of the firemen was in answering the telephone over and above the hours your office workers were there and my question now is about this Golden Mile Club. Would that be somewhat similar to the Good Companionship Clubs or something like that.

Miss Leask: Yes.

Senator Quart: You mentioned the Golden Mile.

The Chairman: Yes, Miss Leask said "yes" to that.

Miss Leask: I think they are called by various names. In Victoria, for instance, the one where we are giving councilor services, they call it the Silver Threads Club and that service has developed from a few hours a week now to a full time counselling service.

Senator Quart: Golden Mile is good but Silver Threads is wonderful. I think one of the original ones is the "Evergreens" in New York.

The Chairman: That is a new one on me.

Miss Leask: Yes, it is a good name.

The Chairman: I have not heard that before.

Senator McGrand: This morning I happened to use the expression that perhaps we should not be taking these patients to the hospitals as much as we should be taking the hospital services to the patient. Now, I really feel that in the work of the VON that is actually what you are doing. You are giving people care at home which they otherwise would probably be getting at the hospital. Is there a fee for service charge?

Miss Leask: Yes.

Senator McGrand: Do you go into the house and see a patient at the patient's request or is that a doctor referral? Do you go on the doctor's suggestion?

Miss MacArthur: We answer any calls from any source. We do not continue care unless there is a doctor in attendance with the patient.

Senator McGrand: In looking after a patient in his home that has been discharged from hospital—you must do a lot of that—a patient is discharged from hospital and then you look after them at home for a while. Do you find many bedsores?

Miss MacArthur: We hope we do not. I think the care that we give is...

Senator McGrand: Do you encounter them?

Miss MacArthur: Yes. When they get home, do you mean?

Senator McGrand: Yes.

Miss MacArthur: Yes, we have encountered quite a number of them.

Senator McGrand: Quite a few VON nurses tell me that. I remember I asked one VON nurse what she did mostly and she said "heal up these bedsores that they get in the hospitals".

That is why I think it is a good idea to carry the service of the hospital to the patients.

Miss Leask: Mr. Chairman, could I just perhaps speak on Dr. McGrand's point and what the VON nurses said about the neighbourhood clinics or neighbourhood centres. I think we too have that in our brief that we feel this is something which should be or would be very helpful for the poor—for anyone, but particularly for the poor, and I would just like to reiterate some of the points which were made in relation to people.

There is difficulty in getting to a hospital clinic or to a centre and I think to us, this is particularly difficult in large cities where you have to go long distances to hospitals and the point was brought out this morning about the difficulty of the mother taking her children or getting someone to stay with them and we have found this.

They just cannot get there at nine o'clock in the morning if they have this to do or they may go to the hospital and be told, go to one clinic and come back the next day to another one and this has to start all over again and I think this is why so often they give up.

Senator McGrand: What percentage of your patients that you look after would be poor, because you go and see anybody that needs you. What percentage of the people whom you look after would be classified as poor? I wanted to bring this out, do you find many complaints from the poor people that they cannot get medical treatment?

The Chairman: See if you can answer that first question first.

Miss Leask: What percentage would be poor?

The Chairman: What you would classify as poor.

Miss Leask: I think the only way we could do this would be by our fees.

The Chairman: Why would these fees be a basis for classification?

Miss Leask: The number that might be free. This might give some indication. We did not do a survey to know how many of our patients would be poor.

Miss MacArthur: Twenty-seven per cent of our patients...

The Chairman: Were paid for by the government.

Miss MacArthur: ...are people who were not able to pay anything. Twenty-five per cent were those who were only able to pay part of the fee. Any of these would be in this gray area.

Senator McGrand: You said you would take a call anywhere you get it but you do not continue unless you worked under a doctor's direction. Do you know of any cases where you had to give up seeing a patient because their care was not directed by a physician.

Miss MacArthur: I would think that this would be very rare. We do make a second visit. We might even make a third visit if we felt medical care was indicated, to try and persuade that person to get medical care. I think if we thought it was such a severe condition, we would do everything in our power to get a doctor into that patient or else persuade the patient. In some of these areas I think we have doctors with whom we have a good relationship and they will go in and see this patient. If they needed care, I think we would get to them some way. I do not think we would ever leave a patient needing care without seeing that was made available to them.

Miss Leask: We would go to the Medical Officer of Health, for example, and this is where we might get care.

Senator Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question. The Victorian Order of Nurses have had long experience now with the poor of the country and the poor in many areas. Have you ever arrived at an answer to the question of what would be a good cure for poverty.

Miss Leask: No.

The Chairman: Do not tell me you have not. We are depending on you.

Miss Leask: You mean you have had many?

Senator Pearson: Would more welfare or more jobs be better.

Miss Leask: I think you need both. This is just a personal viewpoint.

Senator Pearson: Yes.

Miss Leask: I think perhaps we need a different attitude and I think we need to feel that these people must be given dignity and a means to have the dignity of anyone else—I was going to say "quality" but I think that is perhaps the wrong word; but I wonder if we so often push something aside and say "well, they are poor or that is because they are poor".

I think perhaps we need to change our attitude and perhaps have more of a commitment to changing this. That is just a personal opinion.

Senator Pearson: More commitments from the general populace.

Miss Leask: Yes, and perhaps a more wanting to do it, not because it is something good to do but something we as citizens or as Canadians or human beings must do for our fellow human beings.

A commitment of wanting to do it, not for our own satisfaction but to really get down to what the difficulties are.

I think money is certainly an important thing and I think jobs or the opportunity to work and be a part of the whole group is important. I think education, as we have said, is important. I think not to be segregated as being poor, in this group and not in the other, and then again these are attitudes that we have to break down.

I do not know whether that answers your question.

Senator McGrand: A while ago, I do not think it was your group that mentioned it, there was talk about the problem of getting volunteer services. There was difficulty getting volunteer services. Now, involvement is a word that we use an awful lot today. A person is involved. It is becoming almost a cliché in some respects but there never was a time when there were so many people with so little to do. The hours of work are getting shorter and technology is replacing people and a lot of people who worked all day in their home now are able to do their work in a few hours. I am referring to people such as housewives who stay home.

Now, it seems to me that there never was such an opportunity to get people involved as there is now, if you can sell them the idea.

Miss Leask: I was wondering if Mrs. Egan or Mr. Troop would like to say something because they are our volunteers or part of our volunteers.

Mr. Troop: We certainly do not have any difficulty in getting people involved on our Board. We have really very important people who give up their time and they travel to the annual meeting as far away as Winnipeg from Halifax, and pay their own expenses. They really are involved.

Senator McGrand: It was not your group that brought this up.

The Chairman: No.

Senator McGrand: It was the previous group and that is because you are a volunteer group.

Mr. Troop: That is correct.

Senator McGrand: If you were a half-paid group, you would not get the response. That is what I mean, the honest forward volunteer group. It seems to me that people will support a thing when they know it is volunteer, when they know no one is getting anything out of it.

Mr. Troop: That is correct.

The Chairman: But there is more to it than this, doctors, do not forget not only is the volunteer group but this is the most human of human work. This has sentiment. This has attachment. These are human beings and this has its own reward right in front of them. That is why they do it.

Senator McGrand: That is what I was saying. It has its own reward.

The Chairman: It is a personal reward and that is why they are doing it.

Mrs. Rita Egan, Chairman, Victorian Order of Nurses: Mr. Chairman, may I say something?

The Chairman: By all means.

Mrs. Egan: The Victorian Order of Nurses is involved in Meals on Wheels programs in different parts of the country, in three different areas at the present time and this involved volunteer workers because they are absolutely dependent upon the volunteer people to deliver these meals to their homes. This is very time consuming but it is very rewarding though. I think they have had no problems in obtaining volunteers and it is a tremendous service which is very badly needed.

Senator Fergusson: There are one or two things I would like to ask. I am sure that neither Miss Leask or Miss MacArthur has any doubt about my interest in the VON. We really are very grateful and I am very proud of the presentation you have made to the Committee this morning. I know it is going to be most helpful to us.

It seems to me that many of the presentations we have had have ignored the fact that illness is the cause of poverty. That has not been brought to our attention nearly as much as it has been by you and by the Canadian Nurses this morning and the Canadian Medical Association the other day. I think this is something you were overlooking to a great extent but I know from reading their briefs it is a vicious circle; that illness causes poverty and poverty causes illness.

Dr. Bates of the Health League of Canada—who did not appear before us—thinks that the basic cause of poverty is illness, that people are poor or they cannot work and the family gets into poverty. He thinks it starts there instead of just being a circle and I wonder what you think of that?

One other thing I would like to ask you and that is we are very interested in working mothers who are the heads of families. Do you find in your work that this is a great area where there is poverty and do you find in these families that there is perhaps more illness than in families where the mother is not working?

I know that is a lot of question, but answer any part of it.

Miss Leask: Well, I think the first question that whether poverty is caused by illness, we would have nothing to substantiate that. I think in our brief we have certainly said that illness is one of the big factors in poverty and particularly I think for the group who are at this marginal level or in this gray area; that illness simply devastates them because they have nothing to come and go on.

I think that illness, as you say, and indicated by our examples, where the bread-winner or the father was ill the family simply went down and I think one of our examples of the child with diabetes where they had to move in with another family and where they had no running water and this kind of thing and this child simply would not give his own insulin. This was really poverty. It was illness in the family that caused them to have to move and then with the child ill he really did not have a chance.

I do not know which comes first, whether it is illness or poverty but they certainly are linked.

Senator Fergusson: It certainly is a great cause of poverty, is it not.

Miss Leask: Yes.

Mr. Troop: Mr. Chairman, may I just mention something there? For the last ten or twelve years I have been on the Executive of the RCAF Benevolent Fund. We have found that 90 per cent of the cases of these airman who are in poverty that come before us, are from illness or misuse of credit.

The Chairman: Illness or...

Mr. Troop: Misuse of credit.

The Chairman: A misuse of credit, bringing on a neurotic condition.

Mr. Troop: Borrowing from finance companies and this brings on poverty.

The Chairman: Too many credit cards.

Senator Fergusson: Could you divide the proportion of which is which.

Mr. Troop: I would say roughly about 40 per cent misuse of credit and 20 per cent of illness.

The Chairman: Go ahead, Senator Fergusson.

Senator Fergusson: I ask one other question.

Miss Leask: I am not sure which one came next.

Senator Fergusson: I asked about the families that have working mothers or working mothers who are head of families?

Miss Leask: I do not believe we have anything specific of this.

Senator Fergusson: I did not want to go into it, I just wondered if you found it. They know the circumstances of the people they are visiting. They would know if they are working mothers that are going out to work.

Miss Leask: Senator Fergusson, I think perhaps Miss MacArthur and I are not as close as the nurses. If you had a nurse here out of the district—. We have asked them for their illustrations and this we find very helpful in our conclusions but I think it is a good question and perhaps one which we might look into on our own.

If we find anything, like that, Senator Fergusson, we will let you know. Certainly we feel that many of the mothers that are working are working because the income of the father is not sufficient to fill the particular needs of these families. What proportion, we would not know.

I think also that the need for day care centres, some type of care for children of working mothers to perhaps prevent some of the latch key children, as they have been called, to have some place particularly for infants to be cared for. This is perhaps the great lack.

Senator Fergusson: You would like to see the day care provisions extended.

Miss Leask: I understand—I am not sure whether this is factual—for instance, the places where infants may be cared for or homes which are recommended for children under the pre-school age are very few in some centres.

The Chairman: This is very true.

Miss Leask: A mother who has a six months old infant has to perhaps find somebody who will look after this infant and I do not know whether there is any assistance in helping to pay for them.

If it is a pre-school child there is perhaps a day care centre. It is my understanding there is very little for the infant.

Senator Inman: I was thinking about these children where the mother is away all day or probably has been ill and there is nobody there. We will say in a case of a cold which is aggravated until it becomes pneumonia. If there. We will say in a case of a cold which is attention it would not have developed to that. Do you find that, not through intentional neglect but it cannot be otherwise.

Miss Leask: I do not think we have any specific instances that we could say because we have not really looked into it.

Miss MacArthur: I think when a mother is ill, they try to get a home-maker in to that home to keep the family together but when she is working there is nothing for her.

Senator Inman: I was thinking of the children. When the mother is working she leaves the child who is ill. She cannot help it. Does that promote illness or is it a cause of illness?

Miss Leask: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: I would like to ask something about the elderly. On Page 1 you refer to the services to elderly people which have increased greatly over the past twenty years. I wonder if Miss Leask or Miss MacArthur could tell us, is that because there are more elderly people in the population or is it because the older people in the population have gotten to know more about the available services? Perhaps it is both.

Miss MacArthur: I think certainly there are more older people in our population now. Older people, if they are ill, can have more chronic illnesses than younger people and I think this is one reason our services to this group have been increased so much.

Senator Fergusson: Because of the increase in the older age group.

Miss MacArthur: That is right.

The Chairman: I think, Senator Fergusson, your second point is important. This older group have an awareness that the service is available and they take advantage of that far more than they ever did before. That is my experience.

Miss Leask: I think perhaps this is true that as the need for services to this group has increased we have perhaps directed more attention to providing it for the older person.

Mrs. Egan: Would it not be also from your home care program, too? You are getting them from the hospitals and into the home and continuing the services and then patient to patient is one way of spreading knowledge of all VON.

Miss MacArthur: I think many of our programs, as Mrs. Egan has mentioned, are referral programs in the hospital where we have a liaison nurse with the hospital and where we have more continuity of care for patients now.

When I came into the Victorian Order, ten years ago, we had a number of stories come in where a patient would come home from hospital and then it was a month before the Victorian Order were called and they would say "why did we not know about this before?"

I do not think I have had one of those in five or six years so I think we have made people more aware.

Senator Fergusson: There is more co-operation between the hospitals.

Miss Leask: And also in the community. We are becoming more aware but we have a long way to go but with the older people, I think we have become better in reaching them or making them aware of our services and better co-ordination of services through home care.

Senator Fergusson: Again on Page 3 it refers to a definition of poverty. Poverty should be defined as psychological and you go on to describe what Michael Harrington has said in "The Other America".

That is psychological but would you be prepared to define poverty in terms of money and would you accept the Economic Council's definition?

Miss MacArthur: I think if they are denied the levels of other levels then money enters into it, does it not.

Miss Leask: Do you mean what level of money will we accept?

Senator Fergusson: I imagine you have not thought this out. You must know about the Economic Council definition. Does that seem to be reasonable.

Miss Leask: Yes. I do not think we considered it, Senator Fergusson, whether we would accept or not. I think we would be glad to give this consideration.

Senator Fergusson: I think that would be nice, if you would.

The Chairman: Yes. You have opened the door indirectly for me. We are going to give you a chance to give it consideration. The Economic Council made a report and in their report they made recommendations as to what they considered to be the poverty line. There is no difficulty getting the report. They set it out for a family of one, two, three, four and five. Perhaps you ought to consider the single family with one and then two with two children the same age and three with children about a similar age or something like that.

Now, what we would like you to do for us is to give us a family budget, urban and rural for these persons, a family of one, two, three, four and five for what you consider to be a completely adequate family budget.

Miss MacArthur: Everything?

The Chairman: Everything, because we are dealing with this in total. We would appreciate you putting in some effort and we say this because, as we said to the other group who were here, you are close to the people. You are knowledgeable, you are certainly grass roots and you ought to know, so would you pass it on to us, please.

Senator Fergusson: I have one other question. I understand that in Ottawa there is an auxiliary to the Board, is that right.

Miss Leask: Yes, Mr. Chairman. We have auxiliaries in a number of branches.

Senator Fergusson: I wanted to ask you how many local branches have an auxiliary.

Miss Leask: I do not think we could give you an exact figure.

Senator Fergusson: No.

Miss Leask: I was going to have to hazard a guess and say 25 at least.

Senator Fergusson: That many?

Miss Leask: That many.

The Chairman: What does this mean?

Miss Leask: In addition to our Board of Management, who are elected through the community and who manage the affairs of the local branch, a number of branches have a Victorian Order Auxiliary which may be the younger people in the community or other people or perhaps some of the older people in the community who do not belong to their Board. Usually their president or chairman belongs to the Board but these auxiliaries do a number of things.

Now in Ottawa there are two for the Ottawa branch and they raise money for bursary assistance to assist nurses to take public health preparation or to take some special program that will further their education or further the care which they can give.

In other branches in Montreal they raise money for cars because the Community Chest or the United Feather does not give them money for cars.

Senator Fergusson: You mean the cars that nurses use.

Miss Leask: Yes. To replace the cars. They raise all their money through the auxiliary. They have another auxiliary which does all the office cleaning for the branch.

Some of the auxiliary they give voluntary service and others raise money for special projects or special services which are not covered by the other funds.

Senator Fergusson: I know in Fredericton that the Board does some of that work but I think to have an auxiliary would be a wonderful thing because it would relieve the Board of those duties.

Miss Leask: And it reaches more people too. You have more people working.

Senator Fergusson: I understand one of the groups in Ottawa not only raises money for different branches but they actually give service such as going out and reading to people who cannot see.

Miss Leask: That is right.

Senator Fergusson: And do other auxiliaries do this?

Miss Leask: Yes. This is another type of service. We call it friendly visiting. You know, we have many older people who have absolutely no one going to see them, for example. This is another type of service by the auxiliary so I think there are a variety of things across the country.

Now, the auxiliary in Hull are the ones that have started the Meals on Wheels program there. They are going to operate it.

Senator Fergusson: I think we should have more information about this because other Boards may like to establish auxiliaries because I did not know about it until I found a friend of mine going out and reading to someone frequently, and she was a very busy woman too; but I am sure there are a lot of people who would like to do a little job like that who cannot enter into a lot of work in an organization but they could perhaps do that once a week.

Miss Leask: Perhaps we could have another article in our newsletter on this.

Senator Fergusson: I think the publicity would be good.

The Chairman: Well, you ladies discuss it because our minutes are widely read by people who do this sort of thing. There is a great demand for the minutes, so there you are. Talk it out. You have done very well.

Senator Fergusson: They have covered quite a lot now.

The Chairman: By the way, in referring to the budget, take a look at the minutes of the meeting of the one involving the Department of National Health and Welfare and you will find family budgets in Canada. Read that particular paragraph and it will help you understand what we are getting at.

Miss MacArthur: All right.

Senator Fournier: I have one more question.

The Chairman: Go ahead.

Senator Fournier: I think we have pretty well covered everything. I might make this little remark. Coming from a small community, compared to a larger community, there is a big difference as far as getting the VON to reach the community.

You sponsoring committee can do a lot of work and you have your VON Day, which is your little tag day where you use the Air Cadets or the Army Cadets to make door to door collections, and so on. This is the method we use at home and we have no difficulty in raising $5,000.00 once a year. Then on the nurses card there are advertisements which are well known.

I must say that when the poor people see your card in a French area, la nurse du gouvernement, the government nurse, it serves the purpose and I do not object to that.

For the purposes of the record, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask these few questions, if you think they have any merit. What is the population required and how do we apply for a VON organization? Very few people know about that, I would imagine.

Miss Leask: Mr. Chairman, there is no set population. I should say we have VON nurses in communities from 5,000 to large metropolitan areas of over one million and I would feel a community with less than 5,000 would probably need several communities to go together in order to provide sufficient work.

Senator Fournier: How do I make an application? To whom do I write?

Miss Leask: The national office has been given the responsibility of initiating with a community the development of services but the request may come to a branch or to any place. Eventually it reaches our office in Ottawa. It is from there that we arrange for a regional director or supervisor, who is a member of our national office staff—we have eleven across Canada—each of them have an area of Canada for which they are responsible; so the regional person in that area within the community talks to the interested persons, do a survey if they wish of the needs of the community, the possibilities of organizing, help to organize the provincial committee which will be responsible for the original organization and fund-raising, and then when the community has the financial support and public meetings which shows the community wishes these services, then we will recommend a nurse.

Senator Fournier: No more questions.

The Chairman: Your application has just been dealt with favourably.

Miss Leask: Write to us and we will carry on from there.

Senator Inman: I have one question I would like to ask. If a VON nurse went into a home where there was some illness and there were three or four children, and she found conditions such that there was not adequate food for the next meal and it was cold and there was not enough fuel, what sources could that nurse contact to have something done quickly?

Miss Leask: Well, I would say in most places it would be their welfare department that she would turn to immediately, or if that was not a source, one of your church groups, the Salvation Army, one of the agencies in the community. I think most welfare departments have an emergency service now from which you can get immediate help but I think she would use all the resources, both of the government services, welfare services, or volunteer services in the community.

The Chairman: Are there any more questions?

Senator Fournier: Even the mounted police sometimes to activate the welfare people.

Miss Leask: I was going to say in addition to the fireman answering our phone, the mounted police do it in some places. We have various people.

Senator Fournier: We use them at home. They are very effective.

Senator Quart: Incidentally, I understand in Woodstock, they had a good program for Meals on Wheels, is going back to it again.

The Chairman: Brantford?

Senator Inman: At Woodstock.

The Chairman: In Nova Scotia?

Senator Quart: No; in Ontario. At a local council meeting in London, Ontario, one group suggested starting Meals on Wheels and someone said, "Well, maybe we should contact the Victorian Order of Nurses," so you are really becoming known for Meals on Wheels.

The Chairman: I think I should say this to the Victorian Order of Nurses: our association—with the Victorian Order of Nurses dates back many, many years. My own association goes back more than a quarter of a century when I first knew them; I think I express to you what perhaps needs saying, and that is, there is a very warm spot in the heart of Canadians for the kind of service that you bring.

You are spread much too thin but on the other hand, we who know what you are doing are very proud of the work that you are doing and the dedication that you have to that work.

We are very happy that you took the time to make a brief and to come before us. We are glad to see you. You have been before other committees on other occasions and have been helpful. You have been helpful here today. On behalf of the Committee I express my sincere thanks.

Miss Leask: Thank you very much, sir.
The committee adjourned.

SUBMISSION
TO THE
SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

To Special Senate Committee on Poverty

The Canadian Nurses' Association wishes to preface this submission with an expression of appreciation to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty for the opportunity to record observations and recommendations on this subject.

Summary and Recommendations

The profession of nursing in Canada is concerned with the total health care of individuals, families and communities. The traditional role of the nurse is the care of the sick; of equal importance in the context of total health care is the role of the nurse in the prevention of illness and the maintenance of health. This dual role involves the nurse and the nursing profession in the social and economic structure within which man moves and creates the environment on which much of his well-being depends.

There are, within the Canadian Nurses' Association, more than 82,000 professional nurses providing constant attention to a vast cross-section of our population. By the nature of nursing, the professional nurse is constantly exposed to various aspects of poverty and is continuously aware of the cause-and-effect relationship between economic and physical or mental distress. By the sheer weight of numbers in combination with the nature of their work, the nursing profession probably has more experience with poverty and its effects than any other segment of the Canadian population. The circumstances of massive exposure deter us from documentation in depth of the question of poverty and lead us to set out for examination only broad, general, but emphatic, impressions.

An axiom of good medical or nursing care is to treat the cause rather than the symptoms. Tragically often, in the experience of the professional nurse, the cause of illness is rooted in economic conditions which are beyond the jurisdiction of nursing care and non-responsive to the healing arts. It is against this background that we speak of poverty in relation to health.

In raising our voice at this time we are aware that we must record observations and make recommendations that are costly and that we do not feel competent in all cases to recommend how these costs could or should be met. We believe, however, that the health of our population is of vital concern to the people of Canada;

the cost of health services is rising and will continue to rise; poverty is a major, contributing cause of ill health and an impediment to the maintenance of good health; to the extent that poverty, as a contributing cause of ill health, can be removed or mitigated, the total cost of health care will be decreased.

The nature of the recommendations we propose to make later in his brief is summarized as follows:

(a) Provision be made for the education and effective use of more public health and other types of nurses as a means of preventing illness as well as speeding recovery.

(b) More effort be devoted to experimenting to seek better methods of bringing health care to the poor and, simultaneously, greater efforts should be made to coordinate the knowledge and services of health and welfare agencies at the delivery level.

(c) More consideration be given to establishing an economic level at which good health can be maintained not only by the dependent poor but also by the independent ent poor, whose meagre, but hard-won savings from an earlier period in our economic history are depreciated by inflation.

Background of the CNA

1. The Canadian Nurses' Association is composed of a federation of ten provincial nurses' associations, and is the only organization that represents the professional nurses of Canada on a national and international basis. The national association was formed in 1908 as a federation by existing provincial registered nurses' organizations to establish a unified national body for the purpose of improving the quality of nursing care for all Canadians. It was incorporated as the Canadian Nurses' Association in 1947 by a special Act of Parliament.

2. The CNA is the largest professional organization in the health field in Canada and has a membership of 82,826¹ nurses. Membership in CNA and the International Council of Nurses is obtained through membership in one of the provincial associations.

3. To work effectively at its assigned tasks, to remain truly representative of all its members, the CNA is organized in such a manner that it draws its strength and authority from the provincial associations while remaining national in outlook and conduct. Authority and responsibility for the direction of CNA are delegated to the Board of Directors by the members of CNA. The members of the Board come from the provincial nurses' associations and serve voluntarily, without remuneration.

4 The Board is composed of a representative from each of the provincial associations—this is normally the president, an elective office in the provincial association; the chairmen of each of the three standing committees, Nursing Service, Nursing Education and Social and Economic Welfare (the chairmen of these committees are appointed by the Board); two members of the nursing sisterhoods; the president-elect; two vice-presidents; and the president.

5 The objectives of the Association are as follows:

(a) to formulate policies in the field of nursing service, nursing education, employment relations, for the purpose of advising the provincial associations with regard to the maintenance and improvement of the ethical and professional standards of nursing education and nursing service, and the economic standards of nursing employment, and

(b) to provide effective media for exchange of information within the association and with other organizations.

6. The promotion of health is the basis of the profession's concept of nursing care. A nurse's ultimate goal is the maintenance of good health of the individual. CNA's program and policies provide the means to promote the highest standards of nursing practice to the end that the best possible level of health service may be available to all Canadians.

7. CNA recognizes the need for all disciplines, organizations and agencies or officials responsible for health services to Canadians to work in concert toward their common objectives. Its policies facilitate and invite this community of effort.

Definition of poverty

8. Many definitions of poverty have been submitted to the Senate Committee. Ours is not original but combines the thoughts of other writers and gives us a starting point from which to discuss poverty and its implications as nurses see it.

9. We recognize that poverty may be intellectual, social, spiritual, financial, perceptual in nature and that it could be described as the:

"inability to provide from one's own resources the necessary food, shelter, comfort and developmental opportunity for one's self or family adequate to ensure optimum health and satisfying self-expression."²

10. Examples without number exist of situations in which poverty of one kind or another, or a combination of some or all factors, affects the health of an individual or a whole family. Everything that goes into making one "poor" has an effect on health—dirty, decrepit, crowded, inadequate housing; lack of education; lack of food, lack of suitable clothing; and inaccessibility or lack of health services result in illness and because of illness, the poor are unable to take advantage of opportunities that could lift them out of their poverty. Ill health and poverty literally feed on each other in a vicious circle of cause and effect.

Why Canadian nurses are concerned about poverty and health

11. The concern of nurses for the poor and underprivileged has its roots in the very origin of professional nursing, generally attributed to the era of Florence Nightingale and, in Canada, to Jeanne Mance. Visiting the "sick poor" to provide nursing care and to bring the message of health by practical demonstration has always been an essential part of nursing. Added to this approach and more basic, since it provided the impetus to visit, was the humanitarian concern for the unique worth of every individual. Technological aspects, with their tremendous diversity of knowledge and fields of specialization, have become more pronounced in recent years but have not obscured the intrinsic compassion of nursing.

12. As a result of the increase in specialization in nursing, some branches of the profession encounter today's poverty more bluntly than others. Of these branches, public health nurses engaged in home visiting are likely to see the most forceful impact of poverty on health. Other nurses in hospital admitting offices, out-patient departments, physicians' and clinic offices are in contact with different aspects of poverty; bedside nurses see yet another side of poverty—its long-term effect on the individual patient. Thus, nursing as a profession considers that it has a vital concern with poverty and a vital contribution to offer to the present deliberations on poverty and health.

Commentary on poverty and health

13. It is difficult for nurses to stick to the narrow confines of what most of the public regard as "nursing" when they are so well aware of the factors that produce the conditions they are trying, in their own way, to cure or improve.

When a nurse, in visiting an unemployed, employable man, who has worn out his last decent pair of shoes, suggests where he might get a used pair for 50c to enable him to go for a job interview, she is well aware of the inadequacy of income and its eventual effect on health.

When a nurse sympathizes with a mother who says she will have to start milking the cows at 4:00 a.m. in order to catch the bus at 7:30 a.m. to keep a 9 o'clock appointment at an outpatient clinic miles away in the city, where the nurse knows she will probably be left to wait till 11:00 a.m. before she is seen, the nurse is well aware of the inaccessibility of health services.

When a nurse arrives at a school to find a six-year old huddled in the entrance on a frosty morning clad in a thin jacket and trousers, with both feet frozen because he is wearing rubber boots and no socks, she is well aware of the inadequacy of some mothers to care for children.

14. Countless examples of what poverty and the concomitants of poverty have done to the physical and mental health of families and individuals could be found in the health records of the poor, but the demoralizing and debilitating effects are difficult to measure. Nurses become discouraged, frustrated and angry at their helplessness to bring about change in the basic problems of poverty. The costly and sometimes futile expenditure of energy and money are wasted unless some one is able to tackle and solve these problems.

15. Nurses, who are daily exposed to the adverse influence of poverty on health must ask: Why, in this age of expansion of the economy in Canada, must we have one-fifth of the population existing in poverty? Must we wait until slum areas of cities collapse before we can see people decently housed at rents that bear some reasonable relationship to their incomes? Need we have the dirty, depressing, dangerous buildings in our cities, towns and rural areas that go under the name of "homes" for far too many of our citizens? Architects and planners and builders know how to make decent low-cost housing now. Surely this must be a priority in Canada?

16. The waiting lists of old people who are desperate to get into some decent kind of housing would be available from every organized community in Canada. So limited is this accommodation that many of these people will die before they ever reach the top of the list.

17. There is no need here to stress the effects of over-crowding, of lack of privacy, of filthy, poorly-lit, depressing environments on the health and welfare of the residents—it is self-evident—but nurses struggle with the results of such conditions constantly.

18. Why is it so difficult to persuade people that an ounce of prevention is still worth a pound of cure and that to prevent illness is cheaper and wiser than to treat it after it develops? We are well aware that the poor are at a disadvantage when it comes to using available services, but for that very reason we should increase the public health staffs so that concentrated effort could be spent on the groups at risk—the old, the multi-problem family, the deprived, the inadequate—in our communities.

19. It takes long, sustained effort to bring about measurable improvement because improvements involve change and change in health habits involves not doing things "to" or "for" but "with" such groups.

20. Nurses are concerned also with the greater numbers who could use more nursing help in their home environments, yet the percentage of nurses engaged in public health has decreased over the years. Communities now contain many people who formerly were expected to get their health care in hospitals. Tuberculosis patients are living and working in their communities—not lying in hospital beds. Mentally ill are being treated and returned to their homes, elderly people with chronic health problems are living longer and staying at home with their illness because they cannot get into hospitals; many retarded children are kept at home now; surgery patients are discharged earlier. There are more one-parent families, more illegitimate children² and more unmarried mothers keeping their babies. Many of these mothers could use more knowledge of child nurture. The progress of medicine and medical research and the emphasis on rehabilitation has made it possible for many more people to be active and contributing members of the community.

21. At the same time, many of this growing group need help—nursing care or supervision or health teaching—to maintain their health status. Family planning information should be readily available to all segments and much of this kind of education can be done only by individual teaching.

22. Why, for example, is it so hard to persuade the public that such simple preventive procedure as fluoridation of water supplies would benefit dental health, particularly important to the "poor" who rate dental care very low on their priority list?

23. Why can we not be more imaginative and effective in our programs of health service? Fragmentation, gaps in service, inaccessibility, overlapping, lack of coordination, all plague the health institutions and baffle the poor.

24. Could not governments encourage experimentation with such programs as neighborhood health centers located near enough to depressed areas that the family could get to them easily and where they could get complete family care, where there would be screening, possibly first level treatment and easy access to further care, medical or otherwise?

25. Could we not make real efforts to bring about the coordination of programs designed to help the poor? The work of the Special Planning Secretariat to date is being effective in this field and its work should go on. But whatever planning is done in far-away offices will only be effective if carried on by the actual field workers who see the families.

26. Not too many years ago in one Canadian city it was possible that one family might have as many as twenty different health, welfare or educational workers visiting their homes at different times—each with a legitimate concern for some aspect of the family's welfare. The time of many skilled workers was largely wasted because there was no coordination of effort, not to mention the family's feeling of being fragmented, confused and unable to use most of the services offered. Fortunately, in that city that kind of duplication and confusion is being replaced by pre-planning and conferences as to who will be responsible for what service.

27. Would not health departments be logical agencies to take the lead in bringing about such coordination of services? The Area Development Project conducted in a metropolitan area in western Canada, demonstrates what might be accomplished with acute problem-families if services were integrated through one worker, such experiments should continue, but they need encouragement.

28. Today the consumers of health and welfare services are no longer content to quietly accept, or more often reject, the services provided for them. They are vocal and in some areas organized and outspoken about what they want. We need to listen and encourage the poor to help us provide what they see as their pressing needs. The "Opportunities Program and Opportunities Allowances for Persons on Social Assistance" started by a group of indignant welfare recipients, is an attempt to operate self-help activities and to train and move into employment the various senior citizens organizations; the Indian Brotherhood's expressed concerns are some examples that there is an aroused interest in demanding their "rights". There is indeed a "revolution of rising expectations" as Adlai Stevenson expressed it.

29. Rather than being irritated we should capitalize on this concern and make use of "natural leaders" in the group. In many instances they could be trained to work with public health agencies, to teach basic health practices. The Department of Indian and Northern Affairs has made good use of this idea in their training of community health workers (see Appendix 5).

The elderly citizen

30. Probably one of the groups which nurses see in growing number and which arouses their feeling of helplessness more than any other group, is the old. The old man in his single room cooking his two meals a day on an electric plate at the foot of his bed; the slightly senile old lady, muddling along in her cheerless basement room; the old couple desperately trying to hang on to the home they have lived in for years when incomes are dwindling to the point that all they will cover is too high a rent and the barest of meals.

31. The number of old people is growing as people live longer—in 1961, 7.6 per cent were over 65 (1,600,000)—by 1971 there will probably be 8 per cent (1,800,000).

32. Visiting nurse organizations such as the V.O.N. could supply countless examples of the elderly sick who are trying to stay in their own homes as long as they can manage. More planning should be done to see that this segment of the population has suitable care available. Their needs might range from acute care in general hospitals with rehabilitation, to extended care in a less costly facility, to nursing home care, to boarding home care, to living in their own homes with available homemaking and nursing care as required.

33. Alberta has provided us with one example of good institutional care for the elderly but good as it is it does not provide the complete answer to this problem.

34. The possibility of having day care centers similar to the Baycrest Hospital Plan in Toronto would help old people not only to live longer in the community but would help them to live more fully.

35. Geriatric centers such as those operated in Vancouver^a and health maintenance clinics for senior citizens as conducted in London^b would also be practical ways to put old people in touch with needed care.

The role of public health nurses

36. More than 80 per cent of employed professional nurses work in hospitals or institutions where they have limited opportunity to exercise an educational influence on the prevention of illness and the maintenance of health. Greater opportunities to pursue the health concept that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure are afforded nurses who see patients in their homes or their communities. This function is usually carried out by public health nurses (Appendix 1).

37. To understand why public health nurses have a particular concern with poverty and its effects, it is necessary to enlarge upon the role of the 7,900 nurses who are presently engaged in public health work in Canada (Appendix 1). They are the "front line" workers in the unending battle to improve the health of the total population. A large proportion of the public will never use their service directly, but the service is still needed to maintain the health level of the community (Appendix 2).

38. Once the "routine" services are established for all, the nurse's time is spent with the ones who have the greatest need for help in achieving or maintaining better health (Appendix 3).

39. The largest number of public health nurses (5,728) work for federal, provincial or local health departments or the few visiting nurses services and are assigned definite districts (Appendix 1). They become known as the "community health nurse" and, in turn, come to know their communities as probably no other single category or worker ever does. The visiting nurse services are the main resource in giving bedside care in the home.

40. They come to know the "poor through their visits to homes either to give bedside nursing care, or when offering assistance with health problems. They see the children of the poor in schools where they are all too readily visible as being different; they meet them in waiting rooms of well baby centers, of tuberculosis and venereal disease clinics; in the crowded waiting rooms of outpatient centers; in nursing and boarding homes where many of the elderly poor must end their days; on the Indian reserves and in the Eskimo villages.

41. Special mention should be made of the group of public health nurses who work in the isolated areas of Canada, either with the Department of Northern Affairs or with Provincial Health Departments in remote spots or at Red Cross Outpost Hospitals (Appendix 4). They have responsibilities over and beyond those usually associated with public health nurses (see Appendix 4) and they come in touch with a large segment of Canada's poor.

42. The preparation of a public health nurse is, therefore, important. She must be a qualified nurse with preparation in public health obtained at a university. She must be able to serve all age groups, both the well and the sick, in a great variety of environments. She must have knowledge of cultural differences, of human behavior, of sociological implications. She must have specific knowledge of such problems as drug addition, alcoholism, mental illness. She must, in her field, be competent at communications, at dynamics, in coordination.

43. The preparation of public health nurses—as indeed of all nurses—cannot remain static, but must change as demands for health care change.

Shortage of prepared staff

44. If public health nurses are going to be able to do all the tasks expected of them, and particularly if more use can be made of their talents in the war on poverty, there must be more of them.

45. The percentage of nurses working in public health in relation to the total number employed has remained almost the same over the past years, while the need for their services has grown rapidly.

46. In 1966, 8.6 per cent of the total number of professional nurses employed in Canada were working in public health, (general public health, schools, occupational health, visiting nursing). In 1968, this figure was only 8.3 per cent and of these only 6 per cent were in general public health and visiting nurse positions. If the visiting nurse services are examined separately, it is seen that the percentage has also decreased from 1.5 per cent to 1 per cent in 1965.

47. The lure of other occupations and professions and the shortage of funds in employing agencies would probably account for the decreasing numbers.

Recommendations

48. Professional nurses are not economists but they can be considered front line workers in helping those embedded in poverty to extricate themselves and to have opportunities to lead healthier lives. To enable nursing to yield a full measure of benefit in terms of improve health and reduced health care costs, requires changes in our socio-economic approach to the problem of poverty and its effects on health. Fully aware of our lack of expertise in the field of economics, we submit that money intelligently spent to maintain good health and to improve health is not a cost, but rather it is an investment. Some of the more obvious areas where these circumstances prevail are identified in the following recommendations.

1. More staff be prepared and provided in the public health field.

2. More encouragement and money be made available to experiment with new ways of bringing health services to the poor (see Appendix 6).

3. More effective efforts be made to coordinate the services of health and welfare agencies at the level of delivery so that there would be less fragmentation, more continuity and better quality care.

4. More attempts be made to train natural leaders in community settings to assume some responsibilities in the health program for their group (see Appendix 5).

5. Allowances be provided for the dependent segment of the population at a level and in such a way as to preserve the dignity and worth of the individual.

6. The plight of the "independent" poor (those on fixed pensions for example) be examined and steps taken to ensure that their income is at least as good as the dependent poor.

7. A much extended program be undertaken for health care for the elderly poor from provision of adequate assistance to help them remain at home, to sufficient and suitable facilities for all levels of care, according to their needs.

8. More financial assistance be made available to prepare the increasing numbers of nurses to work, not only in the present community programs but to prepare them to work in the programs of the future.

9. Renewed and sustained efforts be made to improve housing. Canada has built up good housing legislation, but it is not being used to meet more than a fraction of the need.

10. Proven effective preventative measures such as fluoridation of water supplies be enforced. In 1967 only 4,324,000 people lived in areas where water was fluoridated.⁷

BRIEF TO THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

by the

Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada

Mr. Chairman:

We have the honour to present a brief from the Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada.

In 1961-62 briefs were presented to the Royal Commission on Health Services in the nine provinces in which branches were established, and from the national organization.

In 1964 a brief was submitted to the Special Senate Committee on Aging of which you were also the Chairman. We have not, therefore, included detailed general information about the overall services in this brief, but have tried to point out the special problems related to poverty.

This brief is respectfully submitted by the Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada and will be presented by:

Mrs. E. J. Egan

Mr. F. W. Troop

Miss Jean Leask

Miss Christine MacArthur

VI. Possible Solutions for Assuring Better Health Care for the Poor

VII. Conclusions

VIII. Appendix

I. INTRODUCTION

1. When we were asked to make a submission to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty we did not feel we had sufficient data documented to be able to substantiate any statements we might put forth. However, since we do provide service to all economic levels in nine provinces, it was suggested that our experience would provide the basis for certain assumptions in relation to poverty. No study was undertaken, but anecdotal information as outlined in the attached appendix was obtained from representative branches in all provinces and using this and their additional comments as well as statistical data available, we have attempted to portray some of our concerns and some of the ways in which persons in the lower economic level may be helped to achieve their maximum potential and live in dignity with a sense of worth.

II. BACKGROUND INFORMATION

2. The Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada is a national, voluntary public health nursing organization whose primary function is to provide a visiting nursing service in its 90 branches located in nine provinces. Other services are undertaken to fill a need for service which is not being offered by another agency or to initiate or demonstrate a service which should be developed.

3. The service given by a Victorian Order nurse is centered not only on the individual receiving care, but on that individual as a member of a family in a community "an individual whose illness and health, mental, physical and emotional, will be influenced by, and will influence the health and illness of others members of that family and that community".¹ In providing skilled nursing care on a visit basis, each nurse can care for a number of patients in any one day.

4. For over seventy years Victorian Order nurses have been helping sick and disabled people maintain and regain their health and usefulness. In the past 20 years, the number of elderly people who have been assisted to carry on their daily lives within the familiar surroundings of their own homes, has shown a marked increase. Patients in the older age group not only prefer to remain in the community, but often make better progress at home. To be able to do this, a variety of services may be necessary. For some, shopping and household cleaning are a burden, some are not able or have not proper facilities to cook meals which are balanced and nutritious. For these people part-time homemakers and meals on wheels services are a decided benefit. In a few branches the Victorian Order is administering these services as an adjunct to the nursing service. As a result, more people can remain in their own homes. In providing nursing service, conditions arising in related areas such as economic, housing, social, reflect on the efficacy of care.

5. Visiting nursing has been associated with poverty since the beginning of time when the church sent out deaconesses to care for the sick poor. The first non-sectarian visiting nursing service was started in England in 1859 by William Rathbone and was also to assist the poor. In 1893 the Henry Street Visiting Nursing Service in New York City was established to aid the sick and the destitute and in 1897 the Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada was founded. One of its original objects was to alleviate the hardships and deprivation of women and children in outlying areas where many were living under poverty conditions.

6. Because the Victorian Order has always given care to persons requiring it regardless of their ability to pay, for many decades the major part of the service was provided to people only able to pay part of the fee or those unable to pay anything. This was particularly true during the depression years. With the advent of hospital insurance and social assistance programs, and now medicare, there is a feeling that health needs are being met.

7. As already mentioned, the Victorian Order has no statistical information on poverty per se, but we do have a fee structure which is based on the cost of service with a sliding scale according to the patient's financial ability to pay. From the overall service statistics for 1969, it is determined that 168,669 (14 per cent) visits were classified as free and 336,337 (27 per cent) visits were paid for by government under existing legislation for welfare assistance. This does not include visits paid for under Home Care Programs and many of these visits would have fallen into these two categories. In addition to these, there were 314,502 (25 per cent) visits made to patients who could only pay a part of the fee. Many of these people are managing on very limited resources, but want to pay even a small amount rather than subject themselves to a needs test. Since service is given only when requested, it can be assumed that there are many instances when poor persons could benefit from a visiting nursing service, but they are not aware it is available to them.

III. DEFINITION OF POVERTY

8. In determining the criteria for poverty, we liked the definition from "The Other America" by Michael Harrington. He states, "Poverty should be defined in terms of those who are denied the minimal levels of health, housing, food and education that our present stage of scientific knowledge specifies as necessary for life as it is now lived in the United States. Poverty should be defined psychologically in terms of those whose place in society is such that they are internal exiles who almost inevitably develop attitudes of defeat and pessimism and who are, therefore, excluded from taking advantage of new opportunities".¹ Although this statement refers to United States, it could apply to Canada.

IV. CONCERN RE POVERTY

9. For many centuries it has been recognized that there is a relationship between poverty and ill health. Economic deprivation and low standard living conditions have been associated with high rates of disease and death. In 1910 the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company arranged to have visiting nurses attend certain sick policy holders in their homes because of the high mortality rate among this low income group. There was a decided improvement in the mortality rate and this service was continued for fifty years when more comprehensive health services were being made available. Even with the emergence of extensive community health programs, malnutrition, disease and poverty are still wide spread. Since World War II the standard of living has risen generally. Medical insurance programs have been initiated and social welfare assistance has been implemented so it would seem that poverty should be eliminated or greatly reduced except for those hard core areas. But it is very clear that poverty and its attendant ills are not vanishing and it would appear that there is a greater segment of the population living under poverty conditions than there were in the so-called 'lean years' of the thirties. Contributing factors are increasing cost of food, housing and other necessities and the larger number of older people who are dependent on social security pension, savings or personal pensions which are now inadequate. Unemployment is a major factor in some areas and it is more pronounced in certain seasons. Unemployment is also accentuated by lack of necessary skills or education. Another large group affected by poverty is women with young families whose husbands have died or deserted. However, the greatest amount of poverty seems to exist in that increasing group of disabled, retired and aged persons. In the Victorian Order about 75 per cent of our service is to persons over 65 years of age who for the most part, are living on very limited incomes, often the old age security pension only. They are independent and want to remain in their own home—be it only a small room.

V. PROBLEMS ENCOUNTERED IN PROVIDING SERVICE

10. The Victorian Order is primarily interested in the health needs of all citizens but physical health is so closely inter-related and dependent on other factors such as income, housing, nutrition, mental and emotional health that they cannot be ignored. However, our comments will be confined primarily to health services.

11. Although it would seem with the advent of hospital and medical insurance plans in all provinces, the health needs of the citizens should be adequately met, there are still many people who are not getting the care they require. With the exception of the Home Care Programs established in a relatively few areas, there has been no provision for visiting nursing service in the insurance plans. It has been demonstrated that with medical and nursing care, many people could be cared for effectively and economically in their own homes where with the support of their families and friends, recovery and rehabilitation is strengthened.

12. At the present time almost everyone has coverage for hospitalization and many are not willing to pay the additional cost for care at home. The Canada Assistance Act does make provision for payment for service to persons receiving public assistance, but this is permissive legislation in most provinces and even when enacted, is only available to those persons who meet the restricting criteria for assistance. The Victorian Order maintains its policy that care is never refused because of financial inability to pay. About three quarters of the branches are members of Community Chests and great pressure is being put on the Victorian Order by these Chests to secure payment for service from welfare programs. Limitation of funds has a restricting influence on the development of programs and on services which could be directed to the great numbers of medically indigent people.

13. Unfortunately social assistance is not generally available to the medically indigent or those just above the poverty level. These people may be able to manage the necessities of life, but any additional is a real hardship.

14. Some situations related to health services and common to all areas across Canada are presented for consideration.

Nutrition

15. Poor nutrition is reflected in poor health. Lack of proper food may be due to lack of income, inadequate cooking facilities, lack of knowledge about household management or lack of physical ability to cope with shopping and meal preparation. In an affluent country as Canada now is, it is incredible that so many people are not receiving the basic nutritional requisites. Lack of income would seem to be the major reason for poor nutrition. If a person is on a special diet, food cost are often prohibitive and there is little provision in welfare assistance for these exigencies. Inadequate cooking facilities are a common lack, particularly among older people who are often living in one room. Many of these people have no refrigeration and only a hot plate to cook on. Obviously they cannot prepare nutritional meals. Meals on wheels services have been instituted in some areas and the provision of a hot, nutritious meal has changed the physical and mental outlook for these people. Since these programs have been organized and supported almost entirely by voluntary effort, they are fairly limited. In some instances only one meal a week is provided, the most is five meals a week. If these services were supported by public funds they could be initiated and expanded so that anyone in need of such service would have it available. The resulting improvement in health would be inestimable.

Housekeeping Service

16. More recently there has been recognition by some governments that a housekeeping service assists in maintaining family unity and also make it possible for a person to return home early from hospital. A part-time housekeeping service also assists older people to maintain their own homes and to remain in them rather than being institutionalized. The cost of housekeeping service has been escalating as have other costs and today there are few people who can afford the full fee for this necessary service. Some type of subsidization is indicated if people are to receive the services they require to maintain health and well-being.

Housing

17. As already mentioned, housing is a real problem for people in the lower income brackets. This has particular reference for families with young children and older people. Our branches in Vancouver and London did a one-day survey of their patients when we requested information for this brief and in Vancouver, 33 families were living in sub-standard housing; in London there were 12. This could be multiplied many times across the country. Poor housing affects physical health, but it can have a devastating effect on mental health and attitudes. Again some efforts have been made to eradicate slums and provide low cost housing, but developments are very slow. There is a great need for various types of accommodation, for example low rent housing for families with children, housing units for older people where they can get the services they require, convalescent homes and nursing homes. These latter should have standards set down and regular supervision provided.

Special Needs

18. Under the present arrangements for health care, there is no provision to meet the special needs of patients requiring eye glasses, dental care and particularly dentures, hearing aids, artificial limbs or special appliances. These aids make it possible for a person to retain his involvement in the world around him. Without them he is often cut off from society and can deteriorate to a state of loneliness and despair. Assistance for these aids at present is, for the most part, secured from voluntary groups. Frequently a great deal of nursing time is used in acquiring these aids for patients.

Central Information Centre

19. Many people are not familiar with the resources in their community and there is a need for a central information centre where anyone can be directed to the facility which can best meet their existing need. The telephone number and address of the centre should be well publicized so that it is readily accessible at all times. Older people particularly are uncertain about where to get help.

Co-ordination of Services

20. Although there are many health and welfare programs in operation, in most areas there is a lack of communication between agencies which may result in overlapping or in no service at all. The Victorian Order has endeavoured to initiate referral programs in all hospitals in their branch area to provide for continuity of care when patients leave the hospital. There has always been a plan with nursing staff in departments of health for the referral of patients to avoid duplication of service. But as far as individual go, communication with other agencies or departments leaves much to be desired, and in seeking help they are frequently shuffled from office to office with no personal interest in their problem.

21. In some areas there is fragmentation of service with a number of agencies providing the same basic service. For example, in one area, four agencies provide placement for neglected children, three agencies provide housekeeping service, three agencies provide non-profit day nurseries, eighteen organizations are involved in rehabilitation of the aged and the physically and mentally handicapped. Thus a family may be receiving service from three or four agencies with little or no communication between them unless they all arrive at the home at the same time.

22. There could be some form of central registry where families were listed and any agency involved with the family noted. It would need to go further than this if an objective plan was to be made for communication between agencies so that the best interests of individuals and families were met.

Counselling Service

23. Generally speaking, counselling services in the past have been considered a function of social workers but with the emphasis on educational programs, counselling is the responsibility of all disciplines and should be integrated into their basic service.

24. There is a great need for education and counselling for young adults on marriage, family responsibilities, housekeeping and budgetting and this is particularly true in the low income group where the tendency is to take the line of least resistance or just give up. In a few areas projects have been initiated whereby a housekeeper goes into the home to show the housewife how to make the best use of what she has to the best advantage. These projects have been quite successful, but they need to be expanded into more areas. Such education would have a decided effect on the mental and physical health of families.

25. For the first decade of this century, health programs emphasized prevention of communicable disease which was related to infants and young children. The success of these programs resulted in more infants reaching adulthood and with increased scientific knowledge these adults are living longer so that we now have large numbers of persons in the over 65 age bracket. Although more attention is being focused on this group, there are still many gaps and inadequacies in services.

26. One need is for a counselling service where older people can talk about their concerns and receive guidance and help. In Vancouver the Silver Threads Club asked the Victorian Order to provide a nurse for a short period each week at the Centre to be available for consultation with anyone wishing help. The time was increased until it is now full time and a doctor is also available. This counselling service has been valuable in seeing that persons get medical care early if indicated; in helping with interpretation and follow-up of physician's orders and in giving these people the assurance that there is someone readily available who can give them the help they need. Medications are checked when possible, diet is stressed and information on low cost meals is given. Follow-up visits to persons' homes are made when necessary. Other community services are interpreted to them.

27. Similar centres have been set up in a few other areas, but they have not as yet become an accepted program in all communities. Since most communities now have Goden Mile Clubs it would be a simple matter to have a counselling service included.

Transportation

28. One of the difficulties the poor encounter in obtaining health services is lack of transportation. Most hospitals, out-patients departments, doctor's clinics and offices are located in central areas and people have to travel a distance to get any medical attention. Few physicians make home visits. If a mother has to take a sick child to the doctor she has to find someone to look after the other children and get herself and the sick child to the doctor's office or clinic. Taxis are prohibitive in price and public transportation is not always available or possible. Therefore many people neglect to procure necessary medical care. Older people find it exceedingly difficult to travel by themselves to clinics or to their physician for medical attention.

VI. POSSIBLE SOLUTIONS FOR ASSURING BETTER HEALTH CARE FOR THE POOR

29. Disraeli said "The wealth of a nation is dependent on the health of that nation". Conversely we could say the health of a nation is dependent on the wealth of a nation. There are many inter-related factors concerning health in addition to economic ones. We shall outline a few areas where we believe the Victorian Order could be used to improve health care services generally but more specifically as related to the poor.

30. The present Medicare legislation makes no provision for nursing service for people ill at home. If this were included as a benefit many people could be cared for in their own homes, rather than using the expensive facilities of a hospital. The nurse who visits in the home not only gives care to the sick members but recognizes other needs of the family and gives necessary counselling and guidance for good health practices. She is able to refer families to other sources for help.

31. Since few physicians make home visits any more, a plan to have a public health nurse attached to a physician's practice would enhance the care to patients. This nurse could be the liaison between the patient and the doctor. She would be able to meet some of the needs of patients and refer to the physician only those requiring his knowledge and skill. With this plan health services would be made more accessible to the poor. In order to encourage the initiation of this type of co-operative care there would need to be some provision made under medicare for the payment of the nurse's services.

32. Because of the problem of transportation for mothers with small children and for older people in getting to hospitals for medical attention, it is suggested that community health centres be set up in each neighbourhood where people could go for medical supervision and treatment, rather than travelling to a distant out-patient department or clinic. Public health nurses would be part of the team at the centre. In such a centre a patient would relate to the community health centre as his health resource and he could establish a personal relationship to a health professional who was most relevant to his problem. Preventive activities could be carried out. The atmosphere would be pleasant and friendly. In addition follow-up home visits could be arranged when indicated.

VII. CONCLUSIONS

33. In spite of scientific advances in medical technology and provision for Medicare and social assistance programs in our affluent society, there are still many people in Canada who are not receiving the health care services they require. Families and individuals at the low and marginal income level are particularly bereft of the most elementary requirements of our society today. Ill health is perhaps the most constant attendant of poverty. Ill health and poverty are frequently linked in a vicious cycle through inadequate nutrition, clothing, housing and unsanitary conditions. Low income and lack of education are contributing factors.

34. Existing legislation has been helpful in alleviating some of the problems but we in the Victorian Order believe if the Medicare benefits were extended to include visiting nursing service this could make a significant contribution to improvement in the health of the disadvantaged. We also would like to see social assistance programs extended to include those people in the 'gray' area just above the poverty level.

35. If the suggested ancillary services outlined in this brief are to be implemented, funds must be made available to support the expansion of programs which will improve the health and well-being of the increasing numbers of poor and near poor so that they may have an opportunity to lead productive, healthy, rewarding and happy lives. Man is a social being and his health cannot be considered apart from the societal context and the culture in which he exists. The Victorian Order is concerned with the whole man and with all men.

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Tuesday, October 28, 1969:

"The Honourable Senator Croll moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to investigate and report upon all aspects of poverty in Canada, whether urban, rural regional or otherwise, to define and elucidate the problem of poverty in Canada, and to recommend appropriate action to ensure the establishment of a more effective structure of remedial measures;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisors as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time;

That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to adjourn from place to place;

That the evidence taken on the subject during the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Bélisle, Carter, Cook, Croll, Eudes, Everett, Fergusson, Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), Hastings, Inman, Lefrançois, McGrand, Pearson, Quart, Roebuck and Sparrow.

After debate,

In amendment, the Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Burchill, that the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by striking out paragraph 4 thereof and substituting therefor the following:—

"That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to adjourn from place to place, and notwithstanding Rule 76 (4), to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate."

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion in amendment, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

The question being put on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck, as amended it was—
Resolved in the affirmative."

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

Extract from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Wednesday, October 29, 1969.

"With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Connolly (Halifax North) and MacDonald (Queens) be added to the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate appointed to investigate and report all aspects of poverty in Canada; and

That the name of the Honourable Senator Nichol be removed from the list of Senators serving on the said Special Committee.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative."

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

Tuesday, June 9, 1970.

Pursuant to adjournment and notice the Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Croll, (Chairman); Carter, Cook, Eudes, Fergusson, MacDonald (Queens), McGrand, Pearson and Quart.—(9)

In attendance: Mr. Frederick J. Joyce, Director; Mr. Peter Campbell, Researcher.

Also present: The Hon. Walter G. Dinsdale, P.C., M.P.

The following witnesses were heard:

THE SALVATION ARMY:

Col. Wm. Ross;
Lieut. Col. T. Ellwood;
Col. Mabel Crolly, R.N.;
Brigadier Joshua Monk;
Major Joyce Ellery, C.A.S.W.;
Mr. Ken. Pedlar;
Col. John Smith.

(Biographical information respecting the above witnesses immediately follow these Minutes.)

The brief submitted by The Salvation Army was ordered to be printed as appendix "A" to these proceedings.

At 11.45 a.m. the Committee adjourned until Thursday, June 11, 1970, at 9.30 a.m.

ATTEST:

Georges A. Coderre,
Clerk of the Committee.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

Colonel Wm. Ross—The Colonel has been a Salvation Army Officer for forty years and has served, administratively, in every Province in the Dominion.

Lieut. Colonel Tom Ellwood—Administrator the Salvation Army of Family Welfare program throughout Metropolitan Toronto. An Officer of wide experience among the under-privileged.

Colonel Mabel Crolly, R.N.—The Colonel graduated as a nurse from Grace Hospital in Windsor—has acted as Administrator of some of our largest hospitals. For the past several years has been the Chief of The Salvation Army Women's Social Service work in Canada.

Brigadier Joshua Monk is the Director of our services for Drugs and Alcoholism in Metro-Toronto.

Major Joyce Ellery (Member C.A.S.W.) is the Administrator of our London Children's Village. The success attending her efforts make her particularly conversant with the Single Parent and Alienated Youth.

Mr. Ken Pedlar has been educated in various Provinces as his father's Salvation Army appointments changed. Took his B.A. in Toronto and his Law studies at Osgoode Hall. Mr. Pedlar practices Law at Kingston. He has been affiliated with our Movement since birth.

Colonel John Smith—Public Relations Officer for the Ottawa Area.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, June 9, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I call the meeting to order.

We have with us today representatives of the Salvation Army Headquarters for Canada and Bermuda. No words of mine could be praise enough for the Salvation Army. On my right is Col. Ross, who has been with the Salvation Army for 40 years, serving administratively in every province in the dominion. Col. Ross will introduce his delegation.

Col. William Ross, the Salvation Army Headquarters for Canada and Bermuda: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to present my colleagues. On my right is Major Ellery, who has acted as secretary of the commission which prepared this brief. The Major is in charge of the administration of our Children's Village in London, Ontario. Behind Major Ellery is Ken Pedlar, a lawyer, who has been a Salvationist all his life. He was a member of the commission which prepared the brief. On his right is Col. Crolley. She is the officer in charge of our Women's Social Service work across the dominion. Col. Ellwood is the administrator of our Family Welfare program in the City of Toronto. On his left is Col. Smith, who is our Ottawa representative and here today to keep an eye upon us. Brig. Monk is in charge of our Alcoholic and Harbour Light work in the City of Toronto and is an acknowledged expert in that field.

With your permission, sir, I would like to give a brief synopsis of our presentation prior to the questioning by this honourable group.

I would say that the Salvation Army presents its brief realizing that it is somewhat limited, in that it covers areas in which we work and with which our people are thoroughly acquainted. We would agree that the whole spectrum of poverty is much wider than can be dealt with in any brief, or indeed perhaps by any organization or legislation. However, we submit a Forword, What is Poverty? Causes of Poverty, Poverty and the Aged, Poverty and Crime, Poverty and the Multi-Problem Family, Single Parent Families, The Working Poor, Poverty and Addiction, Poverty and the Transient, with a concluding summary.

Our first page contains a forward by the Territorial Commander, Commissioner C. D. Wiseman. We felt that the inclusion of such a forward was necessary in that it expresses the view and stand of the Salvation Army in this matter, and in some measure goes back to the very beginning of our work in this area. This, we consider, of course, as a suitable and necessary introduction to the brief. Our first chapter, "What is Poverty?" is a question we have raised ourselves, and which we ourselves find very difficult to answer. There are eight paragraphs in this section, and with your permission I would respectfully draw your attention to paragraph 5:

Obviously, poverty today is a relative term. It goes far beyond the usual economic and financial criteria. How can we compare the poverty level in some countries where thousands of our fellow humans are on the verge of starvation, with the standards of living at all levels in the wealthier nations? Elaborate welfare programs, transfer payments, health and education programs are gradually placing citizens of the favoured nations above the level of physical and material need. Yet the pall of poverty hangs over a favoured nation like Canada to such an extent as to persuade you distinguished senators to carry out this commendable investigation in depth.

I would also draw your attention to paragraph 7, because this is vital in our presentation:

Above all else poverty concerns man: the whole man, body, mind and spirit, all of which must be served if he is to live the "life more abundant". Surely it is clear today that the 'good life' does not consist in the abundance of goods we possess. We see our fine young people dropping out from affluent homes because of the atmosphere of moral and spiritual impoverishment. We see aged parents, minority groups, the physically and mentally handicapped neglected, deprived of human dignity, human opportunity, human freedom for the same reason.

I would have you believe that we are not in any way preaching when we present this paragraph. We place it before you as our belief, and as factual.

The next chapter is "Causes of Poverty". We have endeavoured to outline only some of the causes. You will appreciate the fact that the list is very limited, sufficient only for the presentation and preparation of our brief.

Under this heading we list insufficient income, poor education and lack of skills, abuse of credit buying, and as far as in us lies we are at your service, not only to answer questions but in the sincere hope that we can find an answer to some of the problems that confront us.

This is perhaps the briefest presentation in our brief. This aspect of poverty is so apparent to all that the very brevity of our presentation indicates we postulate the fact that no lengthy discussion on this no presenting of proof is needed. We have certain recommendations attached, and you will observe that this has been the format off our brief. We say that senior citizens' residences should be built near transportation, and so on. We refer to drop-in centres, increased financial assistance and medicare.

I would like to say that in going over our brief, one of our members, Brigadier Monk, drew our attention to an aspect that we had inadvertently omitted—poverty and the aged pensioners who live in our urban areas, and it is my hope that Brigadier Monk will be given a chance to express our views in the question period.

We come to "Poverty and Crime". That there is a connection cannot be denied. I will read the headings and leave the development to question period. The headings are: Personal Recognizance; 'Time-to-pay the Fine'; The Young Offender; Free Legal Aid; Psychiatric Treatment; Pay for Prisoners, and After-care. You will note in our recommendations that certain things are in line with statements made in the house yesterday by the Minister of Justice. I do not know if he read our brief or whether in our wisdom we think alike. I cannot say.

We come to the chapter "Poverty and the Multi-Problem Family". This is an aspect of our work that we find it difficult to do more than accept as a fact and do what we can to help. I would like to read the first paragraph, and I would like to read it in connection with the final part of paragraph 1 of our recommendations, because I feel that they should go together:

The term "Multi-Problem Family" has long been a part of the vocabulary of social theorists. It describes a family that is the victim of a deep-seated entanglement of many social problems of long duration. These families are often bypassed, or given only emergency assistance. The Salvation Army has a wide contact with this group, and is concerned because present social policies aggravate and perpetuate the problem.

Our first recommendation says:

There should be educational and rehabilitation emphasis, and we feel this can best be initiated from community or neighbourhood-base agencies. The individual must be seen as a complete person, not divided into segments of welfare, public health, school, manpower and child-welfare as he is now. We must be willing to adapt to new techniques.

Our recommendations deal with jobs and income, and income maintenance.

Next we deal with single parent families. An explanation of this is given in the first paragraph:

The absence of one parent through divorce, separation, illegitimate pregnancy or death results in a single parent family whose many problems deserve our concern and demand our attention.

Our worker who presented this part of our brief has broken down the area where help is needed into physical poverty, emotional poverty and social poverty. Also, I feel that she has given us cause for reflection in the paragraph at the foot of the page, which I would like to read into the record, inasmuch as it startled me when I found that it was true:

How much does it cost to care?

If we believe that a child's needs can best be met in his own family then our spending of the tax dollars does not reflect our thinking. Through Mother's Allowance a natural mother is paid approximately $500 per year to meet the needs of her child. Through Foster Home care a mother is paid approximately $1,000 a year to meet the needs of the child who has been removed from his own home. The Treatment Centre is paid approximately $10,000 per year to meet the needs of the child who is not able to make a suitable adjustment within his own or surrogate home.

The recommendations are before you, three in number, and no doubt will come up for discussion in the question period.

On page 8 we deal with poverty and the working poor. We contend that there is a group in Canada that cannot be left out in any comprehensive study of the poverty problem—the working poor, men and women, who have worked, and do work, but because of circumstances outside their control find their take-home pay to be inadequate to meet their financial needs. Many are faced with the fact that welfare payments will come to more than the amount accruing from their labour, and in some cases—and these not a few—the breadwinner may quit work and, sometimes, leave home so that his family may claim welfare support. The frustration and heartbreak that attends such separation, and the continued futility of endeavouring to make inadequate physical, mental and financial assets meet a need can well be imagined. The fact that the family is continually in the red leaves us little wonder to know that distinct action takes on the same tinge. It is such people that fall into the hands of credit companies and who have not the perspicacity to note the hook concealed in the bait. It is our recommendation that we appeal for action in areas that are provincial rather than federal. We cannot help this and we have no doubt that our various levels of government will eventually learn to co-operate in the interests of the people they serve.

Poverty and Addiction. There are many addictions. We feel that alcohol contributes more to poverty than any other. Our worker who made this contribution is an acknowledged specialist in dealing with alcoholics and we present this submission for perusal and review with the assurance that he is with us and will answer questions. Recommendations under this heading are brief. We are concerned with those who preceded us before this committee and no doubt those who will follow us. It is very difficult indeed not to be appetitious for many briefs deal with the same subject.

Poverty and the transient. To be quite frank with you, I am not pleased and satisfied with this contribution to our brief. At our final meeting when editing the presentation we found that we had omitted this aspect of poverty. It was dealt with rather radically that the Salvation Army, of all movements, should present the brief and omit this segment of their people with whom we deal so frequently.

We admit the fact that feeding, clothing and sleeping the transient only deals with the surface of the problem and yet we are unable to come up with a tangible solution, although it is my hope that Lieut. Col. Elwood will have some recommendations to offer. We can only say that we, who feed these men and women when they are hungry, clothe them when they are naked, shelter them when they are weary, counsel them when they will listen, realize that attending to surface and basic needs does little to alleviate or eliminate the problem. What we can do I don't know, but we present it to you as an aspect to be considered.

In the second section, alienation of youth, I can only say that we are doing what we can with the new ground. We are presently handicapped financially and lack trained personnel, but we are operating in a small way in this area and it is our hope that we will continue to do so.

Immigrants. Our presentation is before you, and there is little else to present. On the whole, we agree with the policy of your Government, but accentuate the need for professional people to be assimilated into the community. Perhaps the solution lies in the professions rather than legislation.

We come to summary and conclusions. In this regard we cannot altogether agree among ourselves. I feel that some of the statements made are quite dogmatic and not specific enough. However, I will read you paragraph 4:

To bring relevancy to these issues, the time for paternalism, superimposed programs, false optimism and hypocrisy is past. The need is to improve the quality of human relations. The human endeavour must involve people in decision making and self help projects. This is a shift in emphasis to being of service rather than imposing servility. It will require new motivation, dedication and moral courage that, we believe, best come from man's reconciliation with God.

I would say that my colleagues join with me in the belief that poverty cannot be cured by legislation nor by any particular denomination and endeavour to the good. It calls for the co-operation and the complete involvement of the company of the concerned and those who feel the challenge thus presented by the need of those who have not.

I would say, gentlemen, on my own behalf, without consulting my colleagues, that I feel we have not unlimited time to deal with this problem. It would seem to me that the day is far spent and the night is at hand. Thank you very much.

Senator Pearson: I would like to refer to page 8, the working poor and your recommendations in regard to housing under item 1. Have any studies been made of how to improve the housing of the working poor? I notice in the cities that there are a great many homes that are vacant, for sale or for rent, but no one is able to take them apparently because they are too high priced. Can you enlarge on that at all and give us some idea about this housing scheme or lack of housing for the working poor?

Col. Ross: How the problem can be in any way solved?

Senator Pearson: Yes. Can the houses of the working poor be improved enough to make them adequate?

Col. Ross: I wonder if I could let one of my colleagues answer that question.

Lieut. Col. Ellwood, Administrator, the Salvation Army of Family Welfare Program, Metropolitan Toronto: It is very difficult in our large urban centres, because housing has not kept pace with the large influx of population. I suppose actually there is no housing shortage for people who have an abundance of money, because they can always get apartments or suitable family dwellings. When you have a limited income and a large family it is the law of supply and demand and there is not housing available. In order to upgrade the poor type of houses it means that the landlord has got to expend money to raise the standards and I suppose that is going to involve an increase in rent and this would be difficult for poor people to meet.

It seems to me that the whole crux of the problem is that there is not sufficient housing to meet the needs. I know something must be done with the provision of low rental apartments, but some people even criticize that and feel that it is not too satisfactory. The criticism has been that there is a tendency to concentrate these people into one area and perhaps these low rental areas are not always the best for children to live in. I would think that the only solution is the provision of more houses. It would seem that this is an area in which we really need government action.

Senator Pearson: In Toronto I have noticed that in certain areas they have put a number of welfare people into groups—these might be called ghettos. They then encircle them with people who are more or less affluent. Is that a bad situation or a good one for the poor residents of those areas?

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: You mean it is not good for the poor people?

Senator Pearson: Yes.

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: I think it is all right and I think the poor people are quite satisfied as long as they can get suitable and adequate housing. In Metropolitan Toronto there has been a tendency to move out to other parts of the city in order to provide low rental accommodation. The result is that the poor people are not all concentrated into one area. There is a tendency to move away into the suburbs.

Senator Pearson: Does not this tend to hide the fact that a lot of the poor people are in the city, or does it not? If you get them scattered around, you think there is no poor living there?

Col. Smith: I do not think it does. I do not think that was the intention when this was done. I do not think it was the deliberate intention to do that. I think it is a sincere attempt on the part of the authorities to meet the housing problem.

Senator Pearson: Then it comes on to the question of minimum wage. Have you got any ideas on what the minimum wage should be or might be?

Col. Ross: Not in specific dollars and cents, but I would say it should be higher than it is.

Senator Pearson: It should be higher than it is?

Col. Ross: Yes, sir.

Senator Pearson: They have different rates in different provinces. You think some of them are too low, or they are all too low?

Col. Ross: I would say yes, sir, if a person has to live in the present time of inflation.

Senator Pearson: You have not worked out at all what you think should be a minimum wage?

Col. Ross: We discussed at meetings and we had a variety of answers, even among ourselves.

Senator Pearson: Some people could get along on less than others, manage quite well—or, I should say, manage, it may not be well, but they could manage?

Col. Ross: I think the fact that a person can manage on less is no reason why he should have less.

Senator Pearson: Thank you.

Senator Carter: Colonel Ross, can you give us some figures as to what the Salvation Army spends on poverty?

Col. Ross: No, sir, I have not got that with me here, but I can get for every member of this committee a copy of our annual statement, in which it is set forth by our auditors very clearly. It gives the income and expenditures.

Senator Carter: You cannot even give it approximately?

Col. Ross: No, sir. I am not in the position to do that but I can say that right across this country we spend large sums on poverty. What would your budget be in Ontario for your work, Colonel Smith?

Col. Smith: About $100,000.

Col. Ross: Colonel Smith is in charge of our hostel in Toronto and the budget there, in a year is $100,000. This goes almost entirely for welfare. You can appreciate the fact that the salaries are a small proportion.

Col. Smith: Mr. Chairman, if I may amplify that a little. When we speak about my work, I am just responsible for one segment of Salvation Army work in Toronto. My particular work has to do with correctional services and family welfare and assistance to single transient men, and a summer camp for children. But there is other work in Toronto which does not come under my budget or my jurisdiction. For instance, we have a home for unmarried mothers, we have the senior citizens homes, we have the Alcoholic & Drug Centre, "the Homestead" for women with drug and alcoholic problems, and we have other services in Toronto and my work is really only a small part of it.

Col. Ross: Brigadier Monk, would you say something about your budget?

Brigadier Joshua Monk, Drugs and Alcoholism Division, Metro-Toronto, Salvation Army: It is approximately $200,000 for the alcoholic work. That includes a farm in operation outside of Metro Toronto, where we have the alcoholic who has been separated from his family, who is the hard core alcoholic, involved in breakdown in relationship with people, with work programs, and so on. The budget is about $200,000, just in Metro Toronto.

Col. Ross: That is just for your department. Colonel Crolly, I know that you have relinquished our aged work supervision, recently, but would you have any idea as to what the budget is?

Colonel Mabel Crolly, R.N., Chief of Women's Social Service Work, Salvation Army: The budget? No, because that does not come under me now.

Col. Ross: Would you care to give some indication of the work?

Col. Crolly: I will do whatever I can, but it is not in my jurisdiction. We have 32 institutions across the country, including hospitals, unmarried mothers' homes, and so on. Some of this money comes from the government. It is spent on the poor, but much of the money comes from the various provincial levels of government.

Col. Ross: Yes, particularly in your area.

Col. Crolly: Yes.

Col. Ross: I am sorry I cannot be more definite, Senator Carter.

Senator Carter: I think it would be useful if you could give the committee some information. You said you had a statement, but it would not be very meaningful to us unless you could separate what you get from the provinces, because we would be counting this kind of money twice.

Col. Ross: This would have to go, sir, to our finance department. The budget runs into some millions of dollars across the country. I do not think that anyone in this group is expert enough to separate it. It would have to come from our finance department, but if you wish I will speak to the commissioner and see if this can be supplied.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Col. Ross: Then honourable senators could place it in with the brief and they would know where we are. Is that satisfactory, sir?

Senator Cook: As a supplementary to that question, could you also find out how many cases you handle, in addition to how much money you spent?

Col. Ross: The statistics? Yes, and I regret I did not bring it with me, because we could have found that out easily enough. Perhaps you will make a note of that, Major Ellery, please.

Senator Carter: In your brief—which I like very much because it is brief and concise—you have dealt with the poor in different categories. One of the categories is the “working poor”. On page 3, you say they constitute about 65 to 75 per cent of the problem. Can you tell us where you get those figures from? They are a little different from what we have had before.

Col. Smith: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Ladies and gentlemen, if I may comment on that, we relied on a number of references in the press. But from my own day to day work with families I would say that it is reasonably correct. I might also mention that Mr. John Anderson, the Commissioner of Welfare for Metropolitan Toronto, in giving a report at a meeting which was reported in the Toronto Daily Star on May 26, 1969, said:

There is an estimated 30,500 families in Metro Toronto who would be better on welfare than our present minimum wage rates... Based on tax reported earned income, there are about 433,000 persons in Metro earning less than $4,000 a year...

The Chairman: That would be 430,000?

Col. Smith: Yes.

The Chairman: That figure of 30,000 would be people who are not receiving help as against about 45,000 who are receiving help—it is up to 60,000 now. So the percentage would not be quite that high. The number who are receiving assistance is between 45,000 and 60,000, that is the last figure for Toronto. The 30,000 who are not on welfare, the working poor, would not make quite 65 per cent. The reason the question was asked of you is because we have in our minds a figure of about 50 per cent of the poor of the country who are working poor.

Col. Smith: Yes, Mr. Chairman. It is perhaps difficult to get really accurate figures but it would seem that in the past we see give the impression that most of the poor people are on welfare or getting some kind of state aid. I think we overlook the fact that there is a large segment of the poverty problem who are working. Many of them would be better on welfare but they prefer to work. Sometimes the idea has been abroad that all the poor people are lazy and shiftless and they will not even help themselves. I think these figures show that they are really in the minority.

Senator Carter: In dealing with the working poor, on page 8 of your brief, paragraph 2, you say:

We must also realize that there will always be certain types of employment that are at the bottom of the wage-scale. These jobs are not highly productive, and it would be economically unsound to pay high salaries to those who undertake this type of work.

I wonder if you would clarify that? Are you suggesting that they should not be well paid? What is the implication? Is it that the Government should supplement what they get in some way, that they should be subsidized? I would like that clarified, as to what is your thinking behind it.

Col. Smith: Are you directing the question to me?

Senator Carter: I would like you to clarify the thinking behind this.

Col. Smith: I think the thinking behind this is that people with their education, training and ability cannot really command a high salary, and it would be an economic problem to pay them more. Take, for example, the case of a man who is running a business who cannot make his business pay and at the same time pay a very high salary for work which really does not command it. Nevertheless the fact remains that this man who is getting the small salary does need some kind of help.

Senator Carter: Well, he has to live somehow and he is not getting enough to live on, so how do you suggest the balance should be made up? Should the industry he is working in be subsidized so that he can get a decent salary, or should he receive welfare in addition to his wages? What is your opinion?

The Chairman: There is a third alternative, the establishment of a minimum income.

Mr. Ken Pedlar, Barrister, The Salvation Army: I believe we tied that in, although not very well, in the brief at the bottom of page 6 where we speak in favour of the principle of a negative income tax. I believe we tied this in with that as being our idea of the solution. It is not so much a doling out of something but as an incentive to have them working. Therefore we suggested the bringing in of a negative income tax rather than a guaranteed minimum wage.

Senator Carter: I have one more question, Mr. Chairman, which may be a double question. On page 1, which I found very interesting, you quote William Booth as saying—"while assisting one class of the community it must not seriously interfere with the interests of another". I would like you to enlarge on that because the White Paper, for example, is going to eliminate taxes from the poor by taking them off the tax roll but then they are going to put them on to another group, so that if you are going to solve the problem, it has to be against what is in that quotation. Do you agree with that?

Col. Ross: I think there, perhaps, senator, you may be reading the work "profits" instead of "interests".

Senator Carter: But it speaks of "the interests".

Col. Ross: I know that, but are you not thinking of it in terms of profits rather than in terms of interests?

Senator Carter: What I would like is to get your definition of "interests". What do you mean by that as we find it on page 1?

Col. Ross: I thought perhaps the honourable senator was looking at the interests as the profits of the others.

Senator Carter: Well, I would think a man's profits would be part of his interests too, wouldn't you?

Col. Ross: I would think so, sir.

Senator Carter: Did William Booth have a larger idea of "interests" when he made that statement? Was he thinking of something else?

Senator Cook: He also said it must not "seriously interfere" and I think the key word is "seriously". He does not say that there should not be some interference.

Senator Carter: My last question deals with the same page, the next paragraph down. You say "...we firmly believe that our affluent nation has the resources of wealth and intelligence to find an answer to the problem, provided we have the will to do so!" Then you repeat that on page 2 where you say "The irony and tragedy is that we have the know-how and technical skills to eliminate this social blight if only we had the will and social conscience to provide the motivation. This is where the Church with its emphasis on spiritual dimensions comes into the picture". This is the problem that the committee was faced with from the beginning. We realize that, as you have said in your presentation, it is too big a problem for government alone. You cannot correct it just by passing laws. We have to mobilize the whole Canadian public and change people's attitudes and develop a commitment. Can you give the committee any guidance as to how this can be done? I might even suggest that "commitment" is the key word.

Col. Ross: Yes, involvement or commitment, I agree with you.

Brig. Monk: May I answer that question? I believe that this is a very important aspect of poverty. We have to consider imposed poverty and self-imposed poverty, and I think poverty of the spirit is what you are trying to get at. Possibly we have here in our work men who have been at issue with the problem of getting away from a church connection or spiritual background and so on. We have been criticized because of our spiritual emphasis and possibly rightly so because if a man wanted to get a bowl of soup or a meal, he had to attend a meeting. But we feel we would be doing wrong if we did not place an emphasis on that spiritual aspect of our work, and this is where the Church with its emphasis on spiritual dimensions comes into the picture and surely the Salvation Army is a Church. At any rate we believe ourselves to be that. Apart from the social ramifications of our work, we have presented to these people the spiritual emphasis—a faith. We feel that if we cannot give these men a faith, we are not going to lift them up, so that we feel that the overall picture at large for the nation goes along with this spiritual consciousness and giving people not only a handout—because it is not enough to say to a man "Here is a dollar" or "Here is a bed", or "Here is a meal". We feel we must emphasize the spiritual aspect.

Senator Carter: Well, I was not thinking of that so much as I was thinking of the affluent people who are not concerned with poverty. If we are going to tackle the problem of poverty it will cost a good deal of money which you are not going to get unless the public is sold on the idea, and somehow or other in the public we have to develop a commitment to tackle this problem. But how can we go about that?

Col. Smith: If I may speak on that, Mr. Chairman. In days of war we seemed to be able to mobilize all the resources of the nation and make a desperate effort to accomplish our purposes. Sometimes it seems to me that in days of peace we have the moral equivalent of war and we have to recognize that this is a serious problem for our country and we must be prepared to take special measures to deal with it. As far as the Church is concerned, I suppose there is a sense in which the Church is really the conscience of the nation—or should be the conscience of the nation. So it seems to me to be a special responsibility of the Church to create a conscience on matters like this. When we think of the Scriptures, and particularly the Old Testament, we realize that the prophets were not only spiritual leaders but they were also social reformers and they really tried to create a conscience and a concern and to enlist the people in creating a concern for those who were in difficult circumstances. It seems to me therefore that the Church has a responsibility to create a conscience and to point out the great need there is of dealing with this problem.

Senator Carter: I think we are all agreed that it is part of the church's job to do it, but can we leave it all to the church? Are there not other things that can be done and other groups that can be mobilized? What can this committee do? What can Government do? How can we get out among the people and sell this idea? Have the churches doing it too—the more that do it, the better—but I do not think we can leave it all to the churches.

Col. Ross: Neither do I think, sir, that the churches have the ability to organize people to take constructive action. We can get them started, but this is a long-term thing and when the church starts a program of this sort a lot grow weary in well-doing quite early in the program. I can only point out what we have here, that the need is to improve the quality of human relations, and if, as the Colonel says, we can organize a whole country to the challenge of war, even to the point where we can glamourize it, then so much the better.

Senator Carter: But the churches do not do that.

Col. Ross: No, but the church has no authority beyond...

Senator Carter: I mean, in organizing for war, the churches play a very minor part.

Col. Ross: I would hope so!

Senator Carter: But the organization is done, it happens and it does become mobilized.

Col. Ross: The organization is carried out by Government. The propaganda is issued by Government.

Senator Carter: Yes. Do you see anything the Government can do to approach it in the same way, for the eradication of poverty?

Col. Ross: I think this has to be impressed upon the people of Canada as a war.

The Chairman: But, Colonel, we have had nearly all the leading churches before us. Next week we will have the Roman Catholic and some Protestant groups and then that will be all of them. They have all said exactly the same thing that you have been saying, and rightly so, that they are spreading a spiritual message. We are not reflecting on the churches at all and we are not suggesting that you should go out and spend great sums of money. What troubles us is that nobody in this country is angry or mad or seems to give a damn about the 20 per cent who are poverty stricken, and they are all around you. Now, what is wrong?

Col. Ross: Unless we can get a national anger or madness up, we are in a position where, God help the man who is mad enough to do something because, in the end, all our anger has to be contained within the law and we are back to the Government again.

The Chairman: No, no. I am talking about the conscience of the people. I am not talking about throwing stones; I am talking about the conscience of the nation. You said that these spiritual people are the conscience of the country, and we agree with you. What is the matter with our conscience?

Col. Ross: Well, that is a reflection on us as a church...

The Chairman: No, no, do not misunderstand me. There was no reflection intended on the church at all. I do not want that impression to get out. The church is doing what it thinks it ought to do. They know better than any of us as to what the church should do, but, in the final analysis, we find ourselves with 20 per cent of our people poverty stricken. The rest of us are affluent, living well, better than we ever did before. The distribution of the poor and affluent has not changed in 20 years.

Col. Ross: That is quite right, sir.

The Chairman: With that situation continuing, we, as men and women of the world, find it a little difficult to know why nothing has come forward or why there has not been any great emphasis placed on this or feeling about it. I do not blame you, but ask you to help us.

Senator Fergusson: I would like to hear what Major Ellery has to say about this.

The Chairman: I have her name down here. Very well, go ahead, Major Ellery.

Major Joyce Ellery, Administrator, London Children's Village: I think it is a problem of communication between the poor and the rich, and our giving of money is really through agencies so that the rich do not have an opportunity to feel the atmosphere of the poor. It seems to me that people will give if they really feel, and they have to get with the poor people and really sense the atmosphere to know the need, and then how can you help but give?

The Chairman: All churches, as we have gathered, are reaching out to the poor. Everyone who has come to us has said so.

Major Ellery: I think there are some churches who really have not felt the poor. I think there are churches within the Salvation Army probably that have not really felt the poor, because there are some people who just do not have poor people come into their church. So, unless you have a service that is going to take you out into the community and into the dives in which these people live, I do not think your conscience is really going to be awakened.

Senator Fergusson: It is not enough just to give money, through somebody else, to the poor.

Major Ellery: No, and through organizations, even such as our United Appeal, the money given, but the giver does not touch the person who receives the gift. They could just touch them, something would happen.

The Chairman: But how do you do that? You are a social worker. How do you do it?

Major Ellery: By getting involved with the people.

The Chairman: Yes, but how do we involve people? Are you in Toronto?

Major Ellery: I am in London.

The Chairman: London, Ontario?

Major Ellery: Yes.

The Chairman: You have a United Appeal in London, do you not?

Major Ellery: Yes.

The Chairman: And they give money?

Major Ellery: Yes.

The Chairman: They are generous in London and it is a rich city. You have the fine citizens there, just as you have in other places. How do you involve them? They write cheques, but how do you involve them?

Major Ellery: We are beginning to involve them in various ways. Those who can stand it we get involved with alienated youth, actually getting in and rubbing shoulders with them.

Senator Cook: In our Province of Newfoundland the Salvation Army has emphasized fellowship, apart altogether from the spiritual side. The Salvation Army has always been in the forefront of trying to create fellowship with regard to poverty and problems of that kind. Do you find that you are attracting troops all the time to your movement? What progress are you making in this fellowship, which I think you have always exemplified?

Col. Ross: I think, sir, we are not growing from the area of the poverty stricken as much as I would like. We have reached that place where our growth is something of an internal thing, and in our early days practically all our growth came from the down-trodden.

When the chairman points out the vital need for the involvement of all concerned and the studying of the conscience, our work over the years has been, in great measure, to alleviate the immediate problem—to feed the hungry and to clothe the naked; but I must say I could not answer on how to stir up the conscience of the public in this regard because a man only sees what he looks at. He can close his eyes and his ears any time he wishes, and the cry of the poor and the sight of the hungry either make a man close his eyes or ears or get in and do something; but how to get them involved, I do not know.

The Chairman: To me, it is a rather surprising statement from the Salvation Army. If anyone, in my view—and this is my own experience—was able to reach the poor and made it their task, it was the Salvation Army. When you say that you are having some difficulty and perhaps are being looked upon as part of the Establishment rather than what you originally set out to do, it surprises me.

Col. Ross: I do not think we could ever be looked upon as part of the Establishment, really. I think that we are unorthodox enough that the Establishment would disown us. Even if we desired association, I do not think the Establishment would own us.

Col. Smith: Mr. Chairman, I think what Colonel Ross has in mind is that we are not yet, to a large extent, getting the members of our own movement, you see, but it does not mean that we are not in contact with . . .

Senator Cook: No, my point is that a large part of the cure is concern, or call it what you will. From my observation in Newfoundland the Salvation Army is always in the forefront of not just dishing out things but in trying to become a friend of the people who are in need, of making them realize they are human beings and restoring their dignity. I am just asking: In this affluent age has that duty any appeal?

Col. Ross: Yes, I would say it has, senator. If it is difficult for us to talk without appearing to push our own concern, but I will say that I do not think the Salvation Army—and I talk now from the centre and as one who knows—is in any way behind in befriending the friendless and in drawing them into the fellowship.

Senator Cook: That is not the point. I am sure that the Salvation Army is doing all of those things. I am asking: Do you find more and more people interested, if you like, in becoming active members of the Salvation Army and in becoming involved?

Col. Ross: We are growing, sir, in membership, but I must admit that we do not see people rushing up and demanding to be enrolled.

Senator Carter: Could the Salvation Army mount a crusade against poverty? You see, when you send out your people during Christmas week, and the pot is there, and someone comes along and puts in $1, $5, or $10, it seems to me that you are somehow defeating your own ends, because that person after putting in his money has now a clear conscience, because you are going to take over the work. Do you see?

Col. Ross: Yes.

Senator Cook: Suppose you were given a very large annual sum of money. Do you have the personnel to administer and carry out the work?

Col. Ross: Yes, I would say so, without any question. We have trained personnel, yes, sir.

Senator McGrand: When I read your brief I noted down certain things I wanted to discuss with you, but there has been so much said in the last half hour or so that I think most of my questions have been answered. You talk about the challenge of war, and how everything is organized to meet it. How successful has moral rearmament been. Moral Rearmament has been going on in the world for a number of years, but it does not seem to have gathered much strength, which is what you have to have if you are going to fight a war on poverty. It has to be done by moral rearmament, but the thing called moral rearmament has not been too successful.

Senator Croll mentioned something about the conscience of the nation. I think he should have referred to the conscience of the city, where there are slums, poor housing, poor garbage collection, and few playgrounds. The slums are usually situated on the lowest land in the city where the heat is most intense, and ventilation the worst.

Col. Ross: Yes.

Senator McGrand: In the summer the heat is terrible, and when the people there open the windows on a hot day all they get is noise from the traffic. The super highways are not built through the residential sections of the city; they are built over the slum areas. So, when you talk about the conscience of the nation it is difficult to understand what it is. The conscience of a nation today is concerned with more cars, more highways, the shortest distance between two places and the idea that we have an affluent society, which we have not. Everybody is trying to get more and more of this affluent society, which is a myth in the first place. I am now going to ask you some of the questions I have noted here.

On page 5 under the main heading of "Poverty and Crime" you say that instead of a man being placed in jail he should be given time in which to pay the fine. Now, such people are usually poor, and it is their poverty that has got them into trouble in the first place. If a man is not able to support himself then what good does it do to give him time to pay the fine, except—and this is what you may have in mind—that the payment of the fine is to compensate for the damage he has done, and if a person pays his way then he is usually a better person than one who is trying to get something for nothing. The payment of a fine by means of a definite program of payments is in itself an exercise in rehabilitation, and it gives the man a chance to take a second look at his past, and also to look at his future. Is that what you have in mind when you say he should be given time to pay his fine?

Mr. Pedlar: The idea of giving him time to pay the fine arises from the fact that he does not have the money when he is in court.

The Chairman: There are three alternatives there.

Mr. Pedlar: Yes, we go on to suggest a warning, suspended sentence, and/or probation, and the emphasis there is on probation.

Senator McGrand: Do you see any particular merit in the idea that if a man pays some money back for the damage he has done then he is helping to rehabilitate himself?

Mr. Pedlar: Yes, and that comes out in Recommendation No. 6. If prisoners were given a little more pay when they could make restitution.

Senator McGrand: On page 7 you talk about the total needs of people, and there is an excellent paragraph at the bottom about the foster home and the amount of money that a family should have. Is it our experience that an adequate family allowance would be a deterrent to the breaking up of a home? There are people who feel that a child is better off in his natural home. Even though the home is very poor and has very little to offer it is better for the child than a foster home. It is my feeling that most of these foster homes give a child a clean face and hands and sufficient food, but there is very little of what you might call love and togetherness. Do you find that that true of foster homes?

Major Ellery: I think that that is a rather general statement. There are excellent foster homes which give the child a wonderful opportunity of getting back on the track. In my own personal work with children I deal with those who have not been successful in foster homes, so I do see the other side of it.

Senator McGrand: How bad would the natural home have to be before you would say the child should be taken away and put in a foster home?

Major Ellery: I think the child would have to be emotionally disturbed before it would be taken out and put somewhere else. What we are suggesting here is that perhaps it is not the money that must be paid to the mother, but that at the point of need there must be a more intensive counselling service so that the mother and the child can be helped to stay together.

Senator McGrand: That is what I mean. You are trying to keep the child in its own home?

Major Ellery: That is right.

Senator McGrand: On page 13 you say that the cause of poverty is the breakdown of the family. The breakdown of the family can occur, but it does not always mean the breakup of the family. The family relationship can still exist in a family that has broken down, and it can go on for years and years. I presume here you are referring to that lack of togetherness that gives a family strength?

Col. Ross: Yes.

Senator McGrand: Poverty of that sort in the home leads to poverty of the purse?

Major Ellery: That is right.

Senator Fergusson: I might say that I, together with the other members of the committee, appreciate your brief very much. While it is interesting it is not so very long as others we have received. A number of the questions I had anticipated asking have been covered.

However, I am interested in poverty in the aging, which is referred to on page 4. I had thought of asking first about the number of residences for senior citizens you have throughout Canada, and the qualifications for entry.

During the presentation of the brief reference was made to poverty in the aged pensioners' group. Would you elaborate on that please?

Brig. Monk: We are having a difficult time dealing with the individual whose pension has had to be administrated because of some form of addiction. On the other hand we have men living in a community where they can get some form of poor housing, which is available in most cases only in the downtown area.

Quite often these men are intimidated by other addicted members of the community. By the time he arrives home after receiving his weekly pension, or two or three days later, it is all gone. He then has to go to missions or live through the welfare services of the Salvation Army.

In our opinion one-third of these people are in this condition. This estimate is arrived at by case history related to our work in four centres, including Montreal, Calgary and Toronto.

Possibly the DVA is the greatest victim here, but the man who is receiving a pension because he is sick or broken down in health and is aged 55 or close to 60 is in desperate circumstances. His pension is small and if he is intimidated at all because of living in the environment or district it is very awkward for him.

We feel that there should be housing for that man, not only for the aged, but those on pension who cannot to into housing units of the aged. There even married couples can get accommodation for $55 per month, but this man is ineligible until he reaches the age of 60.

We are finding a great need amongst these people in Toronto. One-third of them are being victimized.

Senator Fergusson: Do you think special accommodation should be provided for these people?

Brig. Monk: That is right, in addition to the aged.

Senator Fergusson: Should it be provided by government?

Brig. Monk: I believe there should be agencies of government to provide for these people if they are going to administer their funds weekly. In the first place it is devastating to the morale of the man who has to go each week to receive a pittance.

The Chairman: Who administers their allowance?

Brig. Monk: The DVA.

The Chairman: Are you not referring to old age security, Senator Fergusson?

Senator Fergusson: No, their remarks referred to those on pensions, not old age security.

Brig. Monk: When they show that they cannot handle their allowance by the month it is broken down to the week and they must go to collect their weekly allowance. This has become quite a problem to those working in the field.

Senator Fergusson: Giving it by the week does not help, as it is gone before the end of each week.

Brig. Monk: It helps only in the sense that at the beginning of each week he has his allowance. If he received the full monthly allowance it would be gone during the month, leaving him with nothing for the remainder of the time.

There ought to be a place where men like this could be cared for and given allowances.

Senator Fergusson: Does this apply to people who have not got much else except the old age pension?

Brig. Monk: Yes. In many cases we find this situation with old age pensioners living in the same district. They have no accommodation because there is a waiting list of approximately a year or eighteen months for the housing units. They are exploited continuously.

The Chairman: The difference between the veteran and the old age security recipient is the age qualification.

Senator Quart: DVA pensioners have hospitalization, not preventive, which has been discussed many times because sometimes an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Should there be some place, maybe a small unit attached to a hospital, where veterans would be able to receive that kind of living accommodation and treatment?

Brig. Monk: I do not think veterans should be told where to go. Housing units should be available to accommodate them. There could be arrangements for meals but they would not have to live there. They can do that by choice, just as the old age pensioner who can almost go to a unit of his choice.

Senator Quart: Would there be a sufficient number of these people to warrant that type of arrangement?

Brig. Monk: Right in the City of Toronto alone the district with which I deal there would be 500 these people.

Senator Fergusson: In addition to the residences for senior citizens are there arrangements for others, for instance transient youth?

Senator Fergusson: They were not being used?

Col. Crolly: We have residences for senior citizens in 22 areas across the country. We have one or two places where there is a ceiling on the income. That is the person can earn and still come in. However, mostly it is based on the need of the individual. This is not necessarily financial need. When a person can no longer live alone without a family there is a need.

Senator Fergusson: Sometimes that is more serious than financial need.

Col. Crolly: Yes, they have the money, but they are eligible. One or two have been built under certain legislation which precludes them from taking this type of person. However, generally speaking we can. The one requirement usually is that the person must be ambulatory upon entry.

Senator Fergusson: Do you have residences or hostels for transient youth, for instance, or homeless people?

Col. Crolly: We have men's hostels right across the country, and we have three women's hostels.

Senator Fergusson: This is what I was interested in.

Col. Crolly: These are more or less for emergency cases. It can be a girl who has been in the police court, who has nowhere to go, so our officer is asked if we can take this person for the time being, and she is placed in one of our residences. We have only the one at the moment, but . . .

Senator Fergusson: Would you tell me where you have these?

Col. Crolly: Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver.

Senator Fergusson: The reason I am interested is because I know of the great need in Ottawa. I was locked the other day to find out that in 1887 we had that was called a home for friendless women to provide for just that kind of service, and now we do not have it in Ottawa. It seems to me we have gone back.

Col. Crolly: We had one or two more across the country at one time than we had today. They were phased down because they were not being used.

Col. Crolly: There did not seem to be the same need.

Senator Fergusson: I know right now through, for instance, my work for the Elizabeth Fry Society, that there is a need for this kind of thing in Ottawa. I would also like to ask about addiction, to which you refer in several places. You say on page 3 it is one of the causes of poverty. What proportion of poverty do you think is caused through addictions?

Col. Ross: Perhaps Colonel Ellwood would answer that.

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: We are working on the assumption now, through research on our case histories in our own institutions—this is just our own institutions, and we have statistics from other groups—that it does not matter what society a man comes from, whether he is a rich man, a middle class man, or what have you, the whole bracket of addiction, that 50 per cent of these people become poverty stricken.

Senator Fergusson: Even the ones who were affluent?

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: That is right.

Senator McGrand: I did not get that answer.

The Chairman: Fifty per cent of those at the affluent level become addicted.

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: I am talking about at all levels. They become poverty stricken. In fact, we are dealing with people who are lawyers and chartered accountants, who come to us without a penny, not able to pay even their keep in our institutions, who when they leave us can go into jobs commanding $15,000, $20,000 a year.

Senator Cook: What age would these men be?

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: The average age is 40.

Senator Fergusson: You say when they leave you. Do you mean you treat them?

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: That is right.

Senator Fergusson: Are you successful in this treatment?

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: For one-third of those who come to us.

Senator Fergusson: That is higher than I thought it was. Do you have a hospital for this treatment?

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: It is a clinic, yes.

Senator Fergusson: Do the people stay in?

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: They stay for six to seven weeks for treatment. On the farm it is from six months to a year. This is a man who has lost his association with his family, who has broken down, is unable to relate to society in any form. We classify him as in need of a whole build-up, mentally and physically, and of course the spiritual emphasis is there. It takes six months to a year, and we will not allow a man to go unless he is willing to submit to six months' care.

Senator Fergusson: Is this treatment for alcoholics only or for drug addicts as well?

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: Drug addicts as well. In fact, you do not separate the drug addicts and the alcoholics today in treatment. Even the Research Foundation are finding the same association.

Senator McGrand: How successful have you been in treating female drug addicts? That is a big problem. They can go to prison for six months, come out and they are back on the drugs. How successful have you been with the girls?

Col. Crolly: We have only one centre for female addicts, and that is in the City of Toronto. However, we have girls coming to it from great distances. A girl arrived the other day from Alberta. We are not as successful as we would like to be, but we still have something over 30 per cent success.

Senator McGrand: You do far better for them than they do putting them in prison.

Senator Quart: I just wanted to pick up some loose ends. First of all I want to congratulate you on your brief, particularly in view of the fact that as bilingualism is quite the thing today in Canada, as it should be in other countries where necessary, you have provided a French translation. You mention your senior citizens' home in Montreal. Where is it located in Montreal?

Col. Crolly: It is in the west end of the city. It is not N.D.G., but just a little beyond.

Senator Fergusson: It is around Montreal West, because I have visited there.

Col. Crolly: Montreal West, yes.

Senator Quart: You said that the applicants must be ambulatory?

Col. Crolly: That is right.

Senator Quart: Have you an infirmary attached?

Col. Crolly: In Montreal, yes, we have. It is quite a new infirmary, added within the past year, with accommodation for 40.

Senator Quart: In the infirmary?

Col. Crolly: Yes.

Senator Quart: If minor surgery is needed, do you take the person back?

Col. Crolly: The person would be re-admitted to hospital if he had been a patient there.

Senator Carter: When you give assistance to families, do you have any scale?

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: You are thinking of assistance for food?

Senator Carter: Yes.

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: Yes, we do have a scale, according to the size of the family, for food. It runs from $6 to $15, because it is temporary emergency help. At Christmas time it is larger than that, and we do not have any maximum; it is so much for an adult and so much for a child; there is no maximum, so a large family would get quite a large order. Of course, we not only assist them with food, but also assist them with clothing and furniture.

Senator Carter: Do you have any overall maximum scale of assistance where you break it down into so much for food, so much for clothing and so on?

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: It varies. Sometimes people come to us and all they want is food. Sometimes they may want food and clothing.

Senator Carter: I would like to know how your scale would compare with the provincial scale, or are they comparable?

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: I really could not say. We have a scale for food. If they come for clothing, and it could be a variety of clothing, or shoes. If they come for furniture, it might be for a bed, or table and chairs.

Senator Carter: Let us take food. What would, say a family of four need for a week?

Lieut. Col. Ellwood: We would not undertake to supply it for a week. It is just emergency help for a day or two. Sometimes they are applying for welfare and it will take a few days to process the municipal welfare. Or perhaps they are on welfare, it is a few days before the welfare cheque arrives and they are in difficulties, so we give them a small food voucher to tide them over for a day or two.

Senator Carter: Major Ellery, I gather you are a social worker and have been to many poor families. Has it been your experience that in this group of families you find the attitudes and expectations quite different from those in more affluent groups?

Major Ellery: Generally I think they are a pretty depressed group of people. I feel that only if we can provide them with incentive counselling, that is dropping into homes four and five times a week, can we motivate and stimulate these people to get on their feet.

Senator Carter: We have had some evidence before regarding these particular groups who are below the poverty level, and usually the homes are broken anyway. A young couple getting married would not expect their marriage to last either.

Major Ellery: It has become a way of life.

Senator Carter: And the same is true of the children.

The Chairman: Let us stop at the moment. You said something that was very important. When Senator Carter spoke he was relating to what we have heard, that a great number of the poor people do not expect their marriages to last. You agreed. Would you please elaborate?

Major Ellery: It has become a pattern of life and a problem of identification with that kind of family.

What I presented as a solution would be intensive counselling in the homes.

Senator Carter: And the same would apply to children. They would not expect to get off welfare. Their expectations are not that they will grow up and contribute to society.

Major Ellery: The parents have set the pattern. I think we all look to our parents as an example, as they do, and it is possible to change that pattern.

Senator Carter: That is the problem.

Major Ellery: Yes, but you do not do it by sending a cheque through the mail once a month.

Senator Carter: These children are handicapped psychologically because of their environment.

Major Ellery: That is correct.

Senator Carter: I just wanted to confirm that it is a problem to bring some moral influences to bear on the children of these very, very poor families. Sunday schools are usually out. Very often they are not dressed to go to Sunday school, and the parents are not interested in it. How does the Salvation Army cope with that type of situation? Have you been able to do anything about it?

Major Ellery: Yes, we have been able to do something about it. First of all I think you have to establish some kind of a relationship with the family and the children so that they will trust you and be interested in what you are talking about. You have to really meet need at the point of need. When this is done you can go on to share other aspects with them.

As far as clothing is concerned it does not really matter what a child wears to Sunday school. We have brought children in through our guide companies and the life-saving units of the "Church". It is good for the Church and this is one way for providing a bridge between the affluent and the poor. If you bring these people into the Church and let them feel and see the poor ones, they are going to do something about it. Our experience has been that some of the moneyed people of the Church have been able to see the need and ask what they can do to meet it. This has resulted in furniture, clothing, et cetera, coming in.

Senator Carter: How much of this have you been able to do? Is this what you talk about occurring in only a few centres or is it currently widespread?

Major Ellery: It is spreading. Even in our ladies' auxiliaries we have contacted people who are really tired of going to meetings and they want to get involved in service.

Senator Carter: Isn't this part of the answer that we were groping for earlier?

Major Ellery: That is right, to get people involved. They have to see and feel the need before they are prepared to get involved.

Senator Carter: How do you start this sort of thing?

Major Ellery: You talk and simply tell the story of people you know who are really in need to people who have the ability to meet the problem financially. They will then get involved in relationships as well.

Senator Fergusson: You said that in treating addicts you thought you had about 30 per cent success.

Col. Crolley: The last check was 28 at one stage and then 30. We are, however, not optimistic that we will be going any higher.

Senator Fergusson: I think that is wonderful. One of the senators said that the addicts are being treated better than in prisons, and you agreed. I am very interested in the Matsqui Prison in British Columbia which was set up for drug addicts in 1966. I wonder if you would know whether they have had success, but perhaps there has not been sufficient time to know.

Col. Crolley: I am afraid I do not know and have not heard from British Columbia regarding that.

Senator Fergusson: Thank you very much.

Senator Pearson: I would like to refer back to the drug addict, because it is quite a present-day phenomenon. I am just wondering whether you find the young drug addicts more in the affluent society or among the poverty-stricken youth.

Brig. Monk: It is very definitely found among the affluent society because they are able to afford the habit, whereas the child from a society which has not had good earnings is unable to keep up with it. The men that come to us, even though they have been long-term drinkers, are above the average education of the nation. Their means of livelihood has been above average and they are men of good standing and position.

Senator Pearson: I was personally interested in the youth and this question of drug addiction amongst them. Are you able to contact and talk with these people or do they leave you cold all the time?

Brig. Monk: In Toronto there is now a program both with the government and the Ontario Hospital. They are doing a very fine job of reaching these young people, at least getting them there. As far as the Army is concerned, we have no program for the young people as yet. We have young people of 18 coming to us, and we refer them to these centres. You cannot have the adult population with the young because it does not work. At the moment, we do not have a set-up for the young people. We deal mostly with the adult population.

Col. Ross: Major Ellery can speak to this.

Major Ellery: I think Brigadier Monk is saying that we do not have a residential set-up for these people. In London we do have a drop-in centre for teenagers, and we have been operating it on Friday evenings. We have had tremendous opportunity to talk with them, not only on Friday nights but throughout the week. They are coming more and more to talk to us. A number of them have given up drugs—not heroin—but LSD.

We will be opening a drop-in centre for 5 full days a week throughout the summer months.

Senator Pearson: Is that open all day long?

Major Ellery: During the summer from 2 until 5 in the afternoon, and 7 p.m. until 11 p.m. At the moment we are open from 8 o'clock until midnight.

Senator Pearson: Do you feel that these youngsters who come there—drug addicts—are benefiting or getting off drugs altogether?

Major Ellery: The purpose is to have a place for young people to go Friday evenings as an alternative to using drugs. We have a number of kids who come in and they are really hooked on drugs, but we have seen a number of them drop it. We do not focus on the drug, but a kid who is taking it.

Senator Pearson: Thank you.

Col. Ross: In Niagara Falls the Salvation Army Hall, which is a new one, has been turned over to young people who offer their own program all day and in the evening until 11 o'clock. I do not know of a better administered group operating in that building.

Mr. Pedlar: The same thing has happened in Metropolitan Toronto, and there are up to 400 people in Oakville.

Senator Pearson: For youths in total—not just drug addicts.

Mr. Pedlar: Not just drug addicts, but that is part of the youth problem, and we cannot avoid it.

The Chairman: What do you mean, that is part of the youth problem?

Mr. Pedlar: If you are going to bring in kids off the street, you are going to bring in the drug addicts and pushers and everyone else like that. The young people are just sort of aimless, wondering around.

Senator Pearson: I see you suggest that probation is better than putting them in prison. I think that is true.

Senator McGrand: Going back to the transient, I have always felt that probation working with the transient, the person who is going by and who wants a place to stay, I imagine that a lot of these are transients. Are these residents of the slums who take to the road, going from place to place, or are they residents or should be residents of the small communities who are on the move in search of work? Or are some of them just simply transients who become rather permanent transients in a certain area?

Col. Smith: There is quite a variety of cases. You do have transients who just move around, some of them are seeking work. For instance we find quite a move in the month of July in Ontario, where people are trying to get work in the tobacco fields. There are situations like that. Some of them move around. We also have a lot of single men. We think of the single man who comes along for help and we think of the transient. As far as I can see, it seems to me that there is a reduction in the number of transients and a lot of single men and unattached men who are seeking for help, they have a tendency more and more to settle in a centre, particularly in a big urban centre like Metropolitan Toronto. Sometimes they will get along to a certain degree with perhaps casual work, odd jobs, but it is not sufficient to keep them going, so they come to agencies like the Salvation Army for occasion accommodation for the night or for meals. I would say that, generally speaking, the transient and the unattached man who come seeking for help are people with poor education and with no skills. They are not usually from the better educated people.

Senator McGrand: Where do they originate? Are they small community people who originate in small communities or are they from the slums of Toronto who move into the slums of Edmonton, Vancouver and so on.

Col. Smith: They seem to come from all areas. It is quite a mixture. You find them coming from the large cities but some also come from small communities. In some cases there is a sort of spirit of wanderlust and they just want to keep moving around. For instance at our centre in Toronto sometimes I get a man who wants a bed for a night or two and some meals and then possibly we may not see the man again for six months or sometimes for a year and it seems that he has just been wandering around and seeing what will turn up. But we have other men who seem to be more or less settled in Toronto.

Senator McGrand: Tell me this. The transient that goes from place to place, that you just referred to—some originate from the slums of one city and go to the slums of another city, and so on. Do you find many violators of the law? Are there many people in that group who become bank robbers or holdup people? I have the impression that there is very few among that group.

Col. Smith: Yes, that is so. I would not say that they are law breakers. We get a number of men who have alcoholic problems and we get a number of men who quite frequently go to the Don Jail in Toronto or go to the Mimico reformatory and it is quite a problem to help them. Of course, Brigadier Monk has a centre there to help with alcoholic problems. I also might say that in Toronto we have a rehabilitation centre for men who are in difficulty and who need assistance and who can go there and get assistance to re-establish them but it is very difficult to do very much with them unless they have a desire for it. If a man has an alcoholic problem, it is not possible to send him for help unless he wants to go and is interested in being helped. Again, we have men in difficult circumstances who have an alcoholic problem or whom we feel they could be helped by a rehabilitation centre and we suggest that to them and urge them to go there and say that we can get them out of this groove and lift them on to a higher plateau of living, but we get a number of cases where they are not interested in doing that.

Senator McGrand: Pardon me, this is not just my question. You read in the newspapers about a robbery of a bank or a holdup, of people entering someone's home and tying up a man and stealing his money, and that sort of thing. That is a big part of crime today. When you see the names of those people who have been arrested—you do not find many of your old graduates there, do you?

Col. Smith: That is true.

Senator McGrand: That is not the type of person who goes to the Salvation Army for help? You do not come in contact with that type of people, yet they are all products of the slums.

Col. Smith: Well, I would not say they are all products of the slums.

Senator McGrand: For example, these people who are in trouble, for example those people who shot the two men out here beyond Ottawa two years or a year and a half ago, those fellows are all from the slums, from the poor areas of some particular city and these are the people who are committing the crimes of violence. But they come from the poor parts of the poor cities, from the slums, they are slum bred and slum trained people. But you do not run across that type of people very often, do you?

Col. Smith: No, we do not.

Senator Cook: On page 3 of your brief, under "Causes of Poverty", in section 1, you say:

It is not true that most poor people are lazy, and would rather live on welfare than get work. The working poor comprise some 65 to 75 per cent of the poverty problem in Canada. Many of the working poor would be better off financially on Welfare, but they prefer working.

On page 8, under the heading "The Working Poor", in paragraph 3, you say:

One of the tragedies of our society is that often the bread-winner of the families we are considering finds it necessary to cease work in order that his family might be provided for. In short, welfare payments come to more than his wages. This of course means a loss of self respect and independence, and the family accepting such a situation suffers immeasurable harm.

This has been told to us over and over again, and we agree. What is your solution for that?

Col. Ross: Mr. Pedlar may deal with that.

Mr. Pedlar: I believe that the solution we have is tied in with the negative income tax, the raising of the minimum wage, which would be a provincial matter.

Senator Cook: What about supplementing the income, allowing the working poor to keep a certain portion of their earnings before they have to forfeit it? Have you given any thought to that?

Mr. Pedlar: I believe we agree with that, too. The problem is that we wanted to provide some incentive to maintain the job and this is why we decided on the negative income tax rather than on the guaranteed minimum wage.

The Chairman: I think in effect what Mr. Pedlar is saying is that we want him to continue working under all circumstances, and that we make up the difference at the national level by a form of minimum maintenance. That is the substance of what he is saying rather than haphazardly helping A or B or C or D, so that it is an incentive to continue to work. This is something that is troubling most Canadians today. I was going to follow from what you said with another question. Any member of your delegation can answer this question or, for that matter, all of you can answer it. What is your view of the work ethic? We have had other churchmen come to us and discuss it and we have asked them questions about it.

Brig. Monk: Are you thinking in terms of people receiving an income from the Government while being allowed to work so that they can receive maximum benefit?

The Chairman: No. This is a matter which is troubling all of us and I imagine it comes from our spiritual background—that man shall toil, and we are having a hard time moving away from that concept. There are many people who see a society, whether it be tomorrow or next week or next month or next year where in the light of our present technology and what is going on in the world, there will be something like a maintenance income, whether a man works or does not work or whether a man is worthy or unworthy. In the light of that, we have to do some thinking. Now Mr. Pedlar, and indeed the rest of you at one time or another have used the term "incentive" each time you have talked about a maintenance income. So we can see what is bothering you, but it is bothering us too and in fact it is bothering everybody. What is your attitude towards the work ethic? One spiritual group here used the expression, that work was originally a punishment, and that it was in that concept that work was imposed upon man. I would like to know what your thoughts are on that matter.

Brig. Monk: In our own experience we have found that wherever a man expects to make any successful comeback or rehabilitation, part of this has been a work program. We have found this to be very successful, even if it involved only an hour a day at the beginning of his rehabilitation. We have found this to be very helpful. But in the overall rehabilitation program, we would think it very inadequate if we did not provide that man with some honest-to-goodness work whereby he can earn a living. Along with that goes the fact that if a man cannot earn enough to live, we have another problem. For instance, we had a man who had a family of nine in our clinic—and we are just using this one illustration which could work out the same way in a number of cases. This man was working for $75 a week whereas he needed $160 or $180 a week. That man should be subsidized.

The Chairman: But, Brigadier Monk, let us take the case of a man who is without a job and the Government for some reason or other is unable to provide employment and private industry is unable to provide employment. Where are we then?

Col. Smith: Mr. Chairman, personally I think there is value in work. I know there has been criticism of what is called the puritan ethic of work. We have a Canadian journalist who in a well-known book has scoffed at what he termed "the puritan ethic of work" and yet I suspect that he is himself a tremendous worker.

The Chairman: Is this Marshall McLuhan?

Col. Smith: No, Pierre Berton. In "The Smug Minority" he scoffs at the puritan ethic of work and yet, as I say, I think that he himself must be a tremendous worker. I have the view myself that very little that is worthwhile can be accomplished without work. I think it is good for the individual and I think it is good for the person. I think also it is quite true that we are moving more and more into an automotive society where there will not be the same reasons for working, and therefore in my view one of the major problems we are going to have to face is the fact that people will have a tremendous amount of spare time and a tremendous amount of leisure and we do not know how that will be occupied. As you know, the devil finds mischief for idle hands to do. I am personally convinced there is a tremendous therapeutic value in the discipline of work.

Col. Ross: Mr. Chairman, it is not very difficult and it has never been very difficult for me to find therapeutic value in good hard work—for the other fellow.

The Chairman: How well you put it. It rather reminds me of the people who are walking around the country today shouting about the way to solve our problems being to put on controls. During the war, people loved to have controls for you, but I did not like to have them for themselves. But you are a very practical group. I have known the work of Brigadier Monk for as long as I have known the Honourable Walter Dinsdale who worked in Toronto and used to come around the courts to assist in whatever way he could. I have seen how well he has risen in the esteem of the Canadian people.

I will give you your chance in a few minutes, Walter.

But we are now at the point where everybody agrees that technology may do away with a great number of jobs and there just will not be work available for people. There isn't too much work available for people right now. So what do we do for these people? I am not just talking about putting food on their tables. I am talking about something that is much more vital. How do we make them feel that they are somebody in the community?

Mr. Pedlar: I think the closest we come to answering that and the other problem is when we deal with how to motivate people. I think a number of times in our brief we suggest decentralization of agencies as much as possible and have community groups of volunteers with Government help. We feel this is the only way. Then the only way to get these volunteers, perhaps, is to run a real campaign to try to get them. But we need to have this personal contact, and the only way to get that is to decentralize everything and get neighbour lead groups involved.

The Chairman: We just happen to be fortunate enough to have in the room with us today the Honourable Walter Dinsdale who has been in this movement for forty or fifty years. What is your view on the work ethic as such? You appreciate it and you understand it. Perhaps you can enlighten us.

Honourable Walter Dinsdale: Senator Croll, I appreciate the opportunity of participating. I came in here as a visitor from the other place and I thank the members of the Senate Committee for allowing a commoner to take part in the discussions here this morning. Even though I am neglecting my responsibilities in the Commons committees, I wanted to come in and at least listen in on the discussion this morning. However, if I may be allowed to express an opinion on this fundamental point of the validity of the so-called work ethic in our technologically affluent society where the experts tell us that the need to make our living by the sweat of our brow is rapidly disappearing, I think this constitutes one of the great and fundamental value problems of our mid-twentieth century.

It is obvious that with automation, to use that awful word cybernation, computerization, and so forth, the demand for manual work is declining. Work hours are decreasing; leisure time is increasing proportionately; and because so many of the values of our society are related to this work ethic that has been an integral part of the Puritan ethic for several hundred years now, it places us in a quandary. You are asking this Salvation Army group this morning to resolve that quandary.

My reply would simply be this. You cannot resolve a fundamental change in values of this kind in one fell swoop. It has to be a process of gradual adjustment, if there is going to be any continuing social stability. I think we are adjusting to the changing demands of our technological society; that we are gradually adopting programs that will provide for the creative use of an increasing leisure time. I think that all political parties—and it is political parties which provide the motive power to social programs and social progress, in the long run—are gradually and cautiously moving towards the idea that the basic philosophy of social welfare-ism, which I think has been peculiar to all western countries, at least, will have to change. That is, the notion of the welfare state will have to give way to the more positive notion that instead of a “cradle-to-the-grave” surveillance of the social needs, even the broader needs of the individual by the state, in a multiplicity of welfare programs, there will have to be a rationalization that will be based on the fundamental change in the economics of society and that will be related to some sort of formulation that is called, among other things, guaranteed income. I say that, because all our social welfare programs based on the old idea of the welfare state have, as their fundamental purpose, guaranteeing an income, whether it is old age pensions or disabled pensions. Whether it be operated at the federal, provincial or municipal level, it is all geared to that one purpose of income maintenance.

I would think that an organization like the Salvation Army or other voluntary groups, which carry out a program that is based upon strong spiritual motivation tied to the Judaeo-Christian values and traditions, would have a very important role to play under this new co-ordinated or rationalized incomes program, because as I read the brief presented by the Salvation Army this morning I think what they are trying to emphasize is that man does not live by bread alone, that man does not live by cash income alone, but that there are other areas of impoverishment which embrace the total man. I do not think the state can do this. It has to be done by voluntary organizations which arise spontaneously to meet changes. The Salvation Army emerged out of the Industrial Revolution. We are going through a revolution today which is even more dramatic and traumatic than the Industrial Revolution.

The Chairman: Mr. Dinsdale, with the amount of poverty we have in the world today, real poverty, why are the people not aroused? Why have we not reached them at the conscience level? The affluent people, the people who have the wherewithal, why are they not concerned. Why is it so hard for us to involve them and to get across to them?

Hon. Mr. Dinsdale: If you are speaking of the extreme areas of poverty, I think there is rising concern today. When I speak of “extreme areas of poverty,” I am talking about people living in a slums, in the ethnic ghettos, on Indian reservations. I think there is a growing concern on the part of the more affluent segment of the population, and particularly of the younger people. You referred to the fact that I got involved in this back in “the dirty thirties,” when I was a young, pink-cheeked, beardless youth. . .

The Chairman: We were both young then.

Hon. Mr. Dinsdale: . . . from the Prairies, in the police courts in Montreal and Toronto. That was a challenge to my generation, and many young people responded. Many of them worked through the organized church in those days, and I think we are getting the same response now from a new generation of concerned young people, or even a generation that is referred to as an activist generation. I think, for example, the fact that senators are investigating poverty is an indication. . .

The Chairman: Not the young generation.

Hon. Mr. Dinsdale: I know, but this is the other end of the age spectrum.

Senator Cook: Vital, but not young.

Hon. Mr. Dinsdale: The fact that it is being investigated by a Senate committee is an indication of the concern.

The Chairman: Yes, but I can call a meeting on pollution and have the grounds around this building filled with 400,000, 500,000 or 600,000 people. If you call a meeting on poverty, you speak to yourself.

Senator Cook: One is new and the other is old.

Col. Ross: One touches them personally, and the other does not.

The Chairman: What is that?

Col. Ross: Pollution touches them personally; poverty does not.

The Chairman: Poverty does not?

Col. Ross: It does not seem to. They have their purse and their pocket full, and it does not touch their personal life.

Senator McGrand: It has taken 25 years to recognize pollution.

Hon. Mr. Dinsdale: On the question of pollution, we had a "Resources for Tomorrow" conference in 1961, of which I happened to be chairman. It was regarded as an exercise in futility because it was dealing with such a colourless subject as water resources.

The Chairman: That is 10 years ago.

Hon. Mr. Dinsdale: In 1961. The whole emphasis has changed, until today this has become one of the "in" things, but it has been at a critical stage for at least 15 years.

The Chairman: I agree with what you say, but poverty has been here for a long time too and it has not improved in our country. Nothing really has changed. Since 1966 there has been a 1 per cent drop in the number of people in poverty, and it has not changed much since 1966.

Hon. Mr. Dinsdale: But as I read the brief, senator, I think they pointed out that the whole category of poverty is a relative term. If we compare the poverty levels in Canada with poverty levels in the underdeveloped countries, such as India and some of the newly emerging nations of Africa, we see that what we describe as poverty is affluence to those people. Anybody who has travelled in underdeveloped countries will bear this point out, and I think this is being appreciated to a greater extent, as witnessed by the preoccupation with external aid programs on the part of the wealthier nations.

The Salvation Army and other church organizations have established voluntary service groups which are sending young people into the underdeveloped areas where they can make a personal contribution to the alleviation of a far greater problem of personal and spiritual impoverishment.

The measurement of poverty is very difficult. Much of our poverty in Canada is related to the revolution of rising expectations. We want more and more for less and less.

The Chairman: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Dinsdale: Actually, that is a psychological thing. You can have a level of expectation rise to such an extent that people will feel personally impoverished or alienated when they are actually not too badly off in terms of material things. On the other hand, people can feel personally, spiritually and psychologically fulfilled when they are in relatively dire circumstances materially. I come from a rural constituency in southwest Manitoba, and I know some of the elderly pioneer folk who have lived very satisfactory lives personally, who have contributed to their communities, and who have raised families who have achieved higher levels of attainment than they themselves have, and when they hear about the problem of poverty and the criteria that go with our description of poverty, such as lack of internal plumbing facilities and utilities that we take as commonplace today, they say: "Well, we have been living in poverty all of our lives, and did not realize it."

The Chairman: Have any of the committee members anything that they would like to ask the Honourable Walter Dinsdale? He has devoted many years of his life to this particular work.

Senator McGrand: I do not believe that we have the affluent society that we boast we have. This is part of the great American dream which embraces having the whole continent at our finger tips to explore and exploit. This has become part of the Canadian way of life. I do not think we have the affluence we think we have.

Senator Cook: Mr. Chairman, I agree with Mr. Dinsdale. Living in Newfoundland, and having lived in Newfoundland during the thirties—this applies also to many other parts of Canada, but it applies dramatically to Newfoundland—I can see where great progress has been made. There are more schools, more hospitals, more services, old age pensions where there were none before, family allowances, and many other things. There is still a great deal to be done, but there is a huge difference between what was the level of poverty in the old days and the level of poverty today.

The Chairman: That is a perfectly true observation, and it is particularly true of Newfoundland.

Senator Cook: I think it applies to many other rural parts of Canada.

The Chairman: There is no question of that, but as expectations rise then other expectations rise, and that has been the difficulty.

Senator Cook: I agree, but I do not think we should be too pessimistic. Progress has been made.

The Chairman: I should like to ask you, Major Ellery, to tell us something about the problem of the single parent. What is the extent of the problem as you see it in Ontario, and how big a problem is it? This is something we are concerned about and something we must put our minds to.

Major Ellery: The problem of housing has been the most difficult. It is a real problem to the single parent who exists on welfare and mother's allowance.

The Chairman: Let us talk about the single parent. I do not care whether she is divorced or is a widow. She is a single parent with some children.

Major Ellery: Yes.

The Chairman: At one time she was a stenographer, perhaps, and she has the capacity to work.

Major Ellery: Yes.

The Chairman: What do you do about her?

Major Ellery: I think the day nursery is one of the solutions.

The Chairman: Does she always want to go to work, or would she rather stay home and receive an allowance? What is her choice, as you see it?

Major Ellery: I would like to believe that she has a choice.

The Chairman: Tell us what you think about this matter. What has been your experience?

Major Ellery: Many of them would like to have a choice, but they just do not have that choice. They cannot provide adequate care for their child if they are out of the home. Therefore, they become frustrated mothers, and frustrated mothers are not the best mothers. On the other hand, some would like to be out of the home for part of the day and be fulfilled as a person, and such persons are more adequate mothers for their children during the hours they spend together.

The Chairman: What have you in the way of day care centres in, say, London?

Major Ellery: We have several.

The Chairman: Are these community day care centres, or are they run by voluntary organizations?

Major Ellery: They are both, but they are mostly voluntary.

The Chairman: And you have some?

Major Ellery: Yes, we have.

The Chairman: In whose field is the single parent head of family in Toronto?

Mr. Pedlar: Colonel Crolley's.

The Chairman: Your field is the whole of Canada, is it not?

Col. Crolley: Yes. As far as the Salvation Army is concerned in Toronto . . .

The Chairman: Forget about Toronto for the moment. Let us deal with the rest of Canada.

Col. Crolley: We have very little in the way of day care centres, taking Canada as a whole. We have just come into that area.

The Chairman: I know that, but I am talking about the single woman head of family. What is your experience with her across Canada? For instance, Major Ellery has told us about her frustration. She wants to go to work, but she cannot because she has a family to look after. We have heard that from many other people. What can she earn? Can she earn as much as she is able to receive if she is on an allowance? What are you finding in this respect across Canada?

Col. Crolley: I think the statement that Major Ellery has made with respect to the London situation applies across the country. She has worked in Vancouver, and what she has said is true of the Salvation Army right across Canada. We find the same thing across the country. We find that there are people who like to feel they have a choice in respect of whether they stay at home and support the child on mother's allowance or welfare, or go to work and maintain a much better home as a result.

Major Ellery: Perhaps we should also point out that a large number of disturbed children come out of the families with a single parent.

The Chairman: The number is greater than that of those who come out of normal homes?

Major Ellery: Yes.

Senator Cook: On page 8 you say:

One of the tragedies of our society is that often the bread-winner of the families we are considering finds it necessary to cease work in order that his family might be provided for. In short, welfare payments come to more than his wages. This of course means a loss of self respect and independence, and the family accepting such a situation suffers immeasurable harm.

We have found that a number of single mothers find it more advantageous to go on welfare because of all the medical services and so on that are provided. In the overall they are better off on welfare than they are while they are working. We are thinking that there should be some system whereby they should be encouraged to work but at the same time be able to receive some of the benefits from welfare. In other words, the welfare regulations are too rigid.

Major Ellery: But the municipalities will subsidize the day nurseries, and this makes it possible for the mother to work and to keep her income up.

The Chairman: You see, under the Canada Assistance Act the province shares the cost on a fifty-fifty basis. The province makes some arrangement with the municipality, or some private group within the municipality.

Senator Cook: But the mother loses her medical and dental assistance if she works.

The Chairman: Exactly, some of those single women who are working find that they earn just about what they might receive if they were on welfare. They find that they just cannot carry the medical, dental, and drug expenses. The result is that after we had our meeting with the Province of Ontario they changed their policy with respect to this and are providing it.

Major Ellery: Benefits such as medical insurance would be gained through employment.

The Chairman: Provided her employment included it, yes, but she would be paying for it, whereas on the other hand she would not.

Deductions are considerable by the time hospitalization, unemployment insurance and pension plan are taken into account.

Is there anything more, Colonel, that you or any of the group would like to say?

Col. Ross: I do not think so, except to express our sincere thanks for the courtesy of our reception.

The Chairman: I wish to tell you that this is a good brief. You said that Pedlar had done most or a great portion of it, but there is enough credit for all.

It is well expressed by Commissioner Wiseman in the words:

... we firmly believe that our affluent nation has the resources of wealth and intelligence to find an answer to the problem, providing we have the will to do so!

Col. Ross: Yes sir.

The Chairman: We questioned you particularly on that aspect.

We must also thank you for being one of the very few who took us seriously enough to follow our suggestion to provide a bilingual brief. It stands to the credit of the Salvation Army.

Col. Ross: We thought it was compulsory, sir.

The Chairman: We are delighted that you did it. On behalf of the committee I thank you.

The committee adjourned.

SUMMARY

FOREWORD

by

Commissioner Clarence D. Wiseman

William Booth, Founder of The Salvation Army, was dubbed a 'dreamer' by many of his contemporaries, but his vision and purpose brought into existence some of the major social reforms of our time. Not a few modern social services owe their origin to his courageous attack on poverty, evil, and injustice wherever he found them.

Booth's famous book, "In darkest England and the Way Out", published in 1890 was an exposé of the abject poverty that afflicted many of the industrial areas of Great Britain in that day. Practical measures to combat poverty were outlined in this book. Amongst them was a migration scheme under which The Salvation Army transported and settled literally hundreds of thousands of people in the open spaces of Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

The Salvation Army's unceasing concern for the poor rests on spiritual principles rooted in the Judean-Christian tradition, and supremely expressed in the teachings of the Bible.

William Booth established guidelines for Salvationists in their battle against evil and poverty that reveal profound wisdom and deep insight. For example, he stated that "any remedy worthy of consideration must be on a scale commensurate with the evil with which it proposes to deal. It is no use trying to bail out the ocean with a pint pot." He added "not only must the scheme be large enough, but it must not be merely a spasmodic effort . . . it must be established on a durable footing . . ."

Booth insisted on respect for the integrity of the person. "The indirect features of the scheme must not be such as to produce injury to the persons whom we seek to benefit". He also stated that "while assisting one class of the community it must not seriously interfere with the interests of another".

Canadian Salvationists welcome the Senate enquiry into poverty, and we firmly believe that our affluent nation has the resources of wealth and intelligence to find an answer to the problem, providing we have the will to do so!

We pledge ourselves to cooperate in any practical and creative measures compatible with our spiritual principles that might be adopted, and sincerely trust that something positive shall emerge quickly from the present enquiry.

WHAT IS POVERTY?

There has never been a society in any period of human history that has avoided the curse of poverty. The degree of poverty has waxed and waned with the rise and fall of nations and 'civilizations', but always there have been those described by the words of the poet where "...cruel penury has chilled the genial current of the soul."

The Salvation Army, as a religious and social movement, came into being in response to the challenge of a new wave of mass poverty rising in the wake of the Industrial Revolution.

"Darkest England" was a phrase used to describe the submerged tenth making up the human flotsam and jetsam of the booming industrial cities. It was much the same group that Marx described as the proletariat; downtrodden, inarticulate, powerless, impoverished. Using this unlikely material our Founder organized the first war on poverty in modern times by recruiting them into a Salvation Army.

The problem of poverty persists into the affluent and technocratic 20th century. In underdeveloped lands we hear of the millions in dire need below the subsistence level, and in the affluent West we have become so concerned that governments have launched massive new wars on poverty. Meantime, as the Negro Spiritual puts it simply and effectively, "the rich get richer and the poor get poorer".

Obviously, poverty today is a relative term. It goes far beyond the usual economic and financial criteria. How can we compare the poverty level in some countries where thousands of our fellow humans are on the verge of starvation, with the standards of living at all levels in the wealthier nations? Elaborate welfare programs, transfer payments, health and education programs are gradually placing citizens of the favoured nations above the level of physical and material need. Yet the pall of poverty hangs over a favored nation like Canada to such an extent as to persuade you distinguished Senators to carry out this commendable investigation in depth.

Perhaps what we are really investigating is the feeling of impoverishment brought about by the revolution of "rising expectations" marked by the popular pursuit engaged in by so many of us today "more and more for less and less". It is true we have pockets of poverty, slums, ethnic ghettos, and poverty pock marks and pollution marring the Canadian social landscape everywhere. The irony and tragedy is that we have the know-how and technical skills to eliminate this social blight if only we had the will and social conscience to provide the motivation. This is where the Church with its emphasis on spiritual dimensions comes into the picture.

Above all else poverty concerns man: the whole man, body, mind and spirit, all of which must be served if he is to live the "life more abundant". Surely it is clear today that the 'good life' does not consist in the abundance of goods we possess. We see our fine young people dropping out from affluent homes because of the atmosphere of moral and spiritual impoverishment. We see aged parents, minority groups, the physically and mentally handicapped neglected, deprived of human dignity, human opportunity, human freedom for the same reason.

It will require more than government action to break through these social, psychological and spiritual barriers. What is needed is a partnership of individuals and voluntary groups committed and dedicated to serving man. In the early, less sophisticated days, The Salvation Army endeavoured to encompass the whole man with the simple slogan, "soup, soap, salvation". It realized that people suffering from impoverishment could only break out into a more abundant life as they personally became involved in finding solutions. Hence, the battle cry of that early and continuing war on poverty; 'Saved to Serve'—for "Man's extremity is God's opportunity."—and God works through His people.

CAUSES OF POVERTY

It is not true that most poor people are lazy, and would rather live on welfare than get work. The working poor comprise from 65 to 75 per cent of the poverty problem in Canada. Many of the working poor would be better off financially on Welfare, but they prefer working. The ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA, in its 6th Annual Review, Chapter 7, says as much, adding, "On the basis of careful investigations, it would appear that most of the poor are ready to seize appropriate jobs when these are available. Furthermore, some recent research suggests that the aspirations of the poor for economic opportunities and a middle class style of life may be very strong, and the desire to participate in a productive way in our society is more often frustrated than lacking." Poverty, in many cases, is the consequence of forces beyond the individual's control.

Insufficient Income—While money is not the complete answer to the problem of poverty, it is obvious that many are poor because they do not have sufficient income. Others with insufficient income include those living on Welfare, Family Benefits and Old Age Security pensions. The problem is more acute when people with small incomes have large families. The high cost of living, especially the cost of housing, makes it almost impossible for people with low incomes to maintain even a reasonable standard of living.

Poor Education and Lack of Skills—Many in this automated technological age, simply cannot fit in because of poor education and lack of skills. Some are incapable of absorbing further education or training, but this is not true of the majority. In some cases they left school early because they did not realize the value of education, or dropped out because of the necessity of helping to support the family. It may be their parents did not encourage them to continue at school.

Addictions—These vices drain away resources which should be used for essentials such as food, clothing, housing. This is becoming a growing problem due to aggressive promotion of the sale of liquor, and increasing permissiveness with respect to gambling and drugs.

Mismanagement—Many are inefficient at budgeting and managing their affairs.

Abuse of Credit Buying—Credit buying can be a boon to those who are able to plan and allocate funds through proper budgeting, but it is a serious pitfall to those with small incomes who are not competent. In many instances such people owe large amounts to finance companies and department stores. Advertising makes many things seem desirable and even necessary, and poor people yield to the temptation to buy on credit.

Misfortune—The large majority of poor people are not criminals, addicts or 'multi-problem' individuals, but folk who, because of circumstances beyond their control, have become poverty-stricken. They include the physically and emotionally handicapped, elderly people who have worked hard, own their little home, get along on pension, then are suddenly impoverished by inflation or heavy nursing-home expenses. Some have lost their jobs because of closing down of factories, making it especially difficult for an older worker to secure another position. Some people are "not so much born into the world as damned into it." They come from poor families, live in sub-standard housing—receive little care or training—and are not encouraged to stay at school.

POVERTY AND THE AGED

When one reads that a family spends more than 70 per cent of its income on food, clothing and shelter, and that the income of hundreds of aged is below the stated amount required to live decently and above the poverty line, we are faced with a problem that needs urgent attention. Again it is not that they are lazy or indifferent, but, on the contrary, unskilled, crippled or ill with no hope of supplementing their income. Much is being done to prolong life, but people should not then be left to languish in loneliness and want.

After working hard to build up what they thought was a reserve, paying off the mortgages on a house, educating children, paying their share of taxes, the aged find their resources eaten up with inflationary costs. They are forced to sell their home, live in rooms, or, if fortunate, a lodge or institution where they are charged beyond their means.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

Senior Citizen's Residences should be built near transportation and shopping so that the elderly are not isolated. Our senior citizens have a special contribution to make in society, and every effort should be made to keep them in the mainstream of the community. In our impersonal urbanized society this may be an effective way of bridging the generation gap that threatens to become a chasm.

Drop In Centres—In such places those who live alone could have fellowship, conversation, and creative activity.

Increased Financial Assistance—Old Age security and assistance programs have failed to keep pace with inflation. These should be geared to the actual cost of living index. Incentive should be provided by allowing senior citizens to retain any earnings.

Medicare—Such plans should be upgraded to provide for drug prescriptions, eye glasses, dentures and other para medical services for senior citizens.

POVERTY AND CRIME

There is a connection between crime and poverty. The lack of the essentials of life may influence individuals towards breaking the law. This points up the need for the government to strengthen and enforce the minimum wage Act.

Sending the Bread-Winner to Prison—Too often the male bread-winner is jailed, and the family deprived of his earning power. The mother is reduced to accepting inadequate welfare, or, if she works, cannot cope with the cost of basic needs.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

Personal Recognizance—We urge an increased use of the summons, which would reduce serious loss of job, or of work-days, both of which drain the small family income. Release on personal recognizance on charges that are not too serious allows the accused to continue to support his anxious family.

"Time-to-Pay the Fine"—This is a help to those who have no ready cash, but even so it still prolongs family distress. We suggest on the basis of our experience, that a warning, suspended sentence and/or probation would often have the desired effect.

The Young Offender—needs closer supervision on probation. Often he cannot return to his poverty-stricken home. The ideal place for him is the beneficial environment of homes like THE HOUSE OF CONCORD, where he may continue his schooling or learn a trade.

Free Legal Aid—Indigent persons urgently need this guidance, but it should be instituted on a much wider scale—at Federal rather than Provincial level.

Psychiatric Treatment—When this is ordered by the Court, the full cooperation of the employer should be sought so the accused may be able to maintain his earning power while under treatment.

Pay for Prisoners—We feel this system should be made more profitable through the manufacture, by prisoners, of goods that are in demand. If prisoners were paid more, the inmate could better support his family, make reparation to his victims or budget his savings, all of which would play a vital part in his rehabilitation. Such accumulated credits could provide funds at the time of the prisoner's release for families, for job training or for transportation. Under certain schemes money has been made available for work-permits, licenses, tools, union dues, etc., and should be expanded under supervision to ensure early employment for released prisoners.

After-Care—The Salvation Army urges extension of present efforts to unite inmate husbands with wives and recommends the extension of the present "work leave" program now operative.

POVERTY AND THE MULTI-PROBLEM FAMILY

The term "Multi-Problem Family" has long been a part of the vocabulary of social theorists. It describes a family that is the victim of a deep-seated entanglement of many social problems of long duration. These families are often bypassed, or given only emergency assistance. The Salvation Army has a wide contact with this group, and is concerned because present social policies aggravate and perpetuate the problem.

Contributing Factors—Poverty in the multi-problem family is best understood by looking at the factors contributing to its existence—the basic cause being unemployment and/or unemployability. Lack of money and material comforts are at the root of this snowballing phenomenon, leading to inadequate housing, growing worse over a period of time. Continued lack of money and dependence on small government assistance lasting from generation to generation leads to an irreversible lethargy on the part of the parents, manifested in personal and family neglect, and increasing hopelessness.

A Psychological Look—These families possess immature personalities in terms of ego development. They act out their feelings and frustrations and show poor impulse control, seen in the continued pattern of alcoholism and unreliability, or the inability to manage what limited financial resources are available.

Dependent Factors—The dynamics of dependency operate here. These people, disillusioned and with no ability to look to the future, are captives of the present, and are dependent on their life-situation as it is now. Their deep-seated hostility toward those who want to help or change them, makes it almost impossible to alter their situation.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

To break this cycle of poverty we might best concentrate much of our effort on the children. There should be educational and rehabilitation emphasis, and we feel this can best be initiated from community or neighbourhood-based agencies. The individual must be seen as a complete person, not divided into segments of welfare, public health, school, manpower and child-welfare as he is now. We must be willing to adapt to new techniques.

Jobs and Income—Poverty is caused by an inadequate family income. Thus an effective war on poverty should include two basic socio-economic measures: (1) a program to create jobs and (2) a program of income maintenance. Such a policy of job creation would need full action on the part of the government as an employer and co-ordinator, and a commitment by the business community. Associated with this plan of creating job-opportunities is the whole area of employability programs. This plan should be expanded.

Income Maintenance—Because of personal inadequacy, work alone will not solve the problem. We should consider a negative Income Tax plan to maintain income at a suitable level, while at the same time providing Rehabilitation programs to encourage personal incentive.

SINGLE PARENT FAMILIES

The absence of one parent through divorce, separation, illegitimate pregnancy or death results in a single parent family whose many problems deserve our concern and demand our attention.

The salvation Army has been aware of the special needs of the unmarried mother and continue to develop services through maternity homes and hospitals to meet such needs until after the birth of the child. Should the unmarried mother accept the responsibility of keeping her child—her needs become those of the single parent family.

The breakdown of the family irrespective of cause creates an identity problem for its members and their role may become irreversibly distorted. Their circumstances are such that their problems are frequently perpetuated from generation to generation. Economic poverty is an additional burden to the unnatural circumstances which exist. The single parent who is left with adequate financial support has a far greater opportunity to maintain a stable family unit than the one who must depend on public support.

Single Parent Families Need Help With Poverty in Several Areas—

(a) Physical Poverty—the results of which are clearly evident. Families are forced to live in inadequate houses, eat inadequate food and wear inadequate clothes. Their financial income is further depleted by their lack of management skills and also their inability to improvise.

(b) Emotional Poverty—may in its early stages be hidden poverty. Relationships are likely to be superficial and defensive. They are unwilling to reveal their deeper needs and experience further rejection. Such needs continue unmet.

(c) Social Poverty—becomes evident as children grow and develop without the opportunity to learn social skills through exposure to, and participation in, the facilities of the affluent society.

As we look at the total needs of people we must become aware of:

(i) The inequality of justice—that allows welfare recipients to live in condemned housing yet pays tax dollars to the affluent landlord.

(ii) The inequality of opportunity that restricts the mother the use of dental services, recreation and educational facilities.

(iii) The inequality of expenditure—that provides large sums of money to care for a child once he has been removed from his own home.

How much does it cost to care? If we believe that a child's needs can best be met in his own family then our spending of the tax dollars does not reflect our thinking. Through Mother's Allowance a natural mother is paid approximately $500 per year to meet the needs of her child. Through Foster Home care a mother is paid approximately $1,000 a year to meet the needs of the child who has been removed from his own home. The Treatment Centre is paid approximately $10,000 per year to meet the needs of the child who is not able to make a suitable adjustment within his own or surrogate home.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

The Salvation Army asks government officials to determine whether or not this kind of spending can be justified when we know that much emotional illness results from rejection and stress in early years, when we know that treatment of emotional ills is more successful when treated in the phase of development in which it occurs.

We ask that consideration be given to the feasibility of a more adequate income supplemented by a more adequate counselling service for the single parent family at the point of need. Surely such a program is not only financially more sound but emotionally more human.

Day care Service for the pre-school child is a luxury for some, a strong emotional support for others and a financial impossibility for many who need this kind of care. Such a service may free the mother to return to the labour force, become more fulfilled as a person and thus become a more adequate parent to her child. We recommend such services should be recognized in all areas of our country as worthy of tax support; making it possible for voluntary groups, already active in this field to meet the growing need.

THE WORKING POOR

For the purposes of this study we are dealing only with the working poor in urban areas. In many cases the cost of accommodation amounts to more than fifty percent of the "take home pay". As housing must always take priority over all other expenses, the provision of food, clothing and other necessities must suffer.

We must also realize that there will always be certain types of employment that are at the bottom of the wage-scale. These jobs are not highly productive, and it would be economically unsound to pay high salaries to those who undertake this type of work.

One of the tragedies of our society is that often the bread-winner of the families we are considering finds it necessary to cease work in order that his family might be provided for. In short, welfare payments come to more than his wages. This of course means a loss of self respect and independence, and the family accepting such a situation suffers immeasurable harm.

Another problem that sometimes arises in these families is that the wife and mother often feels compelled to get a job to supplement the family income, when she is really needed at home. Again the family suffers, and the children are deprived of the guidance and influence of mother when these are most needed.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

Housing—We feel more vigorous measures must be taken to provide subsidized, low dividend or public housing.

Minimum Wage—We recommend the raising of the minimum wage.

Work Training Opportunities—The adult re-training program should be broadened to make it possible for the working poor, who had insufficient formal schooling to upgrade themselves to the required entrance level—especially those over 40.

POVERTY AND ADDICTION

Addictions that contribute most to poverty appear to be alcoholism and the misuse of drugs, there is ample proof such addictions compound personal and family problems resulting in unemployability, loss of work hours, permanent unemployment and, consequently, poverty.

Alcoholism—The consumption of alcoholic beverages appears to be recognized as part of our way of life. Social drinking seems to be equated with gracious living. The Salvation Army deplores this accelerating trend and finds confirmation for its concern in information gathered from data provided by the American Medical Association indicating a preponderance of alcoholics come from homes where social drinking was part of the family pattern.

In Ontario, where this brief is being collated, the Alcohol and Drug Concerns Incorporated states the incidence of confirmed alcoholics in the Province exceeds 115,000 and is growing, on a per capita basis, annually.

In addition to the above the same survey shows that, with each confirmed alcoholic there are seven other people involved in the resultant problems (Family, friends, business associates etc.)

Consequences—The relationship of alcoholism to poverty is sharply pointed up in an article entitled 'One Hundred thousand reasons why Ontario must review its liquor policy' written by Mr. Val Sears, a staff writer on the Toronto Star.

Mr. Sears states, and we have no cause to doubt his presentation, that alcoholism is responsible for the loss of nearly one million working hours per year. Even on the basis of the present unsatisfactory minimum wage Act the amount lost is not inconsiderable. The writer further states that, in the Province in which his survey was made, in terms of family suffering, 300,000 lives may well be blighted this year.

The shattering effects of alcoholism are not only to be computed on a financial level but must be assessed in terms of health, education and security. Indeed, it is in these latter areas that The Salvation Army finds its chief concern, for, in our thinking, people count more than money.

The use and abuse of drugs, on all age levels but particularly among the young is a phenomenon of comparatively recent times. A social evil that is growing at an alarming pace.

The effect of such addiction, in the area of poverty, is apparent. But, at our present pace, the future will face the situation when, many people, thus addicted will be completely unemployable adding to the poverty cycle by the necessity of laying out great sums of money on rehabilitation and treatment.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

Advertising of all products leading to harmful addiction or the possible impairment of health should be restricted and rigidly controlled.

The use or unnecessary display of addictive products, in media presentation should be curtailed preferably through the cooperation of the industry and the media.

Laws governing the use or possession of additives, particularly drugs, should give priority to the treatment and rehabilitation of the victim rather than punishment, while, at the same time, retaining and even accentuating such clauses that ensure the effective punishment of the trafficker.

POVERTY AND THE TRANSIENT ALIENATED YOUTH - IMMIGRANT

Transients—Man's story is one of restless searchings through every age—this one is no exception. For over a century, The Salvation Army has served the homeless wanderer, seeking to help those who strain for new horizons—those who flee responsibility in their current environment or seek work in the next city. Depression, war, immaturity produce drifters travelling from one bread-line to another. It is difficult to do more than meet the surface needs of such men—feeding the hungry, clothing the ragged, sheltering the weary. However, counselling and understanding sometimes are effective in instilling a sense of responsibility, especially in the young. Many men, now well established in society, were drifters during the 1930 depression.

Alienated Youth—Today the problem is accentuated by youthful graduates from permissive or broken homes crowding in 'hippie havens'—restless 'floaters' determined only to please themselves—learning nothing from previous generations and responsible to none. Society has shown them, through the mass media, the worst in life, leading them to experiment with all the evils of modern society. Disillusioned, then disturbed, they resort to unconventional and anti-social action that makes its contribution towards continued poverty. and while frequently based in large cities these young people are transients in spirit.

Facing these facts, our society must ask itself "What can be done to halt this bitter harvest of a permissive sowing?" Proof is evident that youthful inexperience, unguided, uncontrolled leads to disaster!

A genuine empathy for such youth, in unstructured, yet controlled programs, provides the greatest opportunity for a meaningful partnership, a lessening of tensions and alienation, while floundering for a firm foothold in this cybernetic era. Whether at a 'drop-in' center or hostel, warm personal guidance for the 'whole' person is clearly indicated as a shelter from what is considered an impersonal 'establishment' personified in Government or business. We urge continued support and speedy extension of such proven centres which will increasingly bring the greatest returns for our own, and for community investment.

Immigrants—Having emerged from previous generations of immigrants to Canada, one must be constantly reminded of the dire need into which the newcomer may still fall. He and his children are the citizens of tomorrow—this is sufficient, in itself, for assuring equal rights and privileges for all, for this is the land that beckons with the promise of a 'human rights' in a 'just society'!

Patterns of discrimination regularly appear in employment/unemployment situations and may need local or Federal Government intervention if the migrant family is to become happily absorbed as Canadians. He can be trapped in 'red-tape' problems found at all levels of business—industry—labour. Man-power agencies are often unaware of the serious plight of the new citizen within our borders—and who may well have professional qualifications.

Here again, it can become a struggle to survive, let alone plan for a family which can include those still waiting overseas. Into such settings, the Army seeks to supplement aid from kindly neighbours while struggling to allay fears of deportation and untangle the web of circumstances that lead to worthwhile citizenship in their new home.

We have studied and appreciate the immigration policy of our Country which, when operated on the basis of human need and personal helpfulness, is most effective. It is admittedly difficult for officials governed by fixed policy to maintain an objective attitude. Those thus concerned would do well to make their appraisal warm and humane.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

The many sided attempts to understand the ramifications of poverty today suggest the urgent necessity for a new approach. It is becoming clear that we are not only discussing human development but also human survival. Faced with a crisis of growing hate, hostility, frustration, violence and alienation, lonely voices are crying in a wilderness of fear and hopelessness for a compassionate society.

Civilization has arrived at a moment in history when there is no margin for error. Some people in society get more and more while the majority get less and less. Whether the causes are economic, social, cultural or authoritarian, to ignore the ecology of the problem of man's total needs would add to the disparity and to the despair.

It is evident the problems of poverty and human misery have over-ridden moral and spiritual dimensions. For example, the root cause of poverty is the breakdown of the family. The modern family instead of being the healing place of the soul has become the breeding ground for delinquency, divorce an individual breakdown. The unrelated attempts to alleviate this impoverishment of the spirit and personality have largely ignored the rights, the dignity and the worth of the individual. The results are dehumanizing and demoralizing. It is not sufficient to eliminate the physical and material needs of the poor when, under the complex surface symptoms, there is complete spiritual disarray. A deep concern of the church is that this spiritual malnutrition is suffered by all—not only the impoverished.

To bring relevancy to these issues, the time for paternalism, superimposed programs, false optimism and hypocrisy is past. The need is to improve the quality of human relations. The human endeavour must involve people in decision making and self help projects. This is a shift in emphasis to being of service rather than imposing servility. It will require new motivation, dedication and moral courage that, we believe, best come from man's reconciliation with God.

It is a sad side effect of the new morality that there are growing tensions between church and state just at a time when there should be greater cooperation. The latter tends to regard religious bodies as of little significance or even of nuisance value. The church has no unique wisdom or technical answers to administrative problems but it has a definite role to serve as conscience for society. In addition it has the traditional role to serve the whole man.

To meet the challenge of poverty all levels of authority must create the climate, the motivation and cooperation plus the perseverance to transform and renew all areas of life. Only in this manner is it possible for mankind to carry on the never ending task of being a co-worker with God in finishing creation.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, June 11th, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9:30 a.m.

Senator David Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I will call the meeting to order. We have a brief today from the Executive Committee of the Canadian Catholic Conference, and the Executive Committee of the Canadian Council of Churches.

On my right is Mr. Grant Maxwell, who is the Co-Director of Social Action; he will introduce the delegation. If you have occasion to use the translation, that is available to you. I think perhaps you have had enough experience with it, if you find occasion to use it.

Mr. Grant Maxwell, Co-Director of Social Action (English Section), Canadian Catholic Conference: Thank you, Senator Croll. We are sharing these preliminaries. If I may, I will ask Dr. Floyd Honey, who is General Secretary of the Canadian Council to introduce our delegation.

Dr. Floyd Honey, General Secretary, Canadian Council of Churches: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators. You have already introduced yourself, Mr. Grant Maxwell, who is the Co-Director of Social Action of the Canadian Catholic Conference, English Sector. Sitting next to him is Canon Maurice Wilkinson, Associate Secretary of the Canadian Council of Churches.

Flanking the head table on the right here first of all Son Exc. Mgr Georges-Leon Pellerier, Eveque des Trois-Rivieres, et president, Office l'Action Sociale. Next to him is the Reverend Everett MacNeil, who is General Secretary for the English Section of the Canadian Catholic Conference. Next to Father Macneil is Dr. R. B. McClure, Moderator of the United Church of Canada, and beside him is M. l'abbé Charles E. St-Onge, directeur, Office l'Action Sociale, de la Conference Catholique Canadienne, from Ottawa.

In the back row on the right facing us as we view them here, the Reverend Norman Berner, Secretary of the Lutheran Church in America (Canada Section). He comes from Kitchener. Next to him the Reverend Gordon Walker, who is Secretary of the Division of Evangelism and Social Action of the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec, representing the Baptist Federation of Canada.

Finally, the Reverend D. G. Smith of Christ Church Cathedral in Ottawa. Archdeacon Light, who is the General Secretary of the Anglican Church of Canada had intended to be here but was prevented from attending by the illness of his wife and Mr. Smith is here in his place.

If I may say just another word by way of general introduction. One might say, Mr. Chairman, that the impetus which led to the preparation and submission of our brief today came originally from the Conference held in Montreal in May of 1968, an inter-church conference on the theme, Christian Conscience and Poverty.

As part of the follow-up from that conference, which was indeed a landmark as far as sensitizing the churches to the issues of poverty both in Canada and the world is concerned, the Canadian Council of Churches and the Canadian Catholic Conference set up in the fall of 1968 a joint committee whose terms of reference were to propose a practical strategy of unified action for all Christian churches in their present programs of social action and in particular concerning poverty and their future action programs which may evolve in an ecumenical spirit.

That committee worked for several months and produced a report which bears the title "Towards a Coalition for Development" which, I believe, is in your documentation.

This report proposed the establishment of a coalition of Canadians for development and there is information concerning the evolution of this coalition in the brief that we are submitting today, but one of the other recommendations, which was contained in this report, was that the Canadian Catholic Conference and the Canadian Council of Churches should join in submitting a brief to the Senate Committee on Poverty.

We have had a joint committee again working over some months in the preparation of this brief. It now has the endorsement of the Executive Committee and Board of the Canadian Catholic Conference and the Executive Committee of the Canadian Council of Churches.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and Mr. Maxwell will commence the outlining of the brief.

Mr. Maxwell: Senator Croll and members of the Committee, in discussing procedure this morning Senator Croll said to me that we could have several opening statements so long as it did not take the whole morning. We are going to content ourselves with one although it may be a rather omnibus one, I think we can stay within the ten or fifteen minutes on it.

I will briefly speak of the genesis of this brief and really what we are trying to do within it, and l'abbé St-Onge and Canon Wilkinson, who were collaborators in the drafting stage, may want to add some comments to that.

As Dr. Honey has said the preparation of this brief grew out of this little book which I think has been brought to you by more than one of the church delegations already and several of the same persons who worked on this Coalition for Development document last year also worked on the preparation of this brief.

I would like to put on the record that we owe much to two colleagues who have moved into new fields and are not with us. I refer to Dr. Charles Forsythe and to the Reverend William Ryan, S. J., who were members of the committee who worked on the preparation of this brief along with some others of us.

The brief, too, that is before you owes much to the social insights of the Second Vatican Council, of the World Council of Churches proceedings in January, 1966, and, as Dr. Honey said, to the Montreal Poverty Conference of May, 1968. I think that date has some significance that in May, 1968, which is over two years ago, twelve of the churches in Canada jointly sponsored a conference, Conscience and Poverty, in Montreal, and it was one, I think, that brought forcefully to the attention of Christians and to other Canadians the urgency, the question of conscience of trying to deal with poverty, not only in Canada but also abroad. That conference predated by a few months the Economic Council report, their fifth annual report, which, as you know, brought the issue of poverty forcefully to the Canadian public's attention.

Now, our brief is a modest one. It has limited scope. We do not come before you as social technicians, as persons expert in various of the social fields. You have had many presentations by those who are expert in this or that economic or political field. So far as we are competent, honourable senators, we tried to be interpreters of the Judea-Christian tradition. We are trying in this brief to give utterance to a voice of social concern, to speak for human values, of which sometimes sight can be lost.

We come before you, as we are called to, as churches, as Christian groups, as watchful critics of this society or any other and we offer some criticisms of existing priorities in Canada. We offer some hopes for a new social policy and for some new priorities and we offer in the brief a progress report on an experiment in the voluntary sector, The Coalition for Development. You have the brochure which we just received from the printers this morning and we will be speaking more about that.

Now, in the first chapter or section, "Perspective and Norms," we attempt there to situate the problem of poverty within a vision of man in society, something broader than the solely economic. We try to offer a biblical perspective and we raise the question whether existing priorities for all the good things that are accomplished in Canada, do in all cases put human values first in our society.

On pages 5 to 8 we try to express what we call the process of liberation. That is something that looks beyond just the idea of development and you may want to question us on this. I think we should stress that we are not committed to any one ideology. While we may criticize the status quo in any or every society, that does not mean, on the other hand, we are committed to a particular ideology or philosophy. If any word could be used to describe the kind of society we want, it would be the term, I think, which was pioneered by the World Council, "A responsible society, one that has a broader base of participation," which, I am sure, coincides with your own aspirations and with those of citizens' groups and many others.

We propose two working norms in the light of our perspective. One, that full development of Canada depends on a closer working relationship between the public sector, governments, and the parliamentary process and, on the other hand, private sector and volunteer groups. With respect to the voluntary groups we have been convinced by this report and other evidence that new working partnerships are required in order that from the voluntary sector there can be greater impact on social policy. That is what led us to initiate through the Council and the Conference the coalition process.

We are giving in this progress report a report of how far the coalition experiment has come. It is only a year ago now that we started to have exploratory talks with people in the trade union movement and business and so forth and it is only now well-launched.

We added this morning a further piece of material to the documentation as an example of what the coalition is trying to do. It is this sheet and this statement is a statement on tax reform which the coalition executive, and all their names are listed there, prepared and made public just Tuesday and in it we are proposing to try to get the partner organizations in the coalition to bring in a countervailing balance in the present tax reform debate.

In the third section of our brief—I think it is wholly in line with the perspective we offer—we say that the first priority in social policy-making should be to guarantee basic human rights which in Canada is underway. We try to point out some areas where it is needed further. We outline four specifics there and really there we endorse the positions already advocated by the Evangelism and Social Services of the United Church for the Canadian Welfare Council.

I think page 20 sums up our hopes best of all, where we say we look to this Committee to initiate and to bring forward creative and concrete recommendations that will help initiate a new social policy for Canada.

We think that you are a body particularly well-placed and with competence and with the richness of proposals and suggestions that have been made to you to give that public service and we are confident that you will. Along with it we put in a plug for the idea of having a social council in Canada that would be of similar stature as the Economic Council.

Finally, members of the Committee, we come to the question of will and attitudes which to a large degree puts the problem right back on our doorsteps as religious groups. In that section we acknowledge our public responsibility. We claim to be agents of moral concern and interpreters of human values. Well, if this is so and if we live up to that responsibility, we have much more to do and we acknowledge that. Finally, we reaffirm our commitment to the four social guidelines which are in this little book of May, 1969. They are social guidelines for the 1970's so we have some time to honour the commitments there, and yet we realize the urgency of bringing home to the people who call themselves Christians their responsibility to their brother at home and abroad. We are hoping that at least a creative minority will respond to our efforts in that regard.

I think, Senator Croll, perhaps M. l'abbé St-Onge or Canon Wilkinson might want to add briefly to those remarks.

[Translation]

Father Charles E. St-Onge, Director, Social Action Department, Canadian Catholic Conference: Mr. Chairman, you have just heard Mr. Maxwell who gave you an overall picture of the brief that was submitted to you today, and I also believe that Mr. Maxwell pointed out to you the important facts in the brief. I would like to give you my personal impressions of what struck me when working on this brief and its final completion.

This morning I am of the opinion that we should ask for a gift here, an ability to be shocked and to shock others, and we have several good reasons for being shocked.

We recognize today that what is surprising is not the fact that there are poor people. It is a fact which is as old as the world itself, but it is the fact that in 1970, in a society of plenty, we can countenance living with poverty around us. This is the first time in the history of mankind, I think, that we can fight this problem, that we can effectively undertake the battle against poverty, but we wonder whether we have the courage to do so, whether we are capable of shaking off our apathy and that of our fellow-citizens in order to solve this problem which is unacceptable today. The experts are in agreement in saying that we have the means to solving a problem such as this, that we know how to go about it, but what are we lacking. Yet there are other spectacular projects, for example, the conquest of space where the experts had their doubts as to whether such a project could possibly be achieved, and yet they have succeeded, while on a problem like the other, the experts agree that there is a way to solve it.

Another good reason for being shocked when faced with the problem confronting us today is that we are losing ground in this battle against poverty. The decade of the 60's has been described as a setback where development is concerned. We are gradually losing ground in our aid to under-developed countries, and here in Canada—I do not have the statistics on hand to say whether we are progressing in that area. And I think that it is not unfitting this morning to point out a few rather revealing facts about our success, or lack of it, with respect to foreign aid.

At this moment I recall the testimony of the Oblate missionaries working in Latin America who came and presented to the Government of Canada a brief on Canada's foreign policy towards Latin America, and in that document there are quotes which should disturb us. When they say, for example, that the aid service in Latin America, the under-developed countries cancel 75 per cent of the aid that Canadians, Americans, the industrialized countries want to give those under-developed countries.

Another situation. Our statistics said that in 1950 and 1965, the price of imported products rose by 21 per cent in the under-developed countries while the price of exported goods fell by 9 per cent. The Americans who invested $3,800,000,000 in Latin America had returns of $11,300,000, during that same period. Who profited the most from that aid?

And we also heard the Prime Minister of Jamaica state that in 1966 it took 650 tons of sugar-cane to buy a Canadian tractor whereas it would seem that in 1968 it took 3,500 tons. Therefore, if the situation deteriorates, I think that it is time to change the situation.

We might also have another reason for being shocked when we take stock of ourselves, we here who have come together to work on this problem of poverty, and I believe that it is of prime importance that we ask ourselves to what extent we are committed to this problem of poverty. Have we lived it within us? Do we identify with groups? Have we felt in our flesh and bones the crucial questions concerning the poor? Otherwise, we would run the risk of being amateurs in broaching this problem, or even of being the poor, and with all the limitations that being committed to a problem like that involves.

In this document, in the brief, I believe that the basic idea, the basic expression which runs through the pages like a refrain and—let us go on to the words liberation and participation—if there is a key which should, in my opinion, assure us success, that is the one: liberation through participation. And you will see this word crop up constantly throughout the pages of the brief. We shall find fair and realistic solutions only if we actually agree to rally around the basic idea with those who continually live with these problems of poverty. I know that we can bring them enlightenment; we have experts among us who have tackled the problem and who are able to observe it in its entirety. But if all we have left are office solutions, inanimate solutions, if we lean over the table, we run the great risk of sidestepping the real priorities as we have done in the past. Therefore we shall have to listen to the voice of the poor who offer explanations awkwardly and timidly most of the time, but we must try to perceive the depths of their aspirations as much as possible.

And in conclusion, I would also like to show how this brief falls in line with a message which was given last year by the Episcopal Commission on Social Action of which Monseigneur Pelletier is chairman. The commentators who studied that message were called prophetic, and I again find the same tolling of the bell, the same echo in this brief that was submitted to you today as in that message which was devoted to the new power. The message tried to define what was this new phenomenon that was appearing in present day society, and what this new power—they say it is a redistribution of power among groups who until now have been deprived of it. The bishops have viewed this emergence favourably, this birth of a new power in society, both civil and religious, and have said: this distribution of power will result in a greater participation in decisions, it makes a further call to people's sense of responsibility and we believe that it can make a large contribution to man's development and to building a more humane society.

In this phenomenon, it was also pointed out that the powerless, the deprived, those left aside, could, through this emergence, give themselves a voice to express their dissatisfactions, and their satisfaction and dialogue more with those who hold power.

And they did not fail to condemn the anonymity of these impersonal powers, (crafty(?)) and cut off from life. And the average citizen no longer accepts being excluded from decision centres which decide on his daily life. I could add more than a page, but it is the same echo, the same tolling of the bell that comes up in the brief, and I believe that that must attract our attention today since we are concerned with the problem of poverty, the little people, the economically weak, those who do not have the power to speak and ask for what, they are convinced, they are entitled to. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

The Chairman: Thank you.

Canon Maurice Wilkinson, (Associate Secretary of the Canadian Council of Churches): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Your Chairman thinks your memories are not too good. I am Canon Wilkinson of the Canadian Council of Churches. I would like to just perhaps dwell for a moment on some of the bases on which this brief is built. I think it is not without exaggeration to say that the flow of theological concern and social involvement reflected in this brief is in the full stream of the concern and theological development expressed at the Oxford Conference on Churches in Society, the church society and state it was at that point; one of the main streams which flowed into the establishment of the World Council on Churches. Grant Maxwell has already cited the term, the responsible society, a term which was coined and has been a common terminology and the main basis for the development of both theological concern and practical involvement in the member churches of the World Council of Churches since its initial assembly at Amsterdam immediately following the last great war.

This concept owed a lot to the involvement of the churches' missionaries anywhere in the world, both in the home countries and in the far countries, involvement with the have-not sections of society.

It received its next major explosion, if you like, at the Church in Society Conference in Geneva in 1966. Much of the preparation for that conference was undertaken in the closest collaboration with the world fellowship of the Roman Catholic Church who, at the time, were engaged in their Second Vatican Conference. In fact many of the people who were the architects, if you like, of the Geneva Conference were at the Vatican and vice versa. It was my privilege along with Father Ryan to have been at the Geneva Conference and to share with him in reporting on these two streams to the Central Committee of the Canadian Council of Churches in November of that year. It was at that November meeting in Geneva Park that this resolution was adopted which set the whole succession of events in process and which led to the Montreal Conference in May of 1968, the continued wrestling with what must we do with this process which has been begun which, in turn, led to the writing and public presentation of the report towards coalition for development in May, 1969.

Numbers of people, you know, wonder just what happens with a report like this. So do a lot of us. One of the things that a small group of us, who worked at writing and producing that report, determined was that it would not just be presented in quiet to a couple of executive groups where it could be neatly pigeon-holed because it was a bit prickly. We made sure that our friends in the mass media were there to give it wide publicity, that there were interviews, that sufficient copies of the thing were put in circulation. We were very grateful for the kind of coverage it gave for it immediately put the cat among the pigeons, if you like, and there was a great deal of discussion and a great deal of opportunity for people to begin to start to say, "All right, responsible people are asking these kinds of questions." "Mr. Mayor, or Mr. Bishop, or Mr. Director, or whoever is the local authority, what about it here?"

I have been myself encouraged as I have travelled back and forth across the country since May of 1969 to discover that in fact in very local scenes and in regional scenes the kinds of questions and the kinds of directions, which such a thrust had begun, have in fact been picked up and are in fact being pursued.

It is now just a year and a few months since the publication date and you know, when you are dealing with strategy, you cannot expect to have had very large accomplishments but you can expect to have had some beginnings. I am quite happy to be able to say that there are such beginnings and that amongst other things many of the folk who are having such beginnings are at last pulling together a lot of their own pretty significant theological, moral and ethical bases, and relating them to the practicalities that face them in a new set of circumstances today. What they do with them, Heaven can only tell and reveal to us as the days go by, but we are going to do our best to encourage it.

Thank you.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, I have another committee from which I played hookey to come here. I will have to go back around eleven o'clock and so I will not get a second round, so if you do not mind I would like to finish my questioning.

The Chairman: Of course.

Senator Carter: I would like to ask first of all we have a joint brief here of a group representing a large number of bodies. I would like to know whose view the brief represents. Does it represent the views of the Catholic Conference, the Council of Churches? Does it represent the views of this coalition or does it represent the views of this convention? You referred to a meeting in Montreal some time ago where these ideas were worked out. Just who is back of the views in the brief?

Mr. Maxwell: I think, Mr. Chairman, that Bishop Pelletier and Dr. Honey might want to speak to that.

[Translation]

His Excellency Monseigneur Georges-Léon Pelletier (Bishop of Trois-Rivières, Chairman of the Social Action Department, Canadian Catholic Conference): Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, I believe that this brief represents the views not only of the Catholic Church, not only of the Council of Churches, but also of a large section of the population. First we distributed more than 50,000 copies of the pamphlet on poverty that you have here, pamphlets which were distributed not to individuals in particular but to groups who studied, who looked at them. In addition, as far as the Catholic Church throughout the country is concerned, we had many discussions, study sessions throughout the dioceses and throughout the various organizations, which means that a large number of people have been reached. This does not mean that the whole country came into contact with it. But, I think a good number were notified, alerted and a good number of citizens share to a great extent the views given there. If you ask me now to what extent they are personally committed, that takes longer. It takes longer to become committed, and more precisely to agree not only to give a part of his income but also to accept the fight and try to build a better society, because, as you very well know, the more a society improves, the more difficult it is to live in that society.

Consequently, if we do not change all our ways of helping all citizens, it is at that moment that the number of poor, the have-nots, those who live on the fringe of society, is going to increase, always, because insofar as we give comfort, for example, insofar as we derive benefit from a new invention, we are making the world more difficult for each of us. We are making the world more difficult to live in. It is a bit like someone who becomes a champion boxer. He has to defend his title very often if he wants to retain it. It is the same thing when we produce inventions, comfort and all. This is why insurance companies change their insurance policies in order to meet the people's new requirements, it is not, and they succeed in getting clients, we too—when I say we, it is the governments, the churches, the intermediate bodies of all the citizens who must cope with this new society, change their way of looking at things in order to meet the requirements of this offer so as to integrate the people in society insofar as possible—because the poor, if they do not feel that they are integrated in society, are going to detest it because they do not know enough about it. But if they are integrated, if they can have their say, consequently, they are going to start liking it, they are going to stop being protesters and they are going to work to build that society.

I will give you a small example. Five or six years ago, we called upon people, I mean Catholics, through a movement called the Propagation of Faith and we asked several black dioceses in Africa to give something for the Propagation of Faith. They gave very little. But they said: how happy we are, this is the first time that we have been asked to do something to help others. They were pleased when they were told that even the few pennies they had given were used among the Eskimos, among the Indians even in Canada's North; they were very happy to have helped others in other countries. Therefore, I think that to answer the Honourable Senator's question, it can be said that a good proportion of our fellow citizens have been alerted so far, and this is only the beginning. Thank you very much.

[English]

Dr. Honey: Mr. Chairman, in the official sense we would say that the brief represents the views of the Canadian Catholic Conference and the Canadian Council of Churches. Now, when one comes to the Canadian Council of Churches we of course confront the fact that there are eleven member churches of the Council. The brief was prepared as a result of official authorizing action by the official decision-making bodies of the Catholic Conference and the Council of Churches so that the official representatives of our eleven member churches sit on the Executive Committee of the Council, which has endorsed the brief.

This does not necessarily mean that our churches, one and all, officially endorse everything that is in the brief. There are nuances here in terms of various levels of representation. Nevertheless a number of our churches, over the period of time during which the Coalition for Development had been in the process of establishment, have been receiving the materials which have been produced, the reports of the Montreal Conference and the report on Towards the Coalition for Development. These have been widely circulated as has been pointed out by other speakers and many of our churches have taken actions of one kind or another which are supported by the kind of principles which this brief is advocating.

For example, you may wish to ask Mr. Walker to report on the action just recently taken by the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec.

Now, it is very difficult to say, as Bishop Pelletier has pointed out, how far we have gone and how far the churches at their various levels, from their top official governing bodies down to the level of the parish, have gone in the development of this kind of sensitivity so we would have to say in one sense officially we represent these various churches and this in itself is part of an effort to sensitize the churches at all levels.

Senator Carter: Coming back to the question from another angle, in your brief you refer extensively to the report ISR—what percentage of the church membership, can you give us an estimate, has read that report? What percentage would be inclined to implement it?

Mr. Maxwell: I can give you a hopeful guess, senator. We have sent out, as has been mentioned, 50,000 copies which in terms of churches makes it a best-seller for a modern document and that has been in response, in almost all cases, to requests from Vancouver Island through to Newfoundland.

It is spotty, of course. It is here and there, but that is within the first year we have circulated fifty thousand. I would hope that maybe 5 per cent to 10 per cent of the active Christians in Canada will come in contact with this, are concerned about it and giving it serious study.

The first thing in that brief that it calls for is a review of resources, what our priorities are within the churches, just as we are calling on governments to do, so I would hope between five and ten per cent of our people are taking seriously and are getting at it.

I would not claim it is 10 per cent now but if it gets to be 10 per cent that is enough to move the whole church in time.

Senator Fergusson: May I interrupt and ask if any study groups are being organized to use this as a basis for study?

Mr. Maxwell: Yes, indeed, Senator Fergusson.

Canon Wilkinson: I could supplement that a bit. I just made a few notes while Grant was speaking. I know in the Canadian Churchman, which is the national paper of the Anglican Church of Canada, the Western Catholic Report—I am not sure about the one at Kingston—and the United Church Observer, the Presbyterian Record and the Maritime United Churchman, all of those papers have carried the summary of points of this and that all of these papers since its publication have not missed one issue without a report of some study group, some action group that directly bears some relation to the stimulus of the report.

Mr. Maxwell: Within the churches, as many as 250 groups that I know of of varying sizes at parish and congregational level have received from our office alone in the last year some discussion starter material based on the report.

Senator Fergusson: Does each publication go to everybody in that church?

Canon Wilkinson: No.

Senator Fergusson: I know it does not but I just wondered what proportion of them would get it. Would it be the ones that subscribe?

Mr. Maxwell: In terms of church periodicals, yes, I suppose so. We have, for example, sent strategy reports, and I hope it will do the same with this, to chanceries, to ministers and priests, and so forth.

Senator Carter: You refer in your fourth report and I think one or two people this morning referred to South America. I was in South America several years ago but it was very evident from what I could see for myself that the church in South America was identified with the upper classes of society, with the affluent rather than with the poor. Would you say the same is true of Canada?

Mr. Maxwell: I will give you a personal opinion. Can I first of all comment briefly on your Latin-American remarks? I think that many observers have seen that, Catholics included, but it is not an unmixed picture. Catholic bishops are among those most active now in Latin America in a whole social movement that has the same name as we are using here incidentally, the liberation movement, to make people conscious of their own potential, so I think there is a turning-around going on in Latin America.

Now, whether in Canada the church is popularly identified with the affluent and the Establishment, yes, we read that criticism in the media every day and some people certainly think it, but we have in our churches too many thousands of faithful people who are themselves deprived, outside the main stream, and in many cases the church is the one thing where they have hopes. I feel this personally.

This is not to say our image is what it should be or that our record is what it should be.

Senator Carter: Well, I will come back to that a little later. You speak about your coalition. You have a whole list of names here, half a page, but I do not see anybody that represents the poor. Who represents the poor in your coalition?

Mr. Maxwell: The poor represent themselves on the coalition. We have Chief Daiter there representing the National Indian Brotherhood. As you know, he is the recognized spokesman for many of our poorest of the poor and Chief Daiter himself said at our founding forum that the coalition process was the first activity of this kind where the Indians had been invited to participate from the very beginning.

Senator Carter: Yes, but they are invited there on an ethnic basis rather than on an income basis.

Mr. Maxwell: We do not have any income test for membership, senator.

Senator Carter: No.

Canon Wilkinson: Besides which, as far as the motivation permutation was concerned, both things part of it because I had a hand in issuing the invitations. You may question my motives if you want but that is what I am saying they were.

Mr. Maxwell: Citizens' groups are represented, too, senator.

Senator Carter: Did you help the Indians to prepare their red paper that they presented?

Canon Wilkinson: Yes, we did. One of the members of the coalition, the Anglican Church of Canada through grants to them made sure that they were able to collate their material. If they did not have that grant they would not have been able to complete the preparation of their paper.

Senator Carter: I think on page 6 you touch the core of the problem. You refer to selfishness, I think. "Injustice has its origin in selfishness." And further down you talk about power groups and new men.

It is on page 7 you talk about citizens' groups. Now, if you organize citizens' groups and they achieve reasonable power, are they going to be less selfish than the groups we have now in the exercise of their power?

Canon Wilkinson: We will have to find out when we get there.

Senator Carter: I am asking for an opinion.

Mr. Maxwell: Well, they suffer the human condition the same as the rest of us, senator. I think that it does not take away from the validity of the argument that we need to broaden the base of participation and that the deprived, the poor, need to be brought more actively into the decision-making process and they can add then to what the technical experts have, the actual experience and anguish of human poverty and this should lead, I hope, to more enlightened and more intelligent social policies.

I guess the selfishness thing will always be there but no more so in them than in the rest of us.

Senator Carter: Well, what hope is there, then, because you are going through selfishness as part of the fundamental problem.

Mr. Maxwell: There is all kinds of hope. I feel as a Christian, as a human, that humanity all though its history has struggled to progress, to overcome the selfish tendencies.

I think we have been making progress and that we will make more.

Dr. R. B. McClure, Moderator of the United Church of Canada: Mr. Chairman, surely one of the features we are trying to make is to get a balance. That is, the balance we feel now is sometimes weighted against the poor. By the poor having a voice we will get a balance. We do not think the poor will be less selfish than the others but I think it will give a better balance.

Senator Carter: I agree with that. We all agree that the poor have got to exercise whatever influence they can and they have got to organize to do it otherwise they are going to be left out of things. They have got to get their share of it, but what I am trying to lead up to is what I think is a defect in your thinking. You are pointing to structures rather than going to the root cause of it. The root cause, you point out yourself, is selfishness and this is part of our problem, too. We realize that if there was no selfishness in the world there would be no poverty, and in a country like Canada where we have, as you say, the technical know-how and we have all these things, if we could eliminate selfishness, greed and dishonesty and these other things then we would have a much different country.

What I understood your brief to be saying is that what we have got to change is a system somehow rather than changing the man who operates the system.

Mr. Maxwell: I think, senator, it is not either/or. Often we have had these arguments among ourselves. Some will say it has to begin with attitudes and then you change the structures. Others say you change the structures and then you change attitudes.

I think what we are trying to say here is, simultaneously we have to make an effort to be changing attitudes, question consciences, at the same time as we need new structures, but some of the other church spokesmen may want to speak to the question. I think you have put your finger on the heart of the matter.

Canon Wilkinson: I would think, Mr. Senator, that this is why our brief ended with the section that it did, which is talking about the question of will. Along the way to it you talk about examples, that of necessity being a large number of people you have to have organization. You have to have structure and pointing to inequities in those things as examples of the failure of the will, the failure of humanity to overcome this selfishness or what-have-you in those examples; but we come back and we end on our main theme which is the question of will to use whatever structures may be emerging for the betterment of humanity and the elimination of poverty in these particular instances.

Senator Carter: We are seeking the benefit of your wisdom because we realize that if poverty is to be eliminated in Canada it is going to cost a lot of money.

Canon Wilkinson: A lot of effort.

Senator Carter: It is going to take more than money. It is going to take will and it is going to take commitment to do it.

Canon Wilkinson: Yes.

Senator Carter: And that commitment will not come unless you can change somebody inside. You have to change the attitudes of the public. This to me is the heart of the problem. We want your help and somebody has got to do this otherwise if we cannot change public attitudes we are not going to be able to do anything about poverty.

Now, what is the Council of Churches, the Conference, and all the church bodies going in this direction?

Dr. McClure: May I share one of my reasons for great optimism in this matter. I think as you get the poor better represented it is possible they will not fight greed of the wealthy by greed of the poor.

I have just come back from South Africa and the most marvellous discovery there is to find out in the whole of South Africa amongst the African population there are no Black Panthers. They say we have suffered from racism and therefore we do not want the black man to dominate the white man. We want to have racism wiped out and I feel the same thing can come from our poor. You do not expect to get selfishness eliminated from the poor by simply letting them be victims of selfishness. It is our hope and it is my optimistic hope that the poor as they begin to have influence will realize that greed is what they have suffered from and therefore why put their greed up against the other man's greed? It is better to eliminate greed.

I think this is the way social advancement sometimes takes place.

Senator Carter: We have got to get people involved in various ways.

Dr. Honey: May I simply add another word in response to Senator Carter? It is true that in the churches we ought to be concerned about the selfishness which is in human nature. We are concerned about it and of course it is part of our understanding of the faith, that we must work on the hearts of men and not simply on the structures.

If we were to let that become an excuse for doing nothing about the structures then we would be failing in our duty and there are many people unfortunately—and this is part of the problem—who are going around saying, "Don't touch. Don't worry about the social structures. Work on the hearts of men and everything will take care of itself."

Well, now, supposing we took this attitude, let us say, with regard to law and order, and crime, you know, and we say, "Why bother with a police force? If you would only change the hearts of men we would not have criminals." Well, this is true but the fact is that it is not going to work out quite that easily. While we work on the kind of selfishness which leads to crime in certain circumstances, we still have to have a police force. We have to provide some kind of structure to provide for justice.

Senator Carter: I agree with that. I am not disagreeing with it but here you people are representing churches and churches are the guardians of our morals and the conscience of the nation and the church itself is a structure and we are suffering from materialism out in the sector of society. What are you doing about secularism and materialism because it is the same disease? It does not matter if it is in society or in the church, it is materialism. What are you doing about it?

Mr. Maxwell: Senator, we are not doing enough about it but since 1968 at least in the Montreal Conference, that is what this effort and everything else is all about. A number of us are trying within the churches to say to Christians first of all that we must examine our consciences. We must review our priorities. We must change our priorities. We must put less into the material things as churches and more into what the Gospels are all about.

I would be the last to claim that we are way down the road but we are trying to make that very examination of conscience, for which you call, a priority within the churches and hopefully we can be a voice of conscience in the public arena, too.

Canon Wilkinson: Could I perhaps give one or two brief examples that may be the sort of thing that the senator is asking for? I know that this Committee have already heard through the United Church presentation about the West Don Parish, which is an ecumenical parish in the City of Toronto. That parish came into existence because of the depressed nature of the whole area and the realization of the individual denominations that they individually could not cope with the problems which it represented. They needed to work as a totally religious structure in the area to be able to open up the kinds of opportunity for street gangs, for transient youth, transient men, transient women, families, the whole bit.

By establishing this kind of parish they have been able to do a significant piece of work.

In the City of Edmonton, a similar inner-city group recognized that none of them as individual parishes, well-heeled as most of them were, could accomplish the kind of ministry to the deprived that existed on their doorsteps, so they set up and jointly financed and jointly planned and operated a common ministry. The Reverend David Crawley is their staff person and they do a great many different kinds of service ministries that are in fact organized and enabling the voiceless in the area to work out what are their needs and express them in constructive kinds of questioning that enable people to respond helpfully to their needs.

In the City of Saskatoon, in the City of Vancouver, and in the City of Halifax, I could cite the same kinds of things that are happening and most of them have begun to happen since the distribution of this thing and are both a part of the thrust that produced it and a part of the results of it.

I do not know whether these are part of the sort of things you are looking for or not.

Senator Carter: Well, my time is running out, Mr. Chairman, but I want to ask a question on page 15 because previous to this you say you endorsed the brief submitted by the Welfare Council, and by the United Church Board of Evangelists.

Now, it boils down to a problem of money. We are a nation of twenty million people. We have about seven million taxpayers. We collect about ten billion dollars a year. All over in Canada we have a GNP of, say, roughly seventy-five billion dollars and roughly one-third of that (twenty-five billion dollars) comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers. Although we are spending six billion dollars roughly on welfare now and roughly six billion dollars on education, as far as the Federal Government is concerned we are collecting about ten billion dollars, about seven billion dollars from income tax and about three billion dollars from corporation tax.

The bulk of that seven billion dollars come from people under $15,000. I think only one billion, five hundred thousand dollars comes from people earning more than $10,000, which is relatively small, so if we are going to spend more money we have got to get it. I have not time to go into the Welfare Council because I do not agree with what they propose, which you refer to here as harmonizing, because what they said was you work out your welfare program first and then collect the money. You cannot collect money that is not there. The money has to be somewhere to get. So the only other way to get it is to reduce expenditures. Somewhere.

Here on page 15 you imply anyway that we should cut down on defence. You refer to $1.8 billion spent on defence. I would like to know in your opinion, does Canada have any obligation at all to contribute to her own defence as a moral question?

Mr. Maxwell: Of course.

Canon Wilkinson: Of course we do, but what do you define as the enemy; poverty or a mythical attacker?

Senator Carter: I am talking about the national defence of our country against invasion.

Dr. McClure: Or riots within, or just invasion without?

Senator Carter: Or a take-over anyway.

Reverend D. G. Smith, Christ Church Cathedral, Ottawa: I think perhaps I might reflect I hope, in part at least, the opinion of some Christians. It is not perhaps less than $1.8 billion should be spent on defence but if that amount is spent on defence that reflects a primary commitment or hierarchy of priorities which seems unequal and grotesque.

If one spent $1.8 billion on defence perhaps I think the church is saying you should be spending twice that on welfare and that does not necessarily mean it is taken from the defence budget. It still does not solve the problem of where the money is coming from but I think the implication that is constantly taken that we do away with the defence system is an erroneous one. I do not think anyone is suggesting that. It is a question of priorities.

Senator Carter: I do not know. You have implied it here. Other briefs have been even more frank and said we should cut down. If we are going to save money, this is where we should do it.

Mr. Maxwell: What we are questioning there is that we allocate in our federal budget $1.8 billion to national defence and on the other hand allocate each year $300 million, one-sixth of that amount, to world development programs which in our mind is a more positive way to build peace in the future in the global community.

That is the point we are making. As Mr. Smith said we are questioning that priority; about six times as much for national defence as for world development, when in fact if we were attacked by an outside nation we would have to turn immediately to one of the great powers for our defence. We really could not eject them.

Senator Carter: Let me stop you there because you say you are questioning it. When you are questioning it you are questioning our commitment and our obligation that we have undertaken in good faith. Are you saying we should tear them up?

Mr. Maxwell: I am not saying we should tear them up but just in the public sector, as in the churches, we are saying there needs to be a thorough examination of present priorities, our assumption in the national defence sector as in others.

I agree with you there was a limit with the money question but it is more than cutting down expenditures. It is also a matter of surely re-ordering our priorities, of taking new approaches to what is called the welfare problem and things like that.

We look to your Committee for some creative insights there that will show us how.

Senator Carter: You are putting the shoe on the other foot. We are looking to you for help and this is what disturbs me about your brief because you are a group that represents, or I should say, should be representing the moral conscience of the nation. The only thing I find in your brief is this reference to the $1.8 billion that the Canadian taxpayer is spending on defence. You do not say anything about the two billion dollars we are spending on alcohol. You do not say anything about the one billion dollars we are spending on tobacco. You do not say one thing about the one billion dollars almost we are spending on gambling and horse-racing. You do not say anything about the one billion dollars we are spending on travel or the $200 million we are spending on candy.

Mr. Maxwell: These are not public policies, though.

Canon Wilkinson: Those are not within your jurisdiction to say who shall spend or shall not spend. They are private expenditures. The $1.8 billion is a government expenditure in which you and I both have responsibilities.

Senator Carter: But you have responsibilities, as I take it, as a churchman, for the morals of the nation. You have the responsibility of changing the values of these people who are represented in these expenditures because if you are going to talk about selfishness, what else is money spent on alcohol or tobacco but selfishness?

Reverend Gordon Walker (Secretary, Division of Evangelism and Social Action, Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec): Mr. Chairman, members of this Committee, the church has continually spoken out against tobacco and against smoking, so much so that many members of the public have simply put aside any statements and said that is the church speaking again and simply passed it off.

Senator Carter: Well, I do not think that is a good answer because this is where I come back again to what I said at the beginning. I have got to leave now, Mr. Chairman, but you have got to do more than preach. Surely you have got to get at the heart of these people somehow and it is not enough to just hand out a report that you have concocted and have study groups to study this, if studying that report is not going to do something to the fellow inside so he will say, "By gosh, I spent $500 last year on liquor and all around me are people living in poverty who could have used that $500."

Dr. Honey: We thoroughly agree with the senator, I think.

Reverend Norman Berner (Secretary of The Lutheran Church in America (Canada Section)): I think that Senator Carter has been quite consistent in his questioning here. He started out by asking about the presence of poor people in the coalition and the like and Mr. Maxwell mentioned the National Indian Brotherhood and hardly got a chance to mention about the citizen groups that were represented in the formation of the coalition and these were poor people.

You have been around the country and you have run into some very interesting presentations from poor people. Now, I think something is happening to the Committee. It has been receiving these presentations that the poor people can bring a certain kind of power and affect attitudes of people that have power and I think the poor people are doing this but when they first come before a committee like this, there is a tremendous burst of anguish and the Committee gets defensive.

Then it slows down and says there may be something here. I do not think Lord Acton's saying would apply here about power and absolute power corrupting absolutely. I do not think we need have any fear that the poor people would become selfish in the sense you mentioned.

I think as Dr. McClure said there would be a beautiful balance here because we affect one another in our debates and in our discussions.

This is a dimension that the poor, if they had some voice, if we could give them some power to have speech this is the dimension they would bring.

Now, to come up to your last point on defence. Obviously this sentence or this paragraph from the brief has hit you because you are really preaching to the preachers on selfishness.

Senator Carter: Yes.

Reverend Berner: That is my guess. This is exactly the role of a committee like this. You might affect our attitudes and I think maybe because of what is in here and the exchange that is taking place right now it might help to affect the attitudes of this Committee and that is where something is going to happen and that is why we are here.

Senator Carter: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman, monsieur and members of the panel, first I may say I am very pleased to see that the Catholics and the Protestants are joined together in this cause. This is something we have hoped for for a long time. There are a few points here I would like to discuss. I have no grievances at all with the brief. I am fully in accord with your brief entirely as it is. There is always room for improvement in any brief like this one or any others.

[Translation]

Reverend Father St-Onge, you said that we are losing ground and I would like to question you a bit, to elaborate on this subject. You mentioned liberation through participation, with which we all agree, it is a subject that has been discussed on other occasions, and I believe that it is essential. There is also the change and the attitude of the public; that is another major question which is not so easy compared to others. Before asking my question, I am going to ask it in this way: at present, on Parliament Hill and somewhat everywhere, they speak of environment and pollution. This is a topic that everyone is discussing, anyone can be made to take an interest. When the people are interested, it is easy to discuss the problem.

And there are many people who have become last minute experts, scientists, and are writing books—professors, students, everyone agrees. There is pollution, a project, a situation that must be corrected in the near future. We are all going to die. What strikes me a bit, and this is using Father St-Onge's words, he said we are losing ground. I believe that we are losing ground because there is pollution of society as well. For ten years, apparently, there has been pollution of society—pollution of the society, which we overlooked.

There is a pollution of consciences, there is a pollution of justice. Therefore, all these pollutions, there is morality, there is society, there is the youth and it is a pollution, an almost universal degradation. I believe that it is partly the cause of poverty. That is going to be a very, very difficult subject to correct.

[English]

Mr. Chairman, I am not through but I pass.

The Chairman: I would like the Reverend Berner to speak and then I would like to hear Dr. McClure say something about the abuses of welfare itself.

Reverend Berner: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, our Lutheran Council has recently introduced a study of the guaranteed annual income which looks very favourably on this as one, not necessarily the, but one of the means of tackling the problems of poverty. Poverty, of course, is not only a lack of money. It is a lack of many other things, but with money one can gain certain advantages that should be the rights of every individual.

We base this on the doctrine of God the fact that God has created all things and put man here to enjoy all things and therefore every man has a right to the things of creation.

Martin Luther puts it this way in his explanation of the first article of the Apostles' Creed. "I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of Heaven and Earth." And Luther says in a sense this is a guarantee from God that we should have the things for people.

I believe that God has created me and all that exists. He has given and still preserved to me my body and soul together with my raiment, food, home and family, and all my property. He provides me with the necessities of life and the matter that is in me.

Now, I must say he is not deserving but God is the giver. Man, however, is the one who gets in the way of God's goodness. You think, for example, of the parable of our Lord. He told about the rich man who had so much he had to tear down his barns and build bigger ones. He said, "Soul take your ease. Eat, drink and be merry. You have got a corner on the market." God said, "You are a fool." And that night the fool descended in a casket.

Man could not and should not endeavour to gather everything to himself for himself. This is the essence of the scripture. This is the word of the Old Testament prophets. This is the word of our Lord; that we should get rid of the selfish attitudes and part of that will be simply that we must use the means of the law of government to provide that no man shall have less than the basic amount of goods we have in Canada and when I say in Canada I think we should also remember we are not concerned only with Canada but with world needs; that we dare never set a standard in Canada that is so far above the standard that can be attained in other parts of the world.

So I think the churches will say this: that we believe that God has created these things and created them for all men and that man should not get in the way of God's goodness to men.

The Chairman: Dr. McClure, I would like you to say a few words from your wide experience on the abuses of welfare by people who draw welfare. Have you some firm views on that?

Dr. McClure: I do. I have very firm views because I feel that these abuses are very often due to ignorance and you have that vicious cycle. The poor person gets a poor education. He gets a less stimulating environment. To put it frankly, he doesn't know the score and the result is that he gets a very violent reaction to oppression and from that, so he feels it is a game. It becomes a game then. "How can I cheat the welfare and cut the corners; find all the new angles and that sort of thing?"

They have clubs in which they compare notes together. You will see people clubbing together and you hear a new racket. You see it amongst even people in such simple things as Workmen's Compensation. There are new angles come up, you know. If you are going to imitate this thing, you get this kind of a limp. Now, you are imitating the wrong limp when you go up to your Board and this sort of thing.

You can see them in the out-patient departments, and there are these things but surely this is all a rebellion against something and one of the ways you can educate them—of course we are trying to educate them, one of the things is to take away that irritant against which they are reacting.

The Chairman: Well, doctor, is it an exaggeration of what you hear and what we hear about abuses?

Dr. McClure: No, I do not think that abuses in any of these things—certainly my impression coming back to Canada newly after being 45 years abroad, I have only been back two years, and as I see it in Canada I am sorry to say all this stuff about abuses is a protection for the wallet. It is nothing but effect.

The Chairman: Just a moment. Everybody is going to get a chance to say what they have to say. We have got some senators here who have been very, very loyal to this Committee. There are some that could not be here today. Senator Fergusson?

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, members of the delegation, I am very grateful myself to those who comprise this delegation for preparing the brief and taking the trouble to come before us and it is a wonderful brief, and I found it most interesting. I read it all and I think the ideas and objectives behind the coalition for development are most progressive and the leadership that has been given by this group in this area and by the Canadian Council of Churches is very encouraging and really exciting, to think that you are really going out into this field and working together as Senator Fournier said.

I think it is wonderful to have us all working together to do this. I think what you are doing is going to reach a great many people. Even if I did question about the papers reaching individuals I do think that through the churches you are reaching probably more people than we could in any other way and making them understand that poverty is a real problem in Canada today and probably our number one problem and should receive our entire priority.

This is the big thing; making the people of Canada realize this. So many people think it is just a lot of nonsense but the work you are doing and what we are trying to do I think is bringing it more to people's attention.

There are a number of things I had noted and wanted to speak about but I think Senator Carter covered quite a few of them. He approached it from a different angle than I would have but he got the answer so there is not much use in my going over these things.

There is one thing I would like to ask, though. I know this was discussed and if your answer was given, I did not get it. I would say first that Canon Wilkinson, who is a friend of long-standing, is the last person I would criticize but he said he did send out the invitations for the Coalition for Development, and I was wondering if when they went out actually any invitations went to the poor people.

Now, the reason I say this is because I know Canon Wilkinson knows there are organizations that are even now putting people on their board of directors who are receiving welfare so they can have their point of view. Have you anybody like this in your group, the actual people who are in need and perhaps receiving welfare?

Canon Wilkinson: I will make a brief answer and refer to Grant, who has more of the detail. A slight correction. I was one of the Steering Committee who made these decisions. I did not do the actual invitations. This was Grant and Father Ryan.

Yes, there are representatives of what are commonly called citizens' groups, people living in poverty on the Coalition. There are two of them sitting on the Executive of the Coalition and money from the Coalition funds has been channelled into their hands as a task group.

We have their initial report now and their plans, with which we are trying to help them, to make some kind of national network of such groups which of necessity are individual, localized things. Their true weight is sadly lacking in visibility because of the local nature of it and what we are seeking to do is to try to help them to get some collectivity that will give visibility and strength to whatever are their opinions.

I do not know what else you would like.

Mr. Maxwell: To elaborate on that a bit, Senator Fergusson, from the beginning, as Maurice said, we have wanted to involve those who are experiencing economic poverty and aspects of it to begin on the Coalition process but, of course, you do not normally find those persons active in organizations at a national level so even though we are a national Coalition and hoping for regional and local ones to come from it, we did in this case go to local citizen groups here in Ottawa, in Lower Town of Montreal, and had representations there.

We had a large group of about five or six there at our founding forum. One of the committees of our Executive is made up entirely of citizens' group representatives. In both cases the co-chairmen are Mrs. Maitland from Ottawa and Madame Dainneault of Montreal. With the limited funds we have, they have been having meetings with representatives of citizen groups in Central Canada and also had a representative here from Winnipeg.

They are also in touch with their counterparts on the National Council for Welfare which the Department of Health and Welfare set up. Now, it is difficult to work out the relationship. How can the Coalition be of some support to them? Can they give grass support to us? We are certainly working at it and trying to get a breakthrough. The initial distrust on their part is over and the co-operation is there.

Senator Fergusson: You are not just working for them. You hope to work with them.

Mr. Maxwell: Yes; with them.

Canon Wilkinson: I might add the Canadian Welfare Council annual meeting for this coming week has a phenomenally large number of citizens' representatives from all over the country. There are twenty from the City of Edmonton alone, I know.

The registration in advance usually for that conference is four hundred and right now it stands at over eight hundred, so you can expect a large number of them will be from the citizens' groups.

I was talking to Dr. Henry just before I came in here.

Senator Fergusson: I am sorry; my duties here prevent me from being one of the registrants because I would like to be there.

I would like to ask you one more thing on that line of questions. There are a number of organizations that are trying to draw in these sort of people, I know. I have been told by some of them they are really finding there is a practical difficulty. Sure, you put them on the board and the board is in the habit of perhaps having a meeting then having lunch and then continuing with their meeting.

In the past people attending would find no trouble paying for the lunch, this was easy. Or it might be a little distance one has to go. I know in my experience that I had with one woman, who was very anxious to make her contribution to one of these boards, she just did not have the money to pay her transportation.

Mr. Maxwell: Or the babysitter.

Senator Fergusson: Yes. Are you trying to help these individuals?

Mr. Maxwell: Yes, and to be sensitive to it and make funds available in advance so it is not an awkward thing.

Senator Fergusson: I would just like now to ask you something on page 8 where you refer to Latin America. You say: "The process of liberation is beginning among the young people there."

Could you elaborate a little on that? We have not had very much evidence of this.

Mr. Maxwell: Well, Senator, for information on that we depend mostly on Canadian missionaries and others who are in Latin America. This is particularly the case that I know best in Northeast Brazil, which is one of the most poverty stricken areas where Archbishop Camara is a figure of some international repute now in raising up the issues of justice, contending with the government in power and there is a popular movement beginning among the peasants and also in the urban classes in which Christian leaders are taking part.

How strong it is, I do not know, but all the signs are that it is growing and also in some of the other countries in Peru and Bolivia and so forth.

Senator Fergusson: What is the government attitude toward this?

Mr. Maxwell: In those countries?

Senator Fergusson: Yes.

Mr. Maxwell: Well, in general the government attitude tends to be repressive, to put it down. I know in Brazil Mr. Frey, a protestant leader there prepared a new primer on awakening of conscience and so on. This got in the school primers.

Well, they were withdrawn from the school within about a year because the whole thrust of it was your living conditions are not the will of God. This is the injustice of man. You can change it. It can be changed.

Well, they withdrew the school books but they will find other ways, we hope.

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, I read this brief and found it most interesting and I would like to endorse all that Senator Ferguson said with regard to the joining of the Catholic and Protestant churches and their involvement to eliminate poverty.

We all know everybody is trying to do their best.

In your introduction are you saying that there is a different concept of poverty today because disadvantaged people are asking more and even demanding more in services, education and a better way of life; that accounts of an affluent society may be a justification for their demands?

Do you find that this type of poor person tends not to be a member of the church? What objection would they have to going to churches and being members of churches and how are you meeting this question? How do you contact these people to try to get them into the church?

Mr. Maxwell: Well, in the same community, Senator, you will find the affluent parish or congregation that looks very middle class and satisfied and someone else only a few miles away you will find—these are in cities I know—congregations and parishes that are made up almost wholly of persons in lower income groups, often many of them unemployed.

I do not think it is fair to say that the poor have abandoned the church. The church is made up of a mixture of the income classes but it is fair to say unfortunately that most of the policymaking is residing in the hands of those in the middle and higher income groups. I think we have got to bring into the churches, as well as into society, more of the deprived into the main stream where decisions are made.

Now, the others may have other insights on it because it is a mixed and complex picture.

Dr. McClure: Surely in a democratic church you will obviously have your Board of Managers session, whatever you want to call them, will be the people who have made the biggest financial contribution to that church. It is their money that we are distributing. It is their money that we are dealing with so that they automatically become the session and in a congregation oriented power then this is the way it works out and naturally the poor finds himself not represented on the board.

As far as church attendance goes, I am quite sure some of the poor feel that the church is irrelevant to them and in this way we are trying to tell them the church is interested in them.

The Chairman: That is not the kind of answer I would have expected from you, sir, as I know you, when you tell us that these people who give are in control.

What we are trying to get at and what I thought the whole concept here was that we are not so concerned about the man who had it and the man who gave it but we were trying to involve the man who did not and give him something to say about what was going on at the very top level.

That was our hope and that is what I gather this brief is all about.

Dr. McClure: I think that is our hope, Senator Croll, but I think we have to admit what is the fact. I would be lying if I told you that this was not the situation. This is the situation and I think what we want to do is to stir up, whether you call it the conscience of the nation. We hope we can stimulate the conscience of that man towards his responsibilities towards his fellow man, of the less privileged, ad this is what is going on in the church. This is why the report.

The Chairman: But what I hoped that the report was saying to us is that we are going to involve these people at the top level. I do not care who gives. At the top a church or parish has only so much money, but the poor in there will have something to say about the administration and something about the running and involvement.

Dr. McClure: Yes, sir, but in a democratic church this takes time to process. Are the well-to-do people who have been looking after the church for the past 50 years suddenly going to bring in somebody in blue jeans. I mean, you have to educate that group and ignorance is not a monopoly of the poor.

Mr. Maxwell: Senator, I had hoped we had better be doing this in our churches or we have no business proposing it to you or to the public sector.

Senator Inman: On page 7 do you suggest—it seems to me that you do—that people should not have direction in regard to their lives or manner of living. This is contrary to the general idea of the making of a good citizen, but then again you seem to contradict it in the next paragraph.

I will put it this way, that everybody needs some kind of direction. Is that what you mean there? Probably I have the wrong meaning out of it. Otherwise the law may be disobeyed and everybody has to have direction of some kind.

Mr. Maxwell: Everybody has to live within the frame of law and good order but with justice.

Are you referring perhaps, Senator, to the expression "We want policies which will enable people to seek a full life each in his own way and at his own pace"?

Senator Inman: Yes.

Mr. Maxwell: Well, I think as an aspiration that does not mean there is no frame within which he has to live and operate, but we are saying that each person should have liberty and more opportunity to develop his own talents in his own way.

This does not mean the church would not offer him counsel and that the law would not require in him a certain manner of behaviour.

Senator Inman: I have another question here. It is on page 9 down at the lower part of the page. It seemed to me you seemed to think that voluntary organizations are more effective than paid government employees. What is your basis for this thinking. I quite agree I sometimes think volunteer organizations do get good results but what made you think about that?

Mr. Maxwell: Where is that?

Senator Inman: That is on page 9.

The awakening of the sense of what is possible for man and the responsible steps required to attain it is primarily the task of voluntary organizations, not of government.

Voluntary intermediate groups, including religious bodies, should co-operate with, complement and supplement the efforts of government; and when need be, should also challenge existing priorities and policies in the public sector.

Canon Wilson: It seems to me this follows on, Senator, through what Mr. Maxwell said previously. There is a frame of reference, yes, but the laws, if you like, of that frame of reference need to be such that they enable an individual to be free to develop fully, otherwise if you are insisting on a kind of enunciation, acts, which you can do or cannot do, you are instead developing dependent creatures who are, in my judgment, less than human.

This is why there needs to be this constant dialogue between the citizens who direct their government structures and those who are elected and operate the government structures. They each need to keep the other honest and valid.

Senator Inman: I know in dealing lots of times with disadvantaged people that voluntary groups can get closer to them.

Mr. Maxwell: Yes, at the local level this is often possible and they will themselves form them as we have seen. Mary Caroda has done a study and I am sure you have seen it, to show that there has been over 200 citizens groups, neighbourhood improvement groups, this kind of thing, which have come into existence in the last year.

Well, this is the kind of voluntary effort to which we refer between government on the one hand and all of its agencies and individual here, you have an intermediate group of organizations of many kinds and sizes. Ordinarily it is first through those that the citizen finds his voice and joins with his neighbour to try and improve things.

Senator Inman: That is quite effective with, as we call them, the disadvantaged group.

Mr. Maxwell: Yes. It is taking on an effectiveness right now.

Senator Inman: Some of them have the idea that that person is paid for the job and they are just doing what they are paid for, whereas with voluntary groups they seem to think they are dedicated.

Mr. Maxwell: Sooner or later voluntary groups usually end up hiring someone too if they are successful.

The Chairman: It is a voluntary act.

Senator Inman: On page 13 you say there:

As a kind of third force in the middle position between citizens and government, the Coalition will 'strive to become a new lever for the elimination of poverty'...

and you go on the next paragraph and you say: "especially through public forums..."

Are the new opportunities that you mention here voluntary groups or will they be paid administrators? You were speaking of the groups.

Mr. Maxwell: The new opportunities—there has not been any thought within the Coalition executive, that I know of, of paid persons in this. Maybe in time we would have a field worker or two but so far we want to limit ourselves to a small bilingual secretariat, perhaps in Montreal and Ottawa, to service the process.

We want to work through existing networks of organizations, not add to the structure. There is enough of that.

Senator Inman: On page 20 one of the stated aims of the Coalition is to mobilize public will. Are you speaking of only those within the church or are you speaking of all Canadians? Your guidelines set out in the inter-church strategy report to implement that at the local level.

Mr. Maxwell: Well, Senator, there is some understandable confusion in a lot of quarters about the Coalition and our report, just because I think of the title. We called it "Towards Coalition for Development" and it was addressed a year ago primarily to the churches, but the Canadian Coalition or league we have started is not just a church thing. The church has initiated it. We are among the partners. There are other organizations listed in the brief. There are more secular organizations, if you want to call them that, than there are churches in the Coalition already.

So in anything we try to do, we are not just addressing Christians alone. This is an experiment that reaches beyond the churches and beyond church co-operation that has just begun.

Senator McGrand: I have just two questions. One is a little question and I will ask that one first.

Senator Carter brought up the question of what is going to happen and what has been happening. He referred to attitudes and structures. It seems to me that the very fact that the churches are getting together and recognizing this problem of poverty and trying to do something about it is a change in attitude that will lead to changes in structure.

Now, this seems to have originated or come into existence in the last eight years and I wonder how much of it is due or has been activated by ecumenicalism? Has it had any influence on the desire of the churches to work together?

Dr. Honey: The ecumenical movement in June?

Senator McGrand: Yes.

Dr. Honey: I think Canon Wilkinson gave a little background there in his earlier presentation where he pointed out some of the roots, for example, on the side of the World Council of Churches of successive rather landmark meetings of the Oxford Conference on church society and the Geneva Conference on church society.

I believe that the ideas which have been generated through these ecumenical meetings and the whole process of preparation for such meetings and the process of disseminating the results of such meetings have filtered through here in Canada and many other parts of the world, and at the world level not only have we been talking here in terms of the antecedence from the council side but from the conference side the developments in the background and the organization...

Senator McGrand: This is a movement that is not going to retreat.

Dr. Honey: I do not think so, and Senator, you know that there is at the world level an organization between the World Council of Churches and the Roman Catholic Church Committee for Society Development and Peace and in a sense, in joining together as the Canadian Catholic Conference and the Canadian Council for Churches here in Canada we are reproducing what is happening at the world level between the World Council of Churches and the Roman Catholic Church and we draw inspiration from these world developments as well as perhaps helping from our side to contribute towards that.

Senator McGrand: Now, on page 9 you speak of the native people. You talk about the aspirations and goals of the native people. This is the only question I will ask and I would like you to develop it as far as you can.

What did you have in mind for the development of the Indian native people? They do not want to be assimilated and they do not want to be integrated into our society to any great extent. How can they obtain the idea of a free Indian in a nation-wide Indian culture and become part and parcel of the Canadian way of life in the future? How can you develop the Indian a little apart from saying he is a Canadian but he is a Canadian Indian.

Mr. Maxwell: Senator, in the Coalition—and this is where we have been struggling with this question. You pose the difficulty: how can the Indian have equality and at the same time preserve his cultural identity.

In this and in working in the Coalition we are depending on the recommendations of Chief Daiter of the National Indian Brotherhood and the Anglican Church members with whom he is working most closely. What he wants of the Coalition and what the Indian groups want of the Coalition is our support in making known their new paper which just came down this week and the propositions that are there so it is really a matter of giving more publicity and more exposure to their whole position, to sit down with Government officials and work out a new policy.

This was, I think, their main objection to the previous White Paper, that they had not really been consulted in its preparation. They want to sit down with Government and work out a new one. Without going into the details of it, we think they are absolutely valid and right in asking for that and we want to support them. I think Mr. Smith, who is an anthropologist in this field, could speak to it.

Dr. Smith: Mr. Chairman, before I say anything, perhaps I should ask you for a ruling on the appropriateness of any remarks that I make. I am in the rather difficult position of being at the moment an employee of the Department of Indian Affairs in the Northern Science Research Group.

I am not fully employed by the church. I live in two worlds, so I stand here at the moment in conflict. Is it appropriate for me to express a personal opinion?

The Chairman: Of course it is.

Dr. Smith: I have just completed two years of anthropological field work amongst the Indians and Eskimos of the Western Arctic, and it has been primarily concerned with poverty and social stratification.

Many of the questions that have come up here today have, of course, underlain my work from its beginning in the Commission and by the Department of Indian Affairs and later on by the deep commitment that I have come to feel towards this. The question arises as to cultural identity. I think this was the Honourable Senator's question. How to preserve the cultural identity but ensure participation in the benefits and goods of Canadian life.

These at first glance appear antithetical but perhaps they are not if we really examine carefully what we mean by culture. In the traditional and logical sense the word "culture" means the whole pattern, ways of thinking, feeling and acting of a group of people that they have learned through their experience in society.

This is quite different from the layman's conception that culture means all of these exotic things that one derives as a sort of residual from some peculiar aboriginal history.

I think we can say in most of the native peoples of Canada the latter is gone. This does not deny that they have a culture of their own. That culture, oddly enough in Canadian society has come to be a class culture. It is approximated closely I think in the works of Oscar Lewis and others who describe it as "A sub culture of poverty."

It is true that cultures in society tend to develop new ways of responding to situations, new ways of thinking and feeling and acting so if we ask whether we are going to preserve Indian culture, we really are asking in a sense whether we are going to preserve class culture because the features of that culture are accommodations and adaptations and response to various situations in which people live. The facts of life; babies to bear, mouths to feed and the aged to take care of.

I find myself somewhat in opposition to Dr. McClure's analysis a short moment ago. I am sure he will not object if I express an alternative opinion. He said that perhaps education would cure the abuses of welfare and so on. Well, perhaps it might. In my own experience of living with Eskimos and Indians in the tents and living as much as I could as an Indian or as an Eskimo—it is never complete, of course—I gradually realized that the so-called abuses of the welfare system were the only weapons that these people had.

The people with whom I lived in some cases had an annual per capita income, including the value of wild foods from their productive efforts in the traditional way of life, of about $300 per year.

Last night I was staggered to note that in the United Church submission to this Committee at page 31 there was an estimated family budget of poor people in an urban milieu of $385 a month. This was from Social Welfare basically. The total that can ever be given to an Indian or an Eskimo in the Arctic is $35 a month. That is the absolute ceiling per capita and in fact they generally have less. I think it is pretty clear in such a situation you are going to work a dodge to get a little more, a little more which may mean the difference between eating and not eating.

The Chairman: Is that not what Dr. McClure said?

Dr. Smith: I think perhaps he did, except he put the focus of it on education. I am suggesting that it is in the very circumstances in which people live and that these so-called abuses are the only defence that people have. That is cultural. That is a learned way of reacting, a learned way of feeling about people that you know have more, not only economically but have contact with the whole field of institutions of the world society.

Senator Fournier: May I ask a question at this time? This is given by whom, this $35. Who pays that; the Federal Government?

Dr. Smith: Yes.

Senator Fournier: How do they spend this $35 a month?

Dr. Smith: That is very clearly laid out. In the year 1965 there was a mimeographed sheet posted in all of the trading outlets which said "You may buy so much flour."

Senator Fournier: You may.

Dr. Smith: You may—so much flour, so much sugar, so much tea. No tobacco, no malt, no yeast and the reason for that was to prevent the making of home brew which is endemic in the Western Arctic.

Now, the reaction of the people to a situation like this was to find as many dodges as possible to get around these limitations and conditions under which social assistance is given. Compared to the urban situation in the city, they could probably only be described as oppressive. Given, furthermore, that if a person earns a little—even a little money—by trapping a few rats in the spring, that value is deducted from his $35.

We are dealing with people who are living in a very marginal existence. That is not typical of all Indians in Canada, but the question that came up today by the Honourable Senator was: how to preserve the culture and ensure participation in Canadian society? I suggest that the two confound each other because the culture that we see is a product and an accommodation and a response to abject and degrading poverty of the very worst kind of that you cannot ensure the participation of people who live in a state of that kind.

Senator McGrand: You say the Indian wants to escape his poverty but does not want to integrate into the White society. Is that it?

Dr. Smith: Well, let me speak very briefly about the Western Arctic. I do not presume to speak about all of Canada. The realization that they were poor has only occurred since the building of large affluent towns such as Inuvik, the showplaces of Arctic technology which have forced the contrast between the Indian people and all others.

The average per capita income of white people living in Inuvik is $3,000 per year, something in the order of 5 to 10 times the average Indian person has, and that is free disposable cash. For a native person it is not that.

In this context the native people are attempting to transcend this class identity first by asserting and they are asserting it strongly. Now, this will probably be a point of the transition towards what you want to call assimilation but this is not cause for a laissez faire wait and see attitude, because other anthropologists have pointed out that feelings of this kind are extremely dynamic, are free-flowing, can be deflected easily from one goal to another and on the slightest provocation can be unleashed in fears and destructive social action.

I think we know who the victims of that may well be.

Senator Quart: Well, Mr. Chairman and Reverend Gentlemen, and especially my friend Bishop Pelletier with whom I assure you I had most wonderful co-operation during the War; unfortunately I have to leave as there are some people in my office, but I have picked up a few little threads which I think may be interesting.

Someone mentioned volunteers and of course I am all for volunteers and Senator Fergusson and Senator Inman stole my music on volunteers and I quite agree with what I have seen in your brief that volunteer organizations can help tremendously.

Personally I have been a volunteer all my life and I think that Bishop Pelletier will be able to say ah, in any federated charities, aide aux familles and des combattants founded during the War with three paid employees from the Provincial government and we handled all the budgeting for the servicemens' wives and everything else.

Well, I did not do it but the wonderful committee did but where do you get your funds, or has that question been asked, to publish all these or have you a public appeal or do your 11 churches pitch in and subscribe?

Mr. Maxwell: Most of the time, if you will excuse the expression, Senator Quart, we fly by the seat of our pants. We do not have a large budget at all although the Council and the Conference did make it possible for us to publish this booklet.

In the Coalition we have had voluntary contributions of funds from the Council, the Conference, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Federation of National Trade Unions, Caisse Populaire and a few organizations like this, just enough to get us in business. We do not want to have a large budget, just enough to keep in operation and we think it is possible.

We are going to have to face the whole question at our first general assembly this October. We are convinced by what we have already managed to do that you can achieve a lot of things by pooling the resources you have. The main contribution is peoples' priority time.

Senator Quart: You have no membership? You have no paid membership?

Mr. Maxwell: We have no membership dues now, no, for the Coalition.

Senator Quart: Do you officially recognize any voluntary national organization of men and women?

Mr. Maxwell: Any organization that subscribes to our provisional statement of intentions can be a member of the Coalition.

Senator Quart: Do you charge them?

Mr. Maxwell: No, there is no joining fee.

Senator Quart: You should, I think.

Mr. Maxwell: We might have to have a small one, but at the moment there is none.

Senator Quart: I think it was Senator McGrand mentioning the churches managing to get on together and I assure you that when

Mr. Fisher set up Canadian Interfaith prior to 1967 there were 52 faiths in Canada working together and they did a wonderful job. I think that was proof positive of how you can get on. Is this published in French as well?

Mr. Maxwell: Yes.

Canon Wilkinson: We have some here.

Mr. Maxwell: There are copies here.

Senator Quart: Thank you. I did not see them. By any chance do you have any team of speakers or something going around or approaching national conventions or organizations?

The Chairman: I think they are a pretty good team here.

Senator Quart: Yes, that is fine for us, but do they go to national conventions or national organizations to create a public conscience? Have you any project of this kind?

Mr. Maxwell: Yes. A number in this room and others as well have spoken about the poverty report and the Coalition process across the country.

The Chairman: I have three questions. I turn to page 15 and forgetting about national defence. We are not going to get into that discussion. You make a very potent argument when you point out 60 cents is the per capita cost for public housing, $13.59 for post-secondary education and $29.12 for family and youth allowances, making a total of $43.31 per capita and national defence costs about twice that.

Here you are in the community and across the country and if you do not know what is going on in Canada no one does. An announcement made in Winnipeg last Saturday or over the weekend in which it was indicated that the Dominion Government and the Provincial Governments were on the verge of reaching agreement to slow down the cost of post-secondary education, Medicare and hospitalization.

In the evidence before our Committee, with the exception of maintenance income, education is second and Medicare and hospitalization are almost in the same position. These affect the poor people of this country very vitally. Where is your voice?

Canon Wilkinson: My voice is right with that editorial that you have from the Toronto Star in front of you which said this was an iniquitous way to cut costs in a time of poverty.

The Chairman: I know, Canon Wilkinson, but that is not good enough. That editorial perhaps is a little inspired, but the point is: where is the voice of the church?

Mr. Maxwell: The outcry.

The Chairman: I did not want to say "outcry."

Mr. Maxwell: The protest.

The Chairman: I will get to that in a minute. Here you are involved, genuinely, honestly, and we believe that you are. With this sort of thing before it happens, not after it happens, but when it is likely to happen where is the public outcry?

Mr. Maxwell: In the public arena we are not there soon enough on most issues, I agree with you, mainly for lack of personnel to be there. This means we have got to change our own priorities.

The Chairman: No. This is not involving personnel, Mr. Maxwell. Nobody is teaching the people around this table anything about how to get into the newspapers or how to make protests. Every one of you know. This seems to me to be an unusually fine opportunity to be in a very clear and loud voice saying you cannot allow this to happen. This affects the poor as nothing else affects the poor. This is what I want to know.

Canon Wilkinson: Well, that was a closed conference.

The Chairman: It was carried in every paper. I picked it up in the Globe and Mail the first morning. It was in every paper. I did not bring the paper with me but when I saw it myself I did something about it, but I cannot do too much because of my position here at the moment; but where is the public outcry to say be careful about doing this sort of thing?

Dr. Honey: Mr. Chairman, you are perhaps not asking us whether we in a sense officially have registered an outcry but whether there is enough sensitivity across the country in churches that spontaneously this kind of outcry has come up. Is this what you are asking us?

The Chairman: No, it is not. The churches and the people across the country read it and I do not think they fully understood what it means. You do not expect the man on the street to know but you ought to know because you are concerned with the poor. You know what affects the poor.

Was not this a tremendous opportunity to make your voice heard? In that way you were helpful to them and you are helpful to us.

Dr. Honey: I think that it still is true, as Mr. Maxwell said, with some of us it is a matter really of time. You are quite right. We should have been right on the spot with this, and make sure that our voice was registered, but we cannot be in six places at once unfortunately.

I think I would see this as also a long-term thing. As I was trying to say we have got to somehow create enough sensitivity that the outcry comes up from the people in letters to the editor and in various other ways, in letters to M.P.'s and telegrams to the Prime Minister and so on.

Dr. McClure: I doubt it is a function of the church, Mr. Chairman, to come out the next morning three hours later after each action with the church's feeling on this and the church's feeling on Cambodia and the church's feeling on Biafra and the church's feeling about Israel.

I am not sure it is a function of the church. I regard the church's function is to create sensitivity among its members that they will then behave as Canadian citizens.

The Chairman: Then what has been done with respect to that amongst its members to create that sensitivity. I have said this affects the poor and may affect them immediately.

Dr. McClure: The whole education of the church outside of your doctrinal education, surely with all the literature that went out about social problems and about our racial problems and about our international problems, this is to create that sensitivity. That is what we are after and it is long-term stuff, but it is not for the churches to come out three hours after everything is done and immediately make a statement the church stands for this. The Presbyterian Church stands for that. That is not our job.

The Chairman: Well then, how do you protect the poor when something is likely to be done that will hurt the poor?

Dr. McClure: Take the long haul attitude when you are...

The Chairman: But, Mr. Moderator, the poor have to eat in the meantime. They need hospitalization. They need medicare. They need all these things in the meantime. What answer is that to them?

Canon Wilkinson: Mr. Chairman, one of the things that occurs to me is that your Committee, of all committees, ought to know what the churches have been attempting to say about this both in advance of that action and during that action by the briefs that you have received; the excellent brief from the Moderators' Church. You know, hit very hard and very incisively at the very things which the Finance Ministers, dealing strictly with dollars and saying, we are spending too many of them, let us chop them down—are saying these reports that you are asking us about.

The United Church brief quite specifically said that the poor, those specifically living below the poverty line should have the old-age pension, for instance, increased, and the unemployment insurance, family allowances and all the rest of it.

The Coalition for Development, in this document which was put in your hands, picks up again on this very same theme and again says that this kind of action which the Finance Ministers are taking on purely a dollar value is iniquitive in our view.

The Chairman: That is all I wanted you to say. The brief which was filed is an excellent brief but I do not know whether they ever saw it on the other side. It is not likely they did. Some of the things were reported.

Canon Wilkinson: Let us repeat here then that one of the things that is very strongly here in our minds is that it is utterly wrong to be trying to deal with a balanced budget, for instance, unless you are also dealing with the kinds of things on which you want to spend your money and where on earth is the Willard document? We have known this has been in existence for quite some time.

The longer it remains hidden in whatever cubbyhole it is in on the Hill, the less use it will be. The debate has gone on purely on terms of some ephemeral item which says X number of dollars is what the Government ought to operate on. Who says so?

The basis of the production of wealth in this country has shifted radically from the basis on which it was resting at the time of Confederation. We have got to recognize this. Today Senator Fournier was hitting right on the track with his questioning of Father St-

Onge and what he was getting at was the question of sensitivity or the effects and consequences of the decisions and actions taken by responsible authorities.

A part of this sensitivity to effects of consequences hang upon the consequences of mass media which communicate. What goes on here, the way we sit to the folk in the igloo, the canoe and what have you. We cannot get away from these kinds of consequences. We have got to live with them.

We do have, coming into our hands and you particularly here on the Hill, access to the finest computer technology in the country. These can give us the kinds of retrieval systems for simulation testing and evaluating what we propose to do and it seems to me we have a moral responsibility to use the techniques before we start making them on the basis of our kinds of assumptions. Let us test them for a variety of assumptions and then we have some kind of responsible action being taken.

The Chairman: Now I will get to the second question. My second question is: I would like someone to discuss the work ethic in the light of what may be our society of tomorrow where we give consideration to the maintenance income, work or not work, worthy or unworthy. We have people in that class. In the light of that we have had discussions about incentives and work. Now, what is your view on the work ethic?

Reverend Berner: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we are coming into a time when work will be less and less necessary, certainly physical work. We have to recognize more the problem of leisure, what man does with his time and his life, apart from the necessary time that is involved in producing the goods of life.

We are also going to have to take into greater consideration the fact of doing creative things, the kind of things a man would like to do rather than what he is forced to do to earn his living and who is to say that a man who paints a beautiful scene does not do a better job than a man who creates a sports car so I think we are coming to a time when we will have to allow people to do the thing that they are best, in their own desire and capability, able to do rather than forcing them to work at a kind of job that is an onerous one. This looks like Utopia but the time is coming. It is with us when there is much more leisure and much less need for in fact physical work. We have to approach the problem from this point of view.

The Chairman: You did not quite get my question. If there is work that is available the Canadian people are not prepared in my view to pass up and pay a man who will not take the work or will not work for whatever his reasons, unless he is ill. I am speaking about work not being available and we are paying him. What then is the attitude?

Reverend Berner: If work is not available one assumes that there is no work to be done. Therefore why should a man work for the sake of working?

The Chairman: What is the public attitude? That is what I am asking.

Canon Wilkinson: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, you are implying an assumption that the only method for distribution of work is wealth on the basis of an old definition of work which was, you know, labour of some kind or another.

The Chairman: You are getting to it. That is what I want someone to discuss.

Mr. Maxwell: Is your question, Senator, what is politically possible today in terms of public sentiment and in the way of policy is that in any welfare assistance plan you have to have the work component built in there somewhere?

The Chairman: I am saying that is an attitude that we get constantly. The Americans share it. We share it, incentive and work. Now, what do you think the public's view on that is?

Mr. Maxwell: I think the public may eventually reach Mr. Berner's position, which I share, but the majority do not hold that view now.

The Chairman: What do you mean by eventually?

Mr. Maxwell: How long is eventually? Oh, ten years.

The Chairman: Ten years is a long time.

Mr. Maxwell: I think there will be that much change in our work pattern that we will see that then. Certainly we will have shifted from the physical force where 5 or 6 per cent of the labour force will produce all the goods we need.

The Chairman: Well, let us have someone who will say something about the former attitude on the work ethic as against the present attitude from the church's point of view.

Mr. Maxwell: Well, that is a good question.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, there is a gentleman down there who wishes to answer the question.

Mr. Maxwell: Mr. Walker.

Reverend Walker: Sorry, Mr. Chairman. You threw that question out and I was going to make a comment. Perhaps I will try to answer your question. I think the former thinking of people has been that if a person is to get welfare they ought to go out and cut trees or throw stones or do something in a physical sense in order to earn this.

As I listened to Mr. Berner I became concerned about the poor and this new Utopia where a man works at what he wants to work at or what he likes to work at because I still feel that the poor will be disenfranchised. They will not have the opportunity to do what they want to do.

Too many people look at a person on welfare and call them lazy, indifferent, and they do not give them the opportunity for expression, for work, and I think we have some built-in prejudices simply because people are on assistance of some sort. I can see a compounding of the problem because if the opportunity for education is limited by one's financial resources in this world in which we forecast in 10 years time people will be working 24 or 32 hours a week, these poor people are going to be still in difficult circumstances and perhaps even more so than now.

The Chairman: Well, let me try and see if I cannot clarify the question a little. Let me put it to you straight in question form. Is there a responsibility for the government to be the employer of last resort or in the alternative to pay maintenance?

Mr. Maxwell: My personal view would be that as the last resort you should be there to maintain his maintenance regardless of whether a man is working or not, because he has a right to the basic necessities of life. If he lives in a society that cannot give him gainful work or for other reasons he cannot have it then as a fundamental right, to which we subscribed in the United Nations Charter, then as a last resort government at different levels must make available that maintenance to him.

I agree that the total public has not reached that position yet but this is the point that governments and committees like yours and churches have got to hammer home that fundamental right that we have; pointing out that the availability of work is not going to be as great as it was before technology and automation, at least in physical work.

The Chairman: Is there anyone else who would like to get into this debate?

Dr. Honey: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that you are aware that the vast majority of the people on our welfare rolls are not really in a position to work. They are unemployable for one reason or another. I do not have the figures.

The Chairman: That is true. We have the figures and you are quite right.

Dr. Honey: I know I have seen figures for studies done in the United States where it turned out that about 1 per cent are unemployable.

The Chairman: Our figures are very near that percentage.

Dr. Honey: So I think this is a myth that needs to be dissipated on the part of very, very many people, that people on welfare should get out and work if they had any gumption. I hope your Committee will say very clearly to the general public this is not true.

The Chairman: Has anybody else any views?

[Translation]

Father St-Onge: A while ago, when I spoke about a setback for the under-developed in the 60's, I was referring mainly, I had in mind the Third World, and I think it was the Pearson Report, unless I am mistaken, which described the setback in this field for the Third World and I had my reservations about Canada because I did not have figures and recent studies.

Now your main concern is the degradation of society and it seems to me that you were drawing a parallel between degradation in the area of poverty and the pollution of society. And you spoke about the pollution of consciences, of justice. I do not know whether I would be as optimistic, pessimistic, pardon me, on certain point. It seems to me that we are making progress in certain areas. I see the efforts being made at present in the Church up-dating certain values which were previously neglected in order to gain a better understanding of the human values which we have perhaps overly neglected. I take one like liberty, for example, or, I could take human dignity. I would not be prepared to say that we have lost ground in that respect, I believe that we are regaining some, and simply because there is an awakening of conscience occurring now, and then people do not let themselves be oppressed easily. We see all these protest movements, and I personally would say that they are more positive than negative on the whole. We find extremists of whom we do not approve, but on the whole, I believe that it is a healthy movement and it is man who is again becoming aware of his dignity.

Question on the pollution of justice, there, I am not in a position to make a statement, but in the world today we are experiencing certain phenomena which pass. I have one at present, that I have followed in union circles, for example, where I go, three forces have united to crush a union. You have the police force, the money force and the political force. They have joined to crush a union. There I might also ask questions on the pollution of justice, or on the conscience of money. It also seems to me that all those questions should be brought back. A while ago, someone noted, is it more urgent to bring back the structures than the methods, than consciences. The two should go together. I think that we should also start with this conviction that the privileged will not give up their privileges unless they are forced by others to tell them that they must leave room for someone else. And if it is there that we should see action today, in the area of structures, the fact is that we too—let us be at least aware that the poor also must have their place in society, must be present at the decisions which concern them, and perhaps remove a bit of the privilege from those who presently hold all the power.

Senator Fournier: I am going to ask you another question. Thank you, Father.

Is there not developing in our society at present—I personally believe, I have no objection to giving $100, I am using a figure, to the poor provided that it is well spent; but if I give it to a family that wastes it, I will not have the same attitude towards that family as I had before making my contribution. We have lived, we have seen tremendous abuses being made in welfare, the abuses, and I believe that reflects to some extent on the people.

Get everything you can, it does not matter, it belongs to the government, it is ours. It is a mentality which has been shaped in society and that is widespread, perhaps more so than you think. There is no doubt that, as parish priest, you are aware of those things. Therefore, on these questions, you will be able to give your opinions, which would enlighten us a bit.

I would like to ask you here, do you think, for example, that one could, with a minimum income, without mentioning figures, that one would solve the problem of poverty, if we took the prior person and gave him a minimum, an income, let us say, of $4,000 a year, since he is not prepared to better his lot, as they say. One could say that there are thousands of cases who receive welfare, who abuse it in every way possible. Will he be given this increase, is he going to take advantage of it to improve his lot, or is he going to abuse it?

Father St-Onge: Sir, I believe that you felt in the brief that the committee that prepared this brief is justly concerned, and it does not want to bring the problem of poverty back to an economic question. You felt it, that there are other human needs that must be taken into account. But I believe that we must get in the frame of mind, in 1970, whereby there are fundamental human needs which must be given to the individual, namely, an individual's right to live a decent life on the threshold of society. And all those who live below that should not accept that situation. And then, unfortunately, we have too large a number of cases who have to live in sub-human conditions. In view of the fact that Canada has the means at least to bring them up to that level, we have to make the necessary effort. I understand as you do, for example, that it is not enough to give money. Those people must be educated so that they will fill their own fundamental needs, their own essential needs in life. That does not mean that a minimum income would guarantee a solution to the problem automatically; I know that.

I also believe that we should not say: those people are not capable of handling their money, therefore, they will not be given any and they will be left to live in sub-human conditions.

At present, I believe that people still want to work, that is part of the concept of life, they want to earn, to be independent. Perhaps in a few years, that mentality will change, people may, if they are not capable of working, depending on the opportunities that present themselves, they will accept living in a system, in a leisure society, I do not know. At present, I believe that certain laws should also be questioned, laws which give bonuses for laziness and idleness. For example, I refer to certain social assistance laws which penalize people who would like to work, since they would cut off their welfare allowances. I believe that such laws should be questioned. We should not go to the other extreme either; forcing people to work, to do work they are not capable of doing, for which they are not prepared. I believe that there should be a middle way between the two in order to accommodate human dignity, the aspirations of the people, and also to meet the social and economic requirements of a country.

[English]

The Chairman: Well, I think it is well to know that the law of the land and the law of the country is that need must be met. It is not met in the way we want it to be met or in all places so there is no point in going to the United Nations looking for assistance. It is on our statute books. We do not meet it, of course, and that is one of the difficulties that we have to face.

One of the things that is bothering the Canadian people is the handing out of money without getting something in return. They have got the wrong impression that far too many people are ready to take a handout without wishing to work. It has been drummed in over a period of years and it is hard to get rid of. As you have indicated, about 1 per cent of the people on welfare are capable of working. How do we meet that? You do not change that view overnight.

Reverend Walker: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the new contracts which labour are working out with management might not help a great deal to change this. The concept of the 32-hour week now is in actual existence with one labour union although it seems radical to some people.

The Chairman: Reverend Walker, 30 per cent of the labour force is unionized only. 70 per cent is not unionized, and you are getting to the root of the problem but that is the great difficulty that we have to face in this country.

I once heard a statement to this effect: "Those who march on the picket line do not march on the bread line." I think there is a lot of truth in that.

Reverend Walker: I was thinking more, sir, of the concept of education which you were implying in your question, the changing of the attitudes of people.

Mr. Maxwell: Senator, is it not true that our welfare laws have tended to discourage work on the part of recipients and the Nixon administration, for example, in the United States is trying to build in more of a work income component and allow a person to earn more before you deduct their welfare benefits.

It seems to me there is wisdom in moving in that direction and you would have the data to make that judgment. What do you think?

The Chairman: That is the law of the land today in nine provinces in Canada. At the present time they can earn, but as Senator Quart points out, they do not give them sufficient deduction.

Mr. Maxwell: No. They can earn a little.

The Chairman: They can earn a little but he doesn't earn enough. We have to hurdle that by coming up with some provision for maintenance that overcomes that.

Senator Quart: Mr. Chairman, may I just interrupt for a moment. We have had groups come before us, you know, that have substantiated the objection which I have that these people if they accept the job are cut off. All right, that is a little deduction but then they cannot get back on sometimes. There is one woman I remember sitting there who said she could not get on welfare again for three months.

Now, another thing. We are talking about the employable poor. Well, I can assure you that it is pretty difficult to even get people to cut the grass or do anything, and believe me I know what I am talking about just now. Our club where I live has been trying again and it is the same old story; they cannot do it because if they come and take a job for us, even if they are paid under the table and the rest of it is hush-hush, you cannot get them.

The Chairman: Senator Fournier, you had something else?

Senator Fournier: No. I was going to ask what the church could do to change the public attitude but we have been discussing that for the last half an hour and I think that is sufficient.

Reverend Walker: I would like to add one thing, Mr. Chairman. I was wondering what your opinion was on this question yourself...

The Chairman: On what?

Reverend Walker: On the work ethic. I do not want the answer. I did not hear anyone say this and I think I should just add it. Granted we are talking about the employable unemployed and Dr. Honey made the point about being precise on the small number. Father St. Onge and Mr. Maxwell and others made the point that there is something strange in our welfare now when a man wants to work and cannot work because when he does he makes less money.

The point I would like to make is that I think it would be the unanimous opinion of this representation here today that a man should work. It is in keeping with his dignity that he work and in answer to your blunt question as to whether the government should not be the employer as a last resort I would say the answer is "Yes" if it means giving some dignity to a poor person because a man cannot be in that unemployed category, living around the house, hanging around the neighbourhood and seeing everyone else living a kind of normal life and not deteriorate really badly in many ways and that is why I emphasize the dignity aspect.

So I would say we strongly support the work ethic, if that is what you had in mind by your question.

The Chairman: Yes, we had. The Vanier Institute came out flatly and quite clearly on it and I gather from the brief of the Deputy Minister of Welfare, if you read that brief completely—that he left that very impression with me. I think others got the same impression.

Senator Fournier: Perhaps we should not overlook the point that Father MacNeil made, which was right, but there is the other side. Sometimes a man walking along the street killing time makes more money out of welfare than if he had a little job. This is a flaw in the government organization.

* We cannot go into that now because we have not got the time. He is paid for not working.

The Chairman: He is talking about very low minimum wages and less than minimum wages and you know that as well as I do. I think you are quite right. Let me just say that what you very distinguished people have done is a very forward step. You have come here with a deep and vital concern for people and with a sense of dedication. I think the steps that you are taking are meaningful steps and will help the poor.

You know, if you involve the poor within you you are not going to be able to keep quiet about a great number of things that you are now doing. The poor have methods of expression that you may not adhere to. They think that public statements, a little picketing now and then, a little harrassment now and then, may get some results. I wonder when those poor are going to get on your board how you will react to that sort of thing. My own feeling is that I thought it would be good for you.

Senator Carter has a question.

Senator Carter: When you talk about involving the public as something that has got to be done, I had an idea and I want to test it out to get your reaction to it. Families will adopt orphans in Korea and look after them. Could we not have this idea here among the affluent people? We live in a rich and poor community. Could the churches propagate this idea and implement it or is it worth thinking about?

Canon Wilkinson: Some can and some cannot. It takes a skilful person to be able to do it.

Senator Carter: I am not talking about churches. I am talking about people as members of the congregation, but to have the church stand behind it and try to encourage it.

Dr. Honey: You are speaking of adoption in terms of accepting financial responsibility?

Senator Carter: Yes, I am concerned with the idea. Change the word "adoption" and say "take the financial responsibility for it."

Dr. Honey: This would mean that that person has to go up in his neighborhood having people know he is in effect a ward of some organization.

Senator Carter: I do not think he would necessarily have to be that. It all depends how you do it. I mean, if you are going to go out and advertise it, sure, but cannot we do things on the quiet any more? Does your right hand always have to know what your left hand is doing?

Dr. Honey: That is not in that category.

The Chairman: Careful, Senator. While you were away I was giving him a bit of a do about keeping too quiet, so now you are asking him to keep quiet.

Senator Carter: No, I am not saying they should keep quiet. The person who was going to get involved does not have to advertise it.

The Chairman: I see what you mean.

Mr. Maxwell: I think a lot of that kind of thing is going on anonymously now.

Canon Wilson: But the catch is you have to do something about changing the system that brings about this dependency.

Senator Carter: You are getting on thin ice again now when you talk about changing the system. I would like to get your comments on this. Lord Acton said "To expect a change in society may be an act of faith but to expect a change in society without a change in human nature is an act of lunacy." I would like to get your view on that.

Canon Wilkinson: Like so many others of his sayings there are grains of truth in them. Organizing people who are concerned to discover what power they have when they exercise their votes can in fact start to bring about political leverage that can bring about the changes they are after. They may not go in the direction they really want by the time they get there, but the changes are going to be made.

Senator Quart: What I was going to suggest, Mr. Chairman, to Senator Carter, was that what difference would there be if you received an SOS from one of the churches and you gave a donation to their fund and then you eliminate any idea of saying there was any dependence.

Mr. Maxwell: Yes, do it through a third party.

Senator Quart: Yes.

The Chairman: Is there anything further.

Senator Carter: No. I just wanted to get their reaction to it. I am not sure what the reaction was.

Mr. Maxwell: We are pondering it.

The Chairman: He says they are pondering it.

Mr. Maxwell: May I call on Bishop Pelletier?

The Chairman: Has everyone had a chance to say what they want to say here?

Dr. Honey: I was going to say further to Senator Carter, one does not expect fundamental changes in human nature. I do not know whether that is what Senator Carter is talking about.

We are dealing century after century with the same fundamental concept of human nature and changes can take place in individuals, changes about conversion, if you will, changes of orientation, but generation after generation you are dealing fundamentally and you start afresh with the same kind of human nature.

Now, systems come and systems go. We have systems of social organization which attempt in one way or another to cope with the stuff of human nature and keep it under control so a reasonable degree of justice is assured.

It is possible to change the moral climate in a given situation which makes it possible and makes it easier to generate the moral will and bring into being the kind of system which will achieve a greater degree of justice in our society.

This is not the same thing as changing human nature.

Senator Carter: Well, it is part of it, but there is one item here I want to pursue. The structures and systems we have now, it is a case of which came first, the chicken or the egg. The systems and the structures we have now reflect the attitudes and the prejudices and whatever is inside a human being and you are not going to change it from the top down.

What I interpreted your brief as saying was if we change the structures and so forth that eventually people are going to change. I would say it should be the other way around. If you want to change the structures you have to change the people first.

Mr. Maxwell: We are saying we have to work at both simultaneously, Senator.

Senator Carter: Oh, yes, but you are looking through the wrong end of the telescope, according to your brief.

Mr. Maxwell: May I call on Bishop Pelletier to speak for the delegation?

[Translation]

Monseigneur Pelletier: It gives me great pleasure to thank the committee for receiving us this morning.

[English]

I note from the very beginning that we were in a very sympathetic milieu and I am sure this morning together we have given an example which has been very fruitful and very promising of what exactly the Coalition for Development is.

Another thing is that this morning together we have put seeds in a very well fertilized field with a hope of one of the richest harvests for the benefit of the poor in our country and abroad. Thank you everyone.

The Chairman: Thank you, gentlemen.

INTRODUCTION

Everywhere in today's world of destructive/creative chaos, people are in a hurry to be fully alive. Youth and the poor especially want to have more, know more, and do more so as to live more. They are seeking freedom from daily want, a share in social power, and a better quality of life now. The deprived are saying to the privileged, "Damn your charity, give us justice!" Those in need are impatient because there is no longer any valid excuse for injustice and discrimination. Abundant resources and technical know-how can provide necessities and opportunities for all—given enough moral will and political courage. Hence the great expectations. Hence the revolutionary mood because these expectations are frustrated.

—Interchurch Strategy Report
para. 1

We are here in response to the sign of the times described above. We acknowledge that the churches of Canada—various groups of Christians—share in the collective responsibility for human want in the midst of plenty, both in this country and the nation named Earth.

Because we stand in the Judaeo-Christian tradition we must assume the duty to be watchful critics of society in every time and place. For we believe that only God is perfect; only on Him can men ultimately rely, and only to Him can men commit their unconditioned loyalty. To accept human laws and institutions as beyond criticism is to idolize them. On this point the Bible enjoins us to be radical questioners of all earthly authority. "You must judge whether in God's eyes it is right to listen to you and not to God." (Acts 4,19)

We share also in the responsibility to seek solutions to social injustice. In this we are in the tradition of the great prophets of Israel, who insisted that men's first duty before God is "to break unjust fetters...to share your bread with the hungry and shelter the homeless poor..." (Is. 58,6-7) Christians should pay particular heed to this prophetic injunction, and suffering humanity expects that we will, since we claim to follow a Servant Lord who lived and died for others.

In the past Christian groups have been social pioneers. It was religious agencies, for example, which started many of the first schools, hospitals, and welfare programs before such services were widely accepted as public responsibility.

Can churches in Canada again serve as social pioneers in the technical society of today? In recent years Christian leaders have been searching for new social strategies. One product of that search is a practical program for united action in the 1970s. It is contained in the Interchurch Strategy Report entitled Towards a Coalition for Development (which is included in the documentation). Since its publication in May, 1969, some 50,000 copies of this report have circulated across Canada. In response to the report, Christian groups in growing numbers are taking stock of their resources and making new social commitments.

This submission represents another step in our continuing search for effective social strategies. We offer some further insights, and report progress to this date in an "experiment in pluralism"—namely the Canadian Coalition for Development. This new working partnership of religious groups and a wide range of other intermediate organizations in the voluntary sector was initiated by the Conference and Council.

1. A PERSPECTIVE AND TWO WORKING NORMS

Most of humanity is still caught in the trap of poverty. The gap is widening between the rich and the poor nations, between the affluent and the deprived within each nation. In Canada, the "Just Society" is still a dream. The reality is a disgrace, which sees 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 Canadians enslaved by economic and social want. Public priorities still put the power of money before the needs of people.

—Interchurch Strategy Report para. 2

Already you have received many definitions of poverty; we do not propose to offer another. Instead, we endeavour to situate the problem of poverty within a vision of man and society, taking into account some of the human values and aspirations which many Canadians hold.

Most definitions of poverty betray an economic preoccupation. Certainly bread comes first, but human need encompasses much more than bread. Most definitions of poverty also offer an antiseptic and detached description of a human tragedy which cries out for passion and compassion. Nor do most definitions recognize that poverty in some sense afflicts all men. As the Interchurch Strategy Report of May, 1969, said:

Poverty is the sum total of human needs and hungers. In this broad sense all of us are poor. The majority of mankind is denied even the basic necessities of existence. Under present priorities, arms before aid and money power before people's needs spell poverty for most. The majority is enslaved by a conspiracy of circumstances, cut off from adequate opportunities to better their lot. This human misery is indivisible in the nation called Earth. Our neighbor is every man whose need we know and whom we can assist, whether he lives "at home" or "abroad".

—ISR, 16

The same report attempted to broaden and humanize the popular concept of development, stating:

Development is the process of continuous human growth, the integrated sum of human achievements and satisfactions—economic, social, political, cultural, and spiritual. Human development policies involve new approaches and new social priorities... This process opens new doors to participation in decision-making. Development policies set people free to seek a full life—each in his own way and at his own pace.

—ISR, 16

We agree with this description as far as it goes. However, it does not quite break away from the prevalent motion which sees development as an almost mechanical and inevitable process involving an efficient blend of education and technology. The definition does not point out that existing social systems have built-in biases which tend to perpetuate inequities. Nor does it acknowledge that justice demands nothing less than the creation by the people of new social structures in harmony with human fulfillment.

For these reasons, we prefer to speak of humanity's escape from poverty in all its forms as a gradual process of liberation.

Liberation, first of all, involves the rejection of popular myths which now comfort the powerful and deny justice to the weak; the myth that public education is neutral, when in reality it is geared to the "success formula" and designed to preserve the status quo; the myth of "scientific objectivity", which tends to treat existing social practices as immutable laws; the myth which holds that the deprived are intrinsically inferior ("lazy", "unstable", etc.), when in reality they are kept powerless and voiceless by a conspiracy of circumstances favoring those already established.

Liberation is a constant biblical theme. The Scriptures speak of men's longing to be liberated from the slavery to which human sin has subjected them: misery and violence, oppression and ignorance—in a word, that injustice which has its origin in selfishness. The "hunger and thirst after justice" of which the gospel speaks anticipated the profound yearnings of contemporary humanity for an end to war and exploitation; for a halt to all those policies of madness which enslave mankind, pollute the environment, and even threaten life on Earth.

In interpreting this hunger of the human spirit for liberation, modern Christian leaders have called repeatedly for fundamental reforms to "reduce inequalities, fight discriminations, free man from various types of servitude and enable him to be the instrument of his own material betterment, moral progress, and spiritual growth". (Paul VI, Development of Peoples, para. 34) Youth and the oppressed especially long for opportunities to realize their dignity as children of God; for opportunities to become "new men" who are masters of their own life and makers of their own history.

Obviously, then, any educational or economic program which would have people simply "fit in" with the present technological maze and political muddle is not true liberation. Authentic policies of liberation will enable people to seek a full life—each in his own way and at his own pace in the company of his neighbors. The challenge of liberation is to enable persons now entrapped by circumstances to spring loose, to discover their potential, to seek opportunities for change and growth, and to assume the primary responsibility for their own future and share in building a just society.

This requires organization—new power groupings which give the deprived a public voice and an active role in decision-making. This in turn requires new attitudes on the part of the present wielders of public power, and in time, new social structures and methods which facilitate rather than handicap the quest for freedom and fulfillment. This involves contention, conflict, and suffering—the price necessary for human progress paid by such men as Jeremiah, Francis of Assisi and Martin Luther King. It is a price well worth paying. The prize is fullness of life.

It may seem naïve to foresee a day when virtually every person can become an active participant in the policy-making which affects his life. We call your attention to the emergence of articulate leaders among Canada's first native peoples and the remarkable growth of citizens' groups during the past year. These signs of the time indicate "new power" is fast becoming a reality.

In Latin America, meanwhile, where social inequities are much greater than here, a process of liberation such as we have described is beginning among the common people with Christians among the pioneering leaders. And throughout the world there are new stirrings among students, workers, professionals and intellectuals.

In any case, we are not afraid to be hopeful in proposing a new vision of man and an open future for humanity. Surely a new perspective is called for when existing systems keep 80 per cent of humanity enslaved by want, including as many as one fourth of all Canadians.

We believe two working norms follow from this perspective of human liberation and social development.

(1) Full development depends on both the public and private sectors

We acknowledge and emphasize that public authorities have the major responsibility for advancing and coordinating the common good of the people. Today only governments have the powers and resources to initiate and sustain balanced development.

Nevertheless, we challenge any assumption that policies of development should be decided exclusively within the narrow confines of partisan politics. And we challenge any assumption that public agencies of government alone can overcome poverty and achieve social progress. Programs which are planned and executed by governments alone have yet to show that flexibility which meets the diversity of local needs.

More important, it is imperative that each citizen, poor as well as rich, join in the search for a better quality of life. Poverty does not consist solely in economic hardship; it entails the erosion of human personality, the cramping of a person's sense of what a full life can mean. To combat poverty, then, it will not suffice for the public sector to hand out money. Each person must learn to discover and articulate his own needs and seek to fulfill them.

The awakening of the sense of what is possible for man and the responsible steps required to attain it is primarily the task of voluntary organizations, not of governments.

Voluntary intermediate groups, including religious bodies, should co-operate with, complement and supplement the efforts of governments; and when need be, should also challenge existing priorities and policies in the public sector. Thus voluntary organizations of citizens will exert an essential countervailing presence".

However, the effectiveness of the voluntary sector is impeded by fragmentation, duplication of effort, and excessive internal housekeeping, such as maintenance of structures and fund-raising. Among other reforms, there needs to be a united effort which pools limited resources and personnel.

(2) New working partnerships are required

We are more than ever convinced that the Interchurch Strategy Report of May, 1969 was correct in calling for new working partnerships in the intermediate sector to help win the long war against want. As it said, "Such a 'coalition of concern' exists, at least potentially, in every community" (ISR, 24). The report recommended that the Canadian Council of Churches and the Canadian Catholic Conference should try to initiate such a coalition at the national level (ISR, 58). In June of last year the executive officers of the Conference and the Council accepted this recommendation. Since then senior staff of the two bodies have been engaged in this new undertaking.

The results to date are described below. We invite your comments and encouragement in this social pioneering; it is at once evidence of our hopes and our commitment to share in the progressive development of Canadian society and the global community.

2. THE COALITION EXPERIMENT

...Wide participation is the key. When many more people share actively in decision-making, new social priorities will emerge for building a better society...

ISR, 20

Last summer the idea of a working partnership of churches and other intermediate organizations in the voluntary sector was explored with national leaders of business, co-operatives, labour, welfare and related fields. Their responses were favorable—provided that this co-operation did not involve yet another superagency and assuming an open-ended, ad hoc approach was taken.

A bilingual meeting of potential partners took place in Ottawa during October to explore the possibilities further. The leaders present readily agreed that their groups and others should work together to promote social development. They also reached consensus on three priority goals requiring united action—tax reform that gives a fair deal to low-income Canadians; effective co-operation with new citizens' groups at local levels; and a greater Canadian role in world development. At a December meeting, a fourth priority goal was selected—united support of native peoples.

Further exploratory sessions were held in Montreal and Ottawa early this year. At the same time a bilingual task group was devising a flexible mode of operation for the proposed partnership, and was selecting possible action strategies on the four priority issues.

The bilingual Founding Forum for the Coalition was held in Ottawa on March 13. Representatives of more than 30 national organizations, plus several citizens' groups, approved a "Provisional Statement of Intentions" for the Coalition, endorsed action strategies for 1970 based on the four priority goals, chose a representative executive, and authorized the setting up of small action bureaux (MINUTES of the Founding Forum are included in the documentation).

Besides this Conference and Council (including most of the 11 denominations making up the Council), partners in the Coalition include the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, Canadian Council for International Co-operation, Canadian Labour Congress, Canadian Welfare Council, Catholic Organization for Development and Peace, Confederation des Syndicats Nationaux, Co-operative Union of Canada, Federation des Caisses Populaires Desjardins, and the National Indian Brotherhood. Prospective partners include the Canadian Association for Adult Education, Canadian Association of Social Workers, Canadian Jewish Congress, Canadian Metis Society, Indian-Eskimo Association of Canada, Mennonite Central Committee, and the National Farmers Union.

The Provisional Statement adopted at the Founding Forum describes the nature and spirit of this "experiment in Canadian pluralism". The Coalition functions as a working partnership of organizations "which meet on the common ground of shared human values" to carry out specific actions together. The partners make policy and take action through consensus—usually with the most competent partner in a given project taking the initiative and providing key resources. Partner organizations are free to "join in or opt out of any specific program, but not to interfere with the independence of the Coalition". Details of this open-ended style of joint operation are being worked out on the job.

As a kind of third force in the middle position between citizens and government, the Coalition will "strive to become a new lever for the elimination of poverty" and for the promotion of a better quality of life. Especially through public forums, and with the co-operation of the mass media, the Coalition plans to "offer new opportunities for more Canadians to participate directly in public dialogue and decision-making". This emphasis on participation is evident in the priority action strategies the founding Forum selected for 1970. As the MINUTES of the Founding Forum record, these include:

*Tax Reform: In the near future hold a national forum and "peoples' hearings" across Canada to recruit public support for various tax reforms of benefit to low-income Canadians... If a consensus is reached the Coalition will make a joint presentation to the federal government and Parliament.

*Citizens' Groups: At the local level, partner organizations are to urge their members to "plug in" with citizens' groups and help start community and regional coalitions. Nationally, the Coalition is ready to serve as one clearing house for information and resource material wanted by citizens' groups.

*Native People: Join with the National Indian Brotherhood and like organizations in their efforts to have a direct voice in federal-provincial policy-making on Indian-Eskimo-Metis affairs. Have the Coalition Executive make direct appeals to federal and provincial governments.

*World development: Take definite steps to mobilize public opinion in favor of a greater Canadian role in world development... Possibilities suggested: prepare a critical analysis of the Pearson Report, Partners in Development; organize a national forum on world aid and trade policies.

It remains for the partners to make the Coalition work. The united actions attempted and the public impact achieved will reveal whether this new partnership is an authentic social force. The Coalition will succeed in the measure that it brings more Canadians into the policy-making process, from which new priorities for building a just and compassionate society emerge. This in turn requires the formation of voluntary coalitions at local, provincial, and regional levels. An Alberta

Coalition for Development is already functioning. We understand local coalitions are in the process of formation or in prospect in several major cities.

3. FIRST PRIORITY:

SOCIAL POLICIES TO GUARANTEE BASIC RIGHTS

To return to the pre-eminent role of public authorities in the continuing process of social development: Canada has abundant resources, a viable economy, and technological know-how. Yet this nation still has a long way to go before it can call itself a Just Society in which people's well-being is given first priority. Existing priorities must be out of joint when as many as one-quarter of the citizens live near or below the "poverty line".

There is supporting evidence that public priorities are awry. For one thing, $1.8 billions is allocated annually for "national defence" while only about one-sixth of the amount is earmarked for the more positive works of development in the Third World. Domestically, based on estimated expenditures for 1969-70, the federal treasury is allocating 60 cents per capita for public housing subsidies, $13.59 for post-secondary education, and $29.12 for family and youth allowances, making a total of $43.31 per capita, compared to nearly twice as much, $86.22 per capita, for that "national defence" budget.

When basic human needs are given first place in federal spending, policies to guarantee fundamental economic and social rights will take priority alongside improved legislation to safeguard the civil rights of the powerless, and existing legislation which guarantees political freedom and bicultural rights.

We are aware that some federal spokesmen point to the difficulty of reaching a national consensus on economic and social rights. This difficulty is a challenge to leaders to lead Canadians towards such a consensus. How else can this nation begin to realize in practice what Canadian representatives accepted in principle when they assented to Article 25 of the 1948 United Nations General Assembly's Universal Declaration of Human Rights:

Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age, or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

To guarantee such basic rights, what do we favor in the way of economic and social policies? Rather than reiterate what has already been argued well, we record our substantial agreement with the comprehensive approach and most of the proposals found in the brief presented to you April 14 by the Board of Evangelism and Social Service, United Church of Canada. We respectfully recall to your attention certain specific recommendations:

(1) To meet an urgent immediate need, Parliament should amend the Old Age Security Act so as to allow regular increases in benefits which at very least will keep pace with actual cost-of-living increases. The Guaranteed Income Supplement also should be adjusted upwards. Why should senior citizens, who have contributed so much towards the building of Canada, be expected to bear a disproportionate burden in the struggle against inflation? Why should their pension benefits lag behind, especially when elected representatives in the other Chamber recently assured themselves of generous pension provisions?

This amounts to a shocking disparity of treatment. It would be intolerable if the present session were to adjourn without taking remedial action to ensure at least this measure of justice to senior citizens, who are among the most deserving and yet most vulnerable groups in Canada. Indeed, fairness demands parliamentary action to ensure that the pensions of senior Canadians keep pace with increases in national productivity.

(2) In this session Parliament should amend the unemployment insurance program in order to provide a wider range of coverage and increased benefits, so that recipients will not be pushed towards or over the "poverty line". Continuing inflation and relatively high levels of unemployment, particularly in some regions, demand action now.

(3) Concerning income-maintenance policies for the near future, we are in general accord with the position advocated April 14, including the proposal "that en route to a guaranteed income program for Canada, the federal government should consider a major improvement in family and youth allowance benefits", which would be treated as taxable income so as "to maximize the benefit to the poor and the 'near poor'... while also maximizing recovery ...from those who do not need them".

(4) We concur with the same brief—and also with our Coalition partner, the Canadian Welfare Council, in its submission June 4 to the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade & Commerce, that social policy and tax policy should be "harmonized". Positive social policy and fair taxation go together as two sides of one coin. How and in what amounts tax revenues are raised and how they are spent should be considered together.

Concerning taxation, we welcome the federal government's initiative in proposing reforms in its White Paper of November, 1969. How these proposals will affect lower-income Canadians, who now bear a disproportionate tax burden, should be a main focus of public and legislative attention. We also believe other tax reforms are required in federal, provincial and municipal levies. Nevertheless, bearing in mind the two sides of the coin, no matter how fair taxation may be it cannot be a substitute for social programs designed to guarantee basic human needs. In this regard, one of the main purposes of all tax reform should be to increase revenues for more public investment in the development of Canadians, Canada, and the global community.

A key question to be asked, therefore, is whether the revenues foreseen under the federal tax plan would provide an adequate share of funds for the development programs needed two or five years from now. In any attempt to answer this question, however, the proposed tax reforms should be examined alongside the promised White Paper on federal social policies. Unfortunately, this second White Paper (the so-called Willard report) has yet to be made public at this writing.

In the interim, we want to stress this: even if Parliament enacts more equitable tax measures, their effects could be largely negated if the collected revenues are used to finance public conveniences for the affluent (superhighways, airports) ahead of essential services for the deprived (income-maintenance programs, lower-cost housing, education opportunities).

This consideration brings us once again to the heart of the matter—the making of social policy and the setting of social priorities which "affirm persons".

Something other than a mere perpetuation of existing economic and social policies, with their escalating costs, is needed. "More of the same" will not suffice when poverty and pollution problems proliferate. We are more and more persuaded that new approaches, new priorities, new styles of design and delivery are essential in such fields as income maintenance, housing, education, urbanization, civil liberties and civil order, and ecology.

*We count on your Special Committee to bring forward creative and concrete recommendations that will initiate a new social policy for Canada.

*And to provide continuing analyses and renewed inspiration in policy-making, we believe there should be a Social Council of Canada of like status and purpose as the Economic Council.

*Also, we are confident that new social policies which effectively put people first will emerge more quickly as deprived citizens come to share actively in the process of policy-building. This will add the needed dimension of living experience to the expertise of the professional planners and legislators.

Here we repeat our conviction that the voluntary sector has an important role to play alongside public authorities. That is why the Canadian Coalition for Development is endeavoring to provide new opportunities for participation by more citizens, many of whom are still unorganized and therefore socially powerless.

Specifically, the Coalition is committed to "provide free forums to clarify issues, identify human needs, generate debate, and mobilize public will—in this way releasing creative energies for constructive social change".

4. THE QUESTION OF WILL

The resources and know-how are at hand to build a better Canada. However, efforts to narrow the economic gap between deprived and affluent citizens at home and abroad are seriously impeded by a persisting "attitudinal lag" on the part of many. The Interchurch Strategy Report of May, 1969 described this stubborn phenomena:

...At every level of society there exists social indifference and inertia on the part of the vast majority; poor communication, even between next-door neighbors; and worst of all, a deepening alienation between various "we" and "they" groups.

This alienation is almost total between the affluent and the deprived. They live in different worlds.

In short, there remains the need to rally sufficient moral determination and political courage to put human development first. On both the Canadian and world scene (as the Pearson Report, PARTNERS IN DEVELOPMENT, emphasizes) this question of will is of critical importance. In particular, short-sighted self interest on the part of the affluent denies to the deprived what is theirs by right. As Mrs. Coretta Scott King has said, "The lack of will power to help humanity is a sick and sinister form of violence."

This lack of social vision and courage poses a particular challenge to religious groups. If Christians are to make a distinctive contribution to the struggle for human betterment, surely it must begin here—at the level of personal conscience and social concern, while also finding expression at the level of institutional practice. The Interchurch Strategy Report of last May acknowledged this:

The church is called to be a gadfly, a radical questioner of the status quo—including its own social status; a voice of conscience which raises the gut issues, rebukes every injustice, challenges public opinion, and rallies the moral will...in the manner of the ancient prophets, Jesus Christ, and such modern martyrs as Martin Luther King, the Kennedys, and Camilo Torres.

We realize that so far many Canadian Christians have not responded to this call. Within our own communions, a collective renewal of conscience is urgently required. And in the wider community which reaches around the earth, we are challenged, together with other religious groups, to become once again "troublers in Israel".

Religious leaders recognize in this challenge a call to moral courage and public responsibility. We must show courage, saying what many within our own churches will find both dangerous and foolish because it is uncomfortable. And if we are authentic leaders, we will strive to bring many more Canadians into the struggle for a just and compassionate society.

In pursuit of such objectives the Council and the Conference are committed during the 1970s to promote four social strategies which are described in detail in the 1969 Interchurch Report. The four guidelines:

- *Review resources and revise priorities—ministry of penance
- *Commit more resources to development—ministry of sharing
- *Animate people—ministry of hope
- *Initiate political action—ministry of justice

One year after they were first proposed, we reaffirm our determination to press for the implementation of these guidelines, and to initiate or support other creative social strategies, such as the Coalition experiment already described. We do so in the belief that "the glory of God is man fully alive".

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, June 16, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this morning we have before us the Canadian Operational Research Society, and on my right is Mr. John R. Walter, President. He is Deputy Director, Health Sciences Functional Planning Unit, University of Toronto. He will tell us something about the Society and then he will speak to the brief.

Mr. John R. Walter, Deputy Director, Health Sciences Functional Planning Unit, University of Toronto; Canadian Operational Research Society: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, it is a great pleasure and honour for me to be here to be able to discuss with you the complex problems of poverty in Canada, and to have the opportunity to make whatever comments or suggestions our Society can make to help you in this task that you have undertaken.

At this stage let me introduce my two colleagues from the Society who are with me this morning. On my immediate right is Mr. John Gratwick, the immediate Past President, and whose decision it was, supported by the council of our Society to make a presentation to your committee. To his right is Mr. Don Kaye, who is a member of our Society from Ottawa, and who has been concerned about national policy problems in many areas including the social area, and who is the member of our Society who prepared our appendix III which deals with an illustrative comment on the guaranteed annual income section of our brief.

You all have copies of our brief which you will have read, perhaps, and I am very grateful to be here to summarize in the first few minutes of this meeting some of the observations, conclusions and recommendations contained in it. Then we will be most happy to answer any questions that any member of the committee may have to put to us concerning the points we have made, or to do anything else we may do to assist you.

At the start of our brief we have taken a few paragraphs to describe to you something about what our Society, the Canadian Operational Research Society, is. Most people when they hear that name believe we are a group of surgeons who are specialists in taking care of people in hospitals, and we often have to explain to people that that is not our field at all, although to some extent we are looking after very complex systems such as the human body, except that we are not looking after it from a medical viewpoint, but from the organizational operational viewpoint.

"Operational research" was first coined as a phrase at the start of the second world war when a group of people from many different scientific disciplines gathered together in Britain at the start of the war to do whatever they could in whatever way they could to try to analyse and assess how the limited resources available at the start of the war could be most effectively used to meet the challenges of the military situation. Interestingly enough, some of the key people to organize this group were Canadians, Harold Lander, Dr. Solandt who at the time were in England and who were among the first couple of dozen people in the world to begin to try to take a multi-disciplinary systems approach to study and assess what could be done to meet very serious problems.

Our Society in Canada is only 12 years old. The first Operational Research Society in the world, a group of people who were trying to take a systems approach to problems, at first in the military field and then in industry, was formed in the United States in 1953, which is only 17 years ago. So, we are a very new scientific field, as it were, and we are studying these complex systems of men-technology assisted by technology and machinery and studying their interactions from a scientific model point of view rather than from a purely social or qualitative point of view.

Our brief, following this introduction to assist you in knowing what our point of view is and what our approach is to the poverty problem, continues by saying that we would not attempt to define poverty, because you have had many, many definitions both from the Economic Council of Canada and others. Again, this is just one of the problems that you and others face, that there is a large number of definitions, all of them correct from the point of view of the people who have prepared them and are giving them. Some of these are quantitative definitions, others are qualitative.

Also it was obvious, from reviewing the briefs presented to you, particularly by various Government departments and agencies at the federal, provincial and local levels, that you had had complete and proper descriptions of the multitude of things that are available in what is currently called the welfare system. Also from other briefs it was obvious that the poor people of Canada sometimes are helped immeasurably by the current welfare system; that sometimes they seem to have to struggle against it to survive; and that more often than not they do not exactly know what exists. So, again, here we have not made any comments other than to state that there is a great deal of information on this that needs to be assessed.

To take a look at the recommendations that you have been presented with, we did a quick summary of the briefs we had available at the time. This is in paragraph 10 of our brief. From 48 of 67 briefs presented to you from November 3, 1969 to March 24, 1970, by just counting up the various areas and the recommendations that have been made, it is obvious that almost everyone who has talked to you has suggested more and better things to help the poor. Sometimes it is just "more"; sometimes it is just "better"; and sometimes it is "more and better", to put it in simple words: more and better education, more and better direct financial assistance. At least 50 per cent of these briefs and a great many people suggested this. These are just tallies looking down the specific tabled recommendations in these briefs and ticking them off—"This suggests something. This might suggest something."—and classifying these into various categories in the small table in paragraph 10.

There are countless other recommendations you have had. Again, this poses the problem of how you are going to sort this out and determine what the effect of accepting or suggesting any particular recommendation would be, but it seems obvious there is a great deal of concern about more and better action in this area.

As I said before, you have many facts and figures; you have a lot of inconsistencies. This is paragraph 11.

Paragraph 12. It seems from reading the briefs and also from listening to what you have said, the questions you have asked which are published in these briefs, that you have very little information on how to co-ordinate or combine all this evidence, how to judge what the effects of implementing any of these recommendations would be. I think the reason for this is that most of the people making submissions to you have a particular point of view or are involved in a particular aspect—an educational one, a health-care one—or are trying to assist in a particularly poor section in some city or rural area. Of course, with their knowledge, information and ideas, they are focusing on a particular problem and are saying, "This needs to be solved," but they do not have all the information and recommendations related to it for implementation.

In paragraph 13 we have noted, from the Economic Council, from many submissions made to you and from some of the statements some of you senators have made yourselves, that—to coin a modern phrase—a systems approach to poverty problems in Canada is important because there are many things that could be done, but unless you know or have some idea of what might happen in other areas, a great deal of expenditure of time and money will be fruitless because other things that have to be done along with this will not be done.

We have then gone into discussing the so-called systems approach as it might apply to the poverty problem. Our own society is probably the closest thing to professionals in the systems approach to problems, whether they be military or business, where the first applications were made by members of our society, or whether they are now in the areas of social or socio-economic policy, which is what your committee is struggling with, which seem to be the problems that are increasingly the concern of the public and of public servants.

In paragraphs 15, 16 and 17 we have just said that we would probably best illustrate the application of this systems approach by including in Appendix 2 about eight descriptions of examples of the systems approach, operational research, as used originally in industry and in some Government studies related to education, health care and areas such as water resource management.

We have also commented that much of this work is going on in various agencies and areas of Government.

I am jumping ahead a little, but it is obvious that a great deal of this work is fragmented and is done for particular reasons, not so much related to true needs of the Canadian people, but it is done for particular jurisdictional reasons in particular areas. We are no better at solving jurisdictional problems than anyone else, but we observe that this is a waste, and if there were only some way of getting the different people together in true multidisciplinary approaches to try to assemble information and solve some of these problems, a lot more could be done with a lot less expenditure of both money and, more important, the valuable time of people who are able to contribute to some of these suggested solutions and, more important, the time between the moment when people realize what should be done and the moment when action can really occur and where the objectives of whatever is attempted can be actually implemented. When you have jurisdictions and many people requiring scientific analysis of situations in six compartments, all meeting and clashing and then going back to reassemble it, it becomes a struggle between the jurisdictions rather than an actual attack on the problem. Again, this is an observation we have made. I'm afraid it does not help you decide how to remove this. I will not go deeply into all the examples that we have included. They are summarized as some of the possible applications or analogies, transfers of approaches, that have been used. Perhaps we could discuss them later.

Senator Hastings: Could you possibly give me a specific example on example (2), where operational research has been used in respect to the welfare operation?

Mr. Walter: I personally know of one that was not used. It was an excellent study done in particular relation to a particular welfare agency in a certain section of a certain province of Canada. This study was done by one of Canada's leading French Canadians, operational researchers, and as far as I know it was just fine. Mr. Gratwick is aware of it.

Mr. John Gratwick, Past-President, Canadian Operational Research Society: There is a small but specific example of the problem of learning. The problem of learning is usually to wait until someone writes about them so that you do not always waste contact with everybody.

Just recently there was a report of a study done in England on behalf of the church, the Church of England, for a very large northern diocese, which was running into the problem of reductions in attendance in a formal sense at church, increasing costs of church property, the shortage of trained clerical and lay staff for assistance to parishioners. They asked the university operational research group, at the University of Manchester, to examine the problem for them and in fact they did tackle this in the same sense as we talk about here, developing a model of the problem, looking at the people the church was trying to serve and the forms in which that service took, the locations of these people, the locations of the churches, the availability of trained help and assistance, and they tried to maximize the re-arrangement of the sources, so that in fact they could do the maximum good for the people who were requiring it. It was looked at almost a sort of transportation-distribution-location study in a geographic sense, to make sure that the help and people were in the right places as far as possible to match the people who required the assistance. This has been written up and I think it is now available in printed form and if it were of interest, I could obtain a copy. There have been very few, though, that have been reported; one of the reasons for this is, of course, as it was in this case, that it was not done as a professional paid job. It was done as a labour of love, if you like, by the group acting at the university on behalf of the church. This perhaps highlights one of the difficulties why there have been so few of these—there has not been anybody to buy the assistance that is required.

Senator Hastings: That has to do with the operation of a church. I am asking you for a specific example in relation to welfare.

Mr. Gratwick: It was also concerned with this sort of thing. The churches have a lot of personal activities which does include to some extent support of the needy and so on and it was a question of providing facilities for these people to have somewhere to go to meet and so on. So it did encompass the whole of the church's activities not just its normal Sunday services.

Senator Hastings: The theological work.

Mr. Gratwick: Yes, it covered more than the normal Sunday issue.

Mr. Walter: I would like to come back to follow up on Mr. Gratwick's comments. What I would like to do now is quickly cover the conclusions and the recommendations, perhaps reading these since they cover only three pages.

The Chairman: They will be printed in the record.

Mr. Walter: I will cover very quickly the main points that we have made, that new ideas and approaches on poverty are needed, but in addition to the new ideas, which are reasonably easy to come up with, that it is reasonably easy to suggest ideas but difficult to decide whether in fact they will work and just what will happen if and when they are put in operation.

New methodologies and analytic expertise are also needed to help deal with the problems of the poor in Canada, and your committee is aware of this. We believe this to be extremely important and unless a lot of thinking goes in and assessment of what might happen, many of the suggestions made will not be implemented.

The next point—and again this is something which your committee knows already and which we just reiterate—is that poverty in Canada takes many forms. And if it is assessed, it has many impacts and ultimately the only result will be that unless richer Canadians decide to help poorer Canadians nothing much is going to happen. There can be all sorts of statements but unless richer Canadians, defined in the true sense of richer, richer in spirit as well as richer in monetary and material goods, to help poorer Canadians, nothing is going to happen.

We realize that there are many problems of implementation and discussion between many different areas of interest. All we say is that our own group, people who are training, can help and would like to help.

The specific recommendations, of which there are five, can be summarized very quickly. The systems approach should be used in studying poverty problems because otherwise there will be many things that will prevent or will actually revert the whole process of helping the poor.

On recommendation 2, there must be emphasis, in whatever way it can be worked out, as acceptable to all of the people working on these fields, to get increasing use of true interdisciplinary teams that will tackle the problem and not just bouncing it back and forth between jurisdictions.

On recommendation 3, any recommendation for action on poverty which proposes greater use of limited resources should be fully evaluated and tested, using suitable cost/benefit analysis—we have been using the phrase “cost/benefit analysis” but “benefit analysis” and “cost analysis” could be used, if they have to be separated, or even one or the other.

It is important from our experience in working in many areas, that any recommendation that proceeds to attempt to be implemented without this sort of approach, in a very complex problem such as poverty is often deemed to failure or alternatively a very small return is made, as compared to what could be obtained if everybody knew what was going to happen and like it to happen, before the thing was done.

On recommendation 4, this is in the area mainly devoted to whatever you can do to make it easier for public-minded people, particularly in the universities, since they are not involved in the profit motive, to encourage and to assist people in universities—and these include some of today's students. I am at a university, and when I graduated from the university I was not as smart as some of the students are now back in Grade 9 and Grade 10 in high schools in many areas of this country and they seem to be fine, in a socially conscious area, and there should be some way of harnessing this capability of time and of interest to begin to provide what is most needed, which is the time of people to help study and solve the problems of the poor. I think there is a great contact source here which should be used.

On recommendation 5, this is not a recommendation to the country at large but to our own members. We exhort them, when they read this brief, to become more involved with the real social and political problems in our country and in the world, like poverty, particularly, in all their disorganized complexity. Then we exhort the Government and social planners and administrators to make a psychological commitment to this approach so that those of us who do wish to get involved and offer what we can, to solve these problems truly, can get involved with them and effectively carry them out.

Senator Pearson: My first question would be, do you think it is possible that we would ever eliminate poverty? In all of the studies we have had, there have been hundreds of different suggestions as to how to do it. Can you make any definite suggestion or give us any definite idea as to how to approach this poverty scheme so as to get rid of it.

Mr. Gratwick: One comment about this, senator, is that probably as long as there are going to be differences between peoples, in both their way of life and perhaps in their material possessions, difference that are recognizable to the whole system, if in fact you take one end of this scale of difference and label it “poverty”, as opposed to “richness” or the dimension, it is probably that we shall never get rid of it, because all that would happen is that you are moving in a relative sense. So, perhaps it comes back to what we mean by our definition in that sense. If we sort of wanted to recognize differences, and we use that word to recognize some differences, we shall never eliminate it. We shall change its character over time, and perhaps change the proportion of people who fall into this category, but I do not think we can ever eliminate it, by definition.

Senator Pearson: We all know that disease, misadventure, and poor decisions are what cause a great many of these people to get down to that level of poverty. The question is one of how we are going to eliminate those things.

Mr. G. D. Kaye, Senior Operational Research Scientist, Defence Research Analysis Establishment: I think again this is something that you cannot eliminate, but these are what one might call, I think, random occasions of poverty—things that do not occur very often.

Senator Pearson: Do they not occur very often? I think that in the cities this sort of thing occurs all the time.

Mr. Kaye: I distinguish group poverty—a large number of people who are perhaps less well paid or not paid at all but are in much the same circumstances, which are of the kind that you can level up generally. But, on top of that there are things like illness and other problems which you cannot foresee, and, therefore, you cannot have any regular scheme to deal with them. You will not eliminate them, but what you can do is deal with them perhaps more on an insurance basis or possibly you can still leave something for the charitable organizations to deal with.

Mr. Walter: I think that poverty, in the only sense that it can be defined, can be eliminated in the long run in an ideal society that is highly productive and well organized. But, such occurrences as the death of a father, where the mother does not have a job and the income stops, cannot be eliminated unless we achieve perfect health, or until society just automatically sends the cheque in, or we get back to a barter system. But in a perfectly organized society, and this is what we should always be striving for, the system should be set up so that as soon as this occurs the link-up is made with the section of society that will provide the assistance needed. A family becomes poor, and it is three generations later when by luck, you know, something happens and they get back to where they themselves believe they are making a contribution to society as a whole on their own terms, and when they feel they are back in the system.

Senator Pearson: Would you suggest that we should have an organization something like your own to make a model of some type of organization that would take care of this? How would we get the richer Canadian involved in this sort of affair. Everyone is so busy with his own particular business, enjoying himself, and looking after his family, he has no time for this sort of thing. How do you get him involved in this through an organization of some sort?

Mr. Gratwick: The Government, or whoever it is taking on the responsibility, has to examine what sorts of attractions there are for the richer Canadians to participate or to become involved or, in fact, to give up some of what they have in order to solve this problem. I guess this falls into two forms. If, in fact, it could be demonstrated, and it was believed, that everybody would benefit in the long run—in other words, that the whole level of society could be raised—then it could be made attractive to the richer people who apparently do not need anything, but who if they felt that the whole thing was being raised would find it attractive.

The second thing is if, in fact, it is a redistribution, so that the rich person has to be a little less rich in order that somebody may be a little less poor then obviously money is not an incentive because you are talking about taking it away, and you have to look for other things that people will find attractive.

In the past, we have used emotional and religious incentives to cause people to give up some of their wealth. Perhaps it has been a form of moral blackmail in some cases, but it has been effective. On the other hand, one has to see if one can encourage some sort of emotional commitment which is attractive to people, because people can take up causes and obtain a great deal of satisfaction from them. Perhaps we shall have to consciously look for the ones that will be attractive to people at this time. I do not think that some of the old ones are attractive any longer.

Senator Pearson: You say in your first recommendation that the systems approach, and operational research, should be used in formulating new policies. Would it be your idea that we should eliminate all of our present welfare ideas and such like, and concentrate on one type?

Mr. Gratwick: I do not think one would say automatically: "Let us eliminate what we have." I think it is vital to identify what we have and to establish the interrelationships of what we have, in order to see what the total model of the situation looks like. We should then examine it to see where both the gaps and the duplications are, or where the aims or objectives of certain parts of these activities are perhaps not aligned with the basic objective as you are going to define it. The thing to do is to look at the resources you are employing at the moment, or at the activities that are going on, and not necessarily to eliminate them and replace them with something new, but to see whether they do fit within some logical construct at all—and it does not have to be a perfect fit.

Senator Pearson: But in the meantime we are not eliminating poverty at all?

Mr. Gratwick: No, in fact, we are doing the opposite.

Mr. Walter: Nobody will eliminate poverty by next January or, indeed, by January, 1975. You have taken the first step by establishing this committee and hearing five million words on the subject. That is the estimate I arrived at by taking a ruler and measuring the depth of the various submissions. There may be a great pile of other things that I was not able to measure, so perhaps there are 15 million words. In any case, you have started by gradually assembling a welter of information, much of which may not be true—and that is always a problem. That is the first step. Then you have got to try to look at some of these and identify, to use our old phraseology, a few of the bottlenecks that seem to be sufficiently commented upon across Canada by people right down where it hurts, as we all know, as well as by intelligent people at every level, so that you have got enough points of view that agree to put together a team that includes all of the elements, and then you can attack this one and that one, and at the same time, I think, you have to be looking to the year 2000. Our society is pretty rich right now, and my personal feeling is that next year, if you take all the riches that the rich people have and pretend that you are going to give them to the poor, then the rich people will go to another country, or will find a way to work around the rules and stay rich, but if you aim 50 years from now at a profile in which there is less of a distance between the richest person and the poorest person, then that is the answer.

The short-run things are to look for the bottlenecks, and you have begun to look at them, and I am sure that in your recommendations you will hit some.

Senator Carter: Mr. Walter, your research association has grown in twelve years to 800 members. How many disciplines are represented?

Mr. Walter: You name one, and we probably have it.

Senator Carter: All disciplines?

Mr. Walter: There are lawyers and doctors who are members of our association. It is the systems approach to points of view that is the common threads that links our members. They are not by any means equally represented in proportion to their existence in the country.

Senator Carter: You mention forecast behaviour under certain conditions. Do you take into account factors that could change behaviour?

Mr. Kaye: This is always implicit in a problem. One of the definitions of operation in this area says operation of complex systems within their environment. Environment always has some influence on the behaviour of the individual.

Although one might say that the environment is more complex than the system being studied, nevertheless there are certain changes in it which can be studied with regard to their effect on the operation. I do not imply that all the possible influences of the environment on behaviour systems can be studied, but the more important ones can be selected.

Mr. Gratwick: If your reference is to individual behaviour as opposed to the behaviour of an organizational system, certainly we are concerned about this. We attempt as far as possible not only to identify the elements that might cause changes in behaviour but to recognize changes that we might consider beneficial to an operation.

I can think of this much more clearly in terms of industrial environment, where a large number of the studies have been primarily concerned with, in fact getting people to behave differently than they did in the past in the work environment.

Senator Carter: Are you familiar with the work being carried out in Heidelberg, Germany, in operational research systems?

Mr. Gratwick: Not unless it is some specific area that would ring a bell.

Mr. Walter: The name Heidelberg does not ring a bell. Perhaps you can help us?

Senator Carter: With respect to changing behaviour and the factors that might influence it, I am interested in your analysis in paragraph 10. There you analyse 48 briefs and find that 32 of them specifically recommend more and better education, direct financial assistance, social community and supportive services, and health care.

With your systems approach could you determine what impact previous briefs have had on those presented subsequently? In other words, to what extent do submissions repeat what has already become apparent in previous briefs?

Mr. Walter: Yes, we could analyse these numbers, I will write you something on this.

Mr. Gratwick: It is a perfectly feasible operation. There might be sufficient quantity here to arrive at some identification by looking at the increasing degree of correlation between the points raised.

The growth of fresh ideas is one measure. If no fresh ideas are added, perhaps—people are copying.

Senator Carter: Could the same type of analysis be applied to replies to various points raised in committee, where there is not time to think up a stock answer?

Mr. Walter: That would be very interesting. How long are you giving us?

The Chairman: How long do you need?

Mr. Gratwick: It depends on how many questions there are. It is slightly more diffuse than the first question. However, if one could develop something for the categories on the same principle it should be possible to do something.

Mr. Walter: We could illustrate what might be the hypothesis to investigate whether there appears to be more dispersion amongst the impromptu answers than amongst the initial recommendations.

This may reflect what people are really like, which you probably have already personally assessed.

With respect to the behaviour aspect, I have to speak from studies I know. The one I am involved in now is co-ordinating information and the behaviour of students, faculty and administrators in medical schools and in hospitals where young doctors train.

We make sure that we talk to people at every level in this system and are prepared, if people have an idea that they think themselves works, to make our models so that they can analyse what these people want.

We do not waste time, but use the time of the analysis to educate people to the implications of what their own behaviour ideas and patterns suggest.

We also make sure in any results that we produce or help that we give that the behaviour patterns of the people who will use the tools are taken into account in designing them. If we are going to have a man fly an airplane we do not design it as if there were no pilot. Although it is not done perfectly, things must be designed to help.

The Chairman: I am intrigued by your answer. Would you mind taking two minutes to explain to us the behaviour of students?

Mr. Walter: Which students?

The Chairman: Take a university.

Mr. Walter: The students who become involved in the work our unit does include medical, engineering, business school, political science and economics students. Is that range good enough?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Walter: I do not know about the history or the Far East Asian studies students. We do not see much of them. Maybe I am easy to please, but I am impressed with the knowledge of facts, figures and ideas. In my personal opinion I believe that this has been created in the main by television. Most of the students at university have watched television since they were three years of age. They have been bombarded with more facts and figures about the world than any of you or us ever were. Therefore they are far ahead of us in terms of appreciation of what is going on, although it is filtered by the media to some extent.

I always like to make comparisons between now and when you and I went to university. Today's university student will not be outer directed. He himself knows what he wants to learn and has an idea of what he is trying to add to his total experience. Whether it is medicine, engineering, political science, economics or business school, the student wants to ask particular searching questions of his faculty. They do not like lectures, none of them, because, as you commented, in a lecture they are getting the same points over and over again; they read those last week if they were interested in them and they do not want to hear them any more. They want to add to their knowledge and get more experience out of life. They prefer real cases, real studies, real things.

In our work in health sciences we offer students positions they can take up during the summer, or hook up for thesis work. We offer them things that have to be done, which are pretty dry, like making a beautiful computer model; or as whether they would like to get involved with a team that talks to patients, or to students in other disciplines to try to find out what they would like. We are continually building curricula that students themselves would like. Invariably we have to staff the dull work with our own full time people. The students themselves want to get out and be involved with others, to use the facts and figures that they have learned and help others, and I believe that to be true. The 5 per cent who throw rocks or break windows are the 5 per cent existing in our society, whether among doctors who are supposed to practice but do not, or lawyers who are supposed to help society but do not, or businessmen who are always the "nasty" ones who fail the Better Business Bureau standards and get the headlines; but 95 per cent of people in every field, including students, are sincere.

Senator Inman: How do you think students got that way? I think when we were young we all felt that way but we did not have the nerve to go ahead with it.

Mr. Walter: How do I think students got that way? That is a good question. I have just emptied my brain. John, can you help?

Mr. Gratwick: Part of this, I think, is the fact that we have all got that way a bit. It is not just students. Society has got that way in the sense that I think you are using it. There has been a change in the general attitudes of people, not only to society itself, but towards each other. This has certainly changed the so-called authority relationships that may have existed in either a parental sense or a school-teacher sense.

What is happening, certainly in universities now, in my appreciation, compared with my own time, is that straight away there is an entirely different relationship between faculty and students; they are much closer together, but I do not think it is because one has moved and the other one has stayed still; I think they have both moved towards each other. There is no longer the more formal attitude towards somebody who is, as it were, "up there". They may still be a great deal of respect, but it is respect with an entirely different flavour from the one I can remember, which is perhaps the one we are trying to reflect. However, I do not think this is just students; I think it is happening all across society.

The Chairman: May I have Mr. Kaye's answer to this? I am very interested.

Mr. Kaye: I do not think I can add very much, except to follow the line taken by Mr. Gratwick. I think it is almost impossible to hide anything any more. You no longer assume that somebody is so much wiser and better than you are, because you know so much about him. The other thing is perhaps the increasing pressures of today's society, the greater competition arising from the greater number of people, which makes it more difficult to get the opportunity to do what you want to do. Perhaps there is the feeling that we know so much more about society, that there are so many more things to do than could be done in the past, but the difficulty of getting to do them is greater. Perhaps this makes people more ready to fight to do what they want to do than they ever were before.

Senator Carter: I should like to go back to where we left off.

The Chairman: I am sorry we broke into you questioning, but we thought it was important.

Senator Carter: We were talking about the models. Could a model be constructed to evaluate the effectiveness of, say, family allowances versus guaranteed income?

Mr. Kaye: Yes, I am sure it could. However, I would point out a difficulty. We often use a model because we have not got the full information we want to have. One thing we do get fairly up to date information about is average income, which is why I used that model as an example. If you want to go beyond that to the distribution of family income, the best you can do is to go back to 1960 and use data obtained from the census. It is always possible to make models of this kind, but not having the information you want, to get your answer from the model you may have to wait a long time before you can collect it, so perhaps you cannot do it straight away. If you are lucky you can perhaps use 10-year old information, by fitting it into a model predict where those figures would be today and use them. This can often be a satisfactory method

However, I think it would be correct to say that in most cases there is no difficulty in constructing models. The major difficulty is in getting information from which to make the models useful.

Senator Carter: In one of your recommendations you make an assessment and say that without changing the present rate of taxation we could pay from $500 to $1,000 a head guaranteed income, which is a mighty big spread. Where do you get those figures? Are they based on calculations? How do you arrive at that?

Mr. Kaye: This again is one of these models which you think up because you have not got the exact information. Essentially it assumes a distribution of income which by comparison with figures in the past looks something of the right kind of distribution that you need to do this. Once you know a distribution of income you can make all these kinds of calculations on that. It is, in fact, a few fairly simple mathematical formulae which do this. What the formulae do not do, however, is say what a reasonable amount of taxation is, and I must admit that this was more or less my guess, that people would not disagree too much with rates of taxation something of the order that they are nowadays, perhaps 15 per cent to 30 or 40 per cent of income. This again was income in excess of the basic minimum; it is not all income.

The Chairman: I did not hear you correctly. Senator Carter was speaking about $500 or $1,000. You say that this is in excess of the basic minimum now received by the people. Do I understand you correctly?

Mr. Kaye: What I am saying is that if you consider the income which people have now of $1,000 or less and take money away from the people who are receiving more and give it to these people so as to bring them up to $1,000, that degree of redistribution would require a taxation somewhere in the neighbourhood of 30 per cent. In choosing these $500 to $1,000 I was not intending to imply that there was anything magic about it. This is the dimension needed to survive. I was really looking mechanically at what the effect of the redistribution would have and its equivalent in the taxation area.

The Chairman: I do not understand you. Are you saying $1,000 per family or $1,000 per person?

Mr. Kaye: One thousand dollars per person.

The Chairman: All right.

Mr. Kaye: This is not the way you would like to have it and I realize this. The reason for this is that it is the easiest one to get at and you can use the more recent figures.

The Chairman: I now understand what you are saying.

Senator Carter: You deal with systems, and in Canada we are spending about $6 billion on welfare and about $4 billion of that for federal, and the rest goes for provincial and municipal expenses. You have three systems: municipal, provincial, and the overall federal system. Could a model be constructed showing how these systems could be better related to each other?

Mr. Walter: I think the answer is yes. After you have constructed a model you must get the people who have the information and are prepared to give it to the model builders. Technically there is no problem to constructing such a model. There are large enough computers which can store all the information needed by every municipal, provincial and federal agency. There are enough operations and research people to construct the little sections of the model, working with each person. The model itself can be done. How this model can be used to help people making the decisions is a more difficult problem.

Senator Carter: It would depend on how the relationship between a system showed up in the model, would it not?

Mr. Walter: That is right.

Senator Carter: You would have to work out a better relationship between them.

Mr. Walter: Yes. I do not think there is any technical problem. It cannot be done within a week, or by one man working evenings and weekends.

Senator Carter: Do you think that is something which should be done? Let us put it this way, it is something which must be done before we can really have a good overall view of what is going on?

Mr. Walter: I think so. Personally, I feel this is where you start.

Senator Carter: Have computers helped your work?

Mr. Walter: Immeasurably. Computers do all the dull work.

Senator Carter: Would that shorten the period required?

Mr. Walter: If you had asked this question before today's generation of computers I would have said that technically it was impossible, at least that it was too difficult to carry out the calculations, but with today's computers there is no problem.

Mr. Gratwick: It has been a comparatively short time span but it has been possible to say this. You could have conceded to the idea, but you could not have physically handled it before.

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, I found this a very interesting brief. There are many questions I would like to ask, but I shall only ask a few. In regard to example 4, why do you think administration and others say that the time has not yet come to use policy planning for poverty, if policy planning is effective in the uranium industry?

Mr. Walter: That particular point was only to cover the range of administration. Some are making effective use of this sort of approach to gather all the information to really assess what might happen. In every field many people are leary about a new tool. There are examples—of course we are aware of them—where good work is being done. It is then filed away because someone at the administrative level feels it should be because the time has come, whatever that means. I think that year after year the segment of people who are running things is reducing and there are more and more approaches being used to help.

Senator Inman: In regard to paragraph 31 of recommendation 2, how do you go about getting the poor to study poverty problems? What sort of program would you suggest?

Mr. Walter: I will speak briefly to this and then my colleagues will comment. I am a great one in drawing analogies because I think you speak better about the things you are involved in. I speak again from the sort of work which I am doing within the educational system. You ask a student to come in and start talking and a discussion develops. Within a matter of weeks or months there develops an understanding of what is happening and the student becomes involved and a member of this team.

I was at a very interesting session regarding urban problems as related to the poor. On the panel they had a couple of militant Negro leaders. They said that if you want to do a study in a city, the most important thing which the analyst should know is how to play pool because when he can go into the pool hall and play with the rest of team. After a couple of weeks the conversation will start and within two months the analyst will be in the information centre. I think this is true in a great many areas of Canada, especially the rural areas. We must find out where the information centres are and then send a person who is sensitive to this sort of thing and is a member of the interdisciplinary team. Again this can include universities students who are interested in these problems.

The Chairman: When we started this mission of ours we attempted to involve students at all university levels. We went to every university but we just could not get a response. Why?

Mr. Walter: Whom did you talk to?

The Chairman: To the students. We sent our young staff members, good personalities and who knew students, to talk to them. They asked them to speak out and become involved in this problem, but we could not get any response. There would not be enough sex appeal in it. Pollution was more attractive to them, or other things that I am not going to talk about now. Why is it more attractive?

Senator Pearson: The students have no poverty in them.

Senator McGrand: We met the militant students in Halifax and Vancouver.

The Chairman: Yes, but we did not get the university groups.

Senator McGrand: We got the militant groups.

The Chairman: We did not even get them, except the fringe.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Walter is only representative of five per cent.

The Chairman: Well, even less than that. We had some orders in Prince Edward Island and some in British Columbia. We went to all the universities and thought we would get them involved.

Senator Inman: In paragraph 12 you suggest that there is very little information on how to co-ordinate and combine all the evidence or how to implement many of the recommendations, and assess the implications. How would you suggest this problem be tackled?

Mr. Walter: Mr. Chairman, you have made the first step, you have brought up a lot of information in this committee, for whatever recommendations you make, whether it be the setting up of a special group, an inter-disciplinary team, with representatives from many areas, to attempt to gather this information together in a way so that you can test whether certain recommendations are compatible, what their economic effects would be, what the true effects would be. I would think this is your next step, to get together a group—and I keep calling it an interdisciplinary or multidisciplinary team—of people who are experienced in combining information and in developing models, along with people who can interpret conclusions. I think this is the next step and that if your committee makes recommendations that will then go for action to particular places, you need the intermediary step of combining this information.

Senator Inman: In paragraph 26, where you speak of drawing conclusions as to how poverty could be eradicated, would you please discuss how poverty could be eradicated without some major redistribution of income? Would your society see anything more than a guaranteed income concept? Please explain what you mean by saying that it is probably easier to provide income than to provide work? How would you provide income without work? Someone must do the work. It looks like being a question of what comes first, the chicken or the egg?

Mr. Kaye: That may have been a rather unwise statement, but what I really meant was that it was more difficult to create new work than provide income. You can create work by redistributing work, in just the same way as you redistribute income. You could cut the work week to three days and perhaps not double the number of jobs but make many more jobs. I suppose it is easy to do in theory, perhaps it is not easy to do, to win social acceptance. People always fear that if you do cut down the work week the rewards will be cut accordingly. There has been less interest in creating work in that way than one might have expected. When I made that remark, I was really thinking about creating new work, and we know how difficult that is.

Senator Inman: In Appendix 1, paragraphs 7, 8 and 9, are you suggesting here that individual organizations could work better as one unit in solving the problem of poverty, rather than all to come together where perhaps there might be more differences or divergences of opinion?

Mr. Walter: Yes. In the ideal, yes. Whether you can actually persuade all the different groups to get together really to solve this, that is a problem. But if they would, I am sure that you would reach meaningful and useful recommendations, much sooner and much better. In essence, if a lot of the problems and differences of viewpoint were talked out in this room and had all of these people represented, instead of being continually in the public eye by this group making a recommendation which is picked up and banged against one by another group and causes friction—if all could work together, there is no question it would be better.

Senator McGrand: Most witnesses have appeared before us with recommendations suggesting better education and more technical training, in order to get full employment. How do you forecast poverty in the future? You realize that with improved technology less and less people will be employed in industry. If everybody were trained technically, it is only the more competent who will get the jobs.

Mr. Walter: To tie in that question, let us call it the process of education and training, with the process of jobs and interrelate these. My feeling is that people will learn longer and spend more of their time learning about the good life and spending time on how to live it. And that the hours that they used to spend with the hammer and the wrench will be transferred to letting people enjoy what our society provides. I think that is how you would tie the thing together.

Senator McGrand: How do you provide the money for the less competent, that is what I am thinking of? I am not worried about the more competent, but about the less competent who cannot get a job and has a hard time trying to understand the difference in leisure and idleness.

Mr. Kaye: I do not know if I can suggest any answer to this. It is certainly a problem which is becoming more and more apparent. You could do some kind of forecasting as to how fast this was increasing. It is my impression that there has been very little attempt to solve it by trying to correlate education with the needs of possible jobs. Perhaps that is not really the end of education, anyway.

Senator McGrand: I have got the message.

Mr. Gratwick: There is one brief point on that. Perhaps we put too much emphasis on certain types of competence. When you use the expression "the less competent" that is judged probably in the comparatively narrow field of what we are looking at as competence of the moment. What we tend to do is to let our technology and our society insist on what it wants from people. For instance, what we should say is, what other sort of competences do other people have, and let us encourage an environment which gives that some room for manoeuvre and some room for use. Most people have a competence in some direction, if you can find it.

Senator McGrand: I agree. It is evident that poverty in certain areas is due to the underdevelopment or the poor development of the resources in that area. Nothing has been said before our committee about the development of the mid-Canada corridor. We hear a lot about it. How do you view the development of this mid-Canada corridor, taking into consideration the poverty now and the future of our native people?

Mr. Gratwick: I think, if I could start on that, with the concept of the mid-Canada corridor which is obviously to open up a large fresh area of both natural resources and, by implication, activities for more people, the great difficulty is that you can recognize this as it exists in the physical terms in which it is measured. Again, I think it is one of the things that you have to be very careful in measuring when its time comes—and we are back to that expression again—because if it battles right from the beginning against all the complex and classic economic difficulties it will have—if labour is more expensive and extraction is more expensive in the places that are already available and are not yet exhausted, then under our present system, it has too many strikes against it. I think you need to have that one ready to go perhaps just a little bit before its time really comes.

Senator McGrand: We are not ready for it yet?

Mr. Gratwick: We are not ready for it yet.

Senator McGrand: How do you proceed to harness the involvement and the interest of students who are ready to change the structures of our society? Are some of the disciplines involved in your organization prepared to encourage and engage students, and has any program emerged as far as your group and the students that you think wish to change the structure of society are concerned?

Mr. Walter: I would say there are different individuals in our society who through their association with universities are beginning, and it is just within the last five years that the various disciplines involved in our approach to problem-solving are sufficiently established within the university structures to permit this. And I can say on behalf of our own Society, provided the Council agrees, and I think it will, based on the meeting we had three weeks ago at our annual meeting, that we are beginning to implement places in universities from coast to coast where there will be students interested in carrying out educational theses and things like this. So, ask this question five years from now and I will give you many examples and an official position.

Senator McGrand: When this occurs will this problem of what is competence be included?

Mr. Walter: It will be included.

Senator Fergusson: One of the problems this committee is faced with, and on which we try to make some decision, is how to make richer Canadians feel there is need to help the poorer Canadians. You refer to that in paragraph 28. There you say:

The success of most of them will depend on the willingness of "richer Canadians" to help "poorer Canadians", and to transfer some of their present and future riches so that the "poor" can help themselves.

I was very much interested in what Mr. Walter said about students. He certainly sounded most optimistic about students.

Mr. Walter: That is one of my failings—I am always optimistic.

Senator Fergusson: Well it is good to come across somebody who is optimistic; we have too many people coming before the committee who are pessimistic. But you say that 75 per cent are interested in others and desire to help others. If this is the case, would you not think that we might hope to have better conditions and a cutting-down of the gap between the richer and the poorer in a much shorter time than the 50 years you mentioned. You were not too optimistic about that. Would it not be reasonable, if we can make people understand the need for this, to hope to cut down the gap even before 1975 which is another date you mention?

Mr. Walter: I agree. I think the job that your committee does and is doing is to interest people, and the best job that people in universities can do is to make sure that there is publicity about what is happening.

Senator Fergusson: Surely such a large number of students going through college have the feeling that all it needs is that this should be disseminated across the country.

Mr. Walter: Well, here there is a bit of a generation gap. You know, there is a lot more in the news than actually exists. It is a problem of getting this disseminated to the richer people.

Senator Hastings: Is there a credibility gap between the system and the students?

Mr. Gratwick: Inasmuch as there is perhaps a revulsion from and a rejection of existing structures and systems. Part of the answer to this comes back to Senator Fergusson's point. I think there is a genuine indication that there is a turning-away from the acquisition of material possessions as a measure of both life and status. Now how long this will last is another question and whether, in fact, it is based sufficiently broadly to solve some of our problems of disparity by not moving up the lower end but by moving down the higher end, which is just as effective—if we can cut out the top end because nobody wants to be there any more, then we have tended to solve our distribution problem. Maybe this is enough to help in the time-scale you are talking about.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Walter has told us that he has contact with students, but could anybody say whether this feeling of wanting to help people is also to be found in other young people in this same age group?

Mr. Gratwick: There is some flavour of the same attitude if you go right to the other end of the scale. That is again making a value judgment; but if you look at the drop-out end, there is some similarity in the approach to the point of rejecting the existing structures and looking very much towards the individual and what the individual requires and what the individual needs to feel that he is an individual. This flavour seems to be common to both extremities.

Mr. Walter: May I add one quick question? Stepping back five years to the students we have now—and I am speaking from Ontario experience where the educational system is universal because everybody goes to high school, at least to grades 9 and 10—and this feeling I have interpreted from talking to students and seeing and listening to them—the feeling that I have expressed about universities is amplified, if you step back to those students who are now in the previous level of education and who will either end up by going to universities or going out and getting involved. So there is no doubt in my mind that the feeling is ingrained far earlier among the young people at every level.

Senator Fergusson: We still have a lot of people who do not accept this in Canada.

Mr. Walter: Accept this philosophy?

Senator Fergusson: Yes.

Mr. Walter: Well, I think there are a lot of people who do not accept it. Maybe I am wrong, but I do not think so.

Senator Fergusson: I am thinking of the people we run into and with whom we discuss our committee work, for example. They will say to you "it is not necessary", and they do not believe it.

Mr. Walter: In some cases it takes longer because people are too involved in certain areas to realize how the world is changing.

Senator Fergusson: Coming to my next question, in Appendix III you have a list of human rights which does not seem to follow what one usually hears about as human rights or as coming from the Charter on Human Rights. Now, I am not questioning these, but I am wondering where you get them.

Mr. Kaye: I suppose I just tried to think of any rights that really impinged on the economic situation, and picked out these to give a sort of scale from just surviving to looking after people reasonably well. I think the whole survey was rather superficial, and if I had thought a bit longer I am sure there are others I would have had, like the right to privacy and so on which are perhaps equally important from the other point of view.

Senator Carter: Could I ask a supplementary here, Mr. Chairman? Are we placing too much emphasis on rights and not enough on responsibility?

Mr. Kaye: Perhaps one should mention responsibility as well. I think I would almost say that people understand their responsibilities a good deal better than they understand their rights.

Senator Carter: Responsibilities do not have as much sex appeal.

Mr. Walter: They are not as exciting. My feeling is—and this is only from personal experience—that when you find people who talk about their rights and you sit down and reason together, within a very short period of time the relationship between responsibilities and rights, in the case of a high proportion of the population, whether they are students or adults, comes into focus; or the person you are talking to dissolves and slides out under the door, because he came in only to make news and not to approach problems. When you sit right down and start talking about how these things inter-relate, you quickly find that differences dissolve and you get down to the facts. That has been my experience.

The Chairman: I will ask a question, and you can all take a crack at it. The sum and substance of your talk, in addition to the technical and very interesting part of it, is that we need redistribution. There has been no redistribution between the rich and poor in this country since 1952. Those are the facts. What is there in the future that gives us that confidence and that optimism to make us feel that this situation will change; or, what is there we can do to make it change?

Mr. Gratwick: Perhaps you could tackle it two ways. If, in fact, the information is correct, it would appear that probably, in the numbers sense, there is a majority of people for whom this will not only be a direct advantage but for whom the age is so close that it would appear to be a protective advantage. Therefore, in a democratic sense, one can argue that if more than half the people want it, then that is the way we should go. One could also add to that and say there must also be a proportion of people who can find something which is satisfying enough to themselves, in terms of their values systems, who want some part of this to happen. Maybe the two together will only make up 75 per cent of the population, but perhaps that is enough to indicate that it will happen.

The Chairman: But where have these people been for the last 20 years, during which period this situation has increased in intensity? The four million poverty-stricken did not come to us overnight. They arose in the midst of our greatest prosperity. Where were these people?

Mr. Gratwick: Is not part of this the information gap, the realization or knowledge of these things happening? It is very easy to ignore these things if one does not know about them. If, in fact, knowledge and greater understanding of both society and the situation of people in that society are gradually known—I think it has to come gradually, it has to sink in and people have to adjust their own ideas to accommodate this information. This takes time, and I think this is the process that is in fact going on. I think this committee is part of that process.

The Chairman: Yes, but do you mean to say that people in Canada, realizing the relief lines were growing, did not realize that that was poverty and that they should be concerned?

Mr. Gratwick: There seems to me a big time difference between the immediate acquisition of factual information of that sort and getting it into your own system, somehow regurgitating it and making it come out with a line on policy for yourself of how you want to behave. I think it is exactly the same thing as we have in the case of road accidents. We have no shortage of information about how many people we manage to kill every week-end. That is "interesting" and we watch the box scores, but we are really not concerned about it. I think it is going to take another 10 years before we really get to grips with that one. There is a long time lag in people's adjustment to information, to turn it right around into action.

The Chairman: So far as an automobile accident is concerned, sure, we feel badly about it and regret it but we say, "It's his own fault," and . . .

Mr. Gratwick: And we say exactly the same thing about poverty.

The Chairman: I thought you would say that. We say exactly the same thing about the poor—"It is their own bloody fault."

Mr. Gratwick: Yes—"It has nothing to do with me."

The Chairman: We are grown people and we have been around for some time. This is not a new thing this happened immediately after the great depression days. What are we doing about it? Where was our awareness or concern over that period of time?

Mr. Gratwick: Well, I will stick my neck out again! I think what you also have to look at over that period of time is the fact that this was not necessarily seen either as a definitely bad thing, nor was it seen as an escapable thing, because an awful lot of our basic philosophy rather indicated and, if you look back, we have a religious tradition which tells us that poverty is the right thing to have.

The Chairman: Oh no.

Mr. Gratwick: Well, almost—the most virtuous thing to have.

The Chairman: I do not even go that far.

Mr. Gratwick: Well, there is a flavour of this, and I think people have acquired something of this. This is what we are talking about changing, and this is why I say it takes time.

Senator Hastings: You said there has been a change of attitude.

Mr. Gratwick: I think there has. I think this is what requires the time scale. I firmly believe there is some sign of change. I think I recognize it.

Senator Hastings: Could you tell me of some sign you see?

Senator Pearson: I do not think there is any change at all in the mass.

Senator Hastings: If you read the briefs to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, there is not much change.

Mr. Walter: I keep drawing analogies. It is the information and communication system of our society that is increasing exponentially, just as there have always been gigantic stars out in the universe that nobody on this earth knew about until we got telescopes and radio-telescopes that brought them into view, when we became amazed at these new things and started to think about them. Alternatively, there are all sorts of giant icebergs whose tips only appear above the surface, and before you had this fellow at the top of the mast and ships ran into them. But now we have information and communication systems which can see these gigantic things and we realize how gigantic they are. We are getting more involved. The fact that a number of people are making submissions to you means that we are involved. I guess I meet different students in universities than you do. The point is I do not meet them just once; I get to know them.

The Chairman: I am no expert on that.

Mr. Walter: That is a very small segment, and I meet children in high school and get to know them. People feel one another out the first time or two, but underneath there is a real social awareness coming out of our young people and many other people. It is just a matter of spending enough time talking about it.

Senator Hastings: I do not think we have the time.

Mr. Walter: You do not?

Senator Hastings: No, when you speak of 50 years, we do not have that time.

Mr. Walter: No, I only use that as a reference point to say that it will be in great shape. I am not saying that is the target.

The Chairman: Tell me, with what firmness, concern and creditability do I tell a man who is poverty-stricken that we have just reached the moon? Does that make him feel any happier or any better?

Mr. Walter: Not the individual poor man. You help him right now.

The Chairman: Yes, but put him in a mass anywhere you like, how does that concern him?

Mr. Walter: He is right there and needs help now.

The Chairman: That is what we are concerned with and what we are asking you and others to help solve. You came here and you are very helpful in discussing the problem, but it is immediate. He is quite right when he said that time is running out on us. You see what is happening in other parts of the world. We cannot just sit by and close our eyes and our minds to a great number of things, for with us it is immediate. What do we do?

Mr. Walter: For the immediate, what do we do?

Mr. Gratwick: For the immediate, what do we do? I think we go back as quickly as possible to looking at the total resources we are committing, or think we are committing, in this general area at the moment, and try to establish what effectiveness they have and, realizing that those are the ones over which we have some control, point them more clearly towards the general objective we are defining. That, I do not think, is a long term operation. I think you can make a very effective attack on that problem within six months.

The Chairman: On behalf of the committee, I thank you very much. I must say that this has been an exciting and challenging morning with an association that is new to us. We were not too sure of who you were, except that you were well sponsored.

Mr. Walter: Do you want our financial statement, sir?

The Chairman: What you said this morning was a little different from what we expected. You have given us a peep at the world of tomorrow. We like what we have heard, and we thank you very much for your brief and your presence here this morning.

The Chairman: We shall hear now from the Provincial Council of Women of Ontario. On my right is Mrs. Gordon B. Armstrong, the President of the Council. She will introduce her delegation, and then make a short statement.

Mrs. Gordon B. Armstrong, President, the Provincial Council of Women of Ontario: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The delegates who are appearing today are Miss Mary E. Atkinson, who is the chairman of the Standing Committee on Laws, of the Provincial Council of Women of Ontario. She is a very active and busy solicitor in Port Credit.

Unfortunately, Mrs. Brigadier E. J. Falle of the Salvation Army is not present, because she is out today counselling young people.

Mrs. W. M. Marshall of Ottawa is present. Mrs. Marshall is a past president of the Ottawa Council of Women, and vice-president of the Provincial Council of Women of Ontario. She is also a very hard working member of the committee that prepared this brief, and we owe her a great debt of gratitude for the work she has done.

Miss L. Dorothy Martin is the executive secretary of the Federation of Women Teachers of Ontario, and she is also a vice-president of the Provincial Council of Women of Ontario. She has been most active in the preparation of this brief. In fact, it was the Ontario Teachers' Federation who produced her brief for us.

Mrs. J. B. Palmer is co-chairman of the Poverty Study Committee, and she has served at every level of the Council, having been a past-president of the Western Council, and serving through the various offices at the provincial level, and is presently treasurer of the National Council of Women. Mrs. Palmer was a teacher who went back to university, and who graduated last year in anthropology.

Mrs. Henio Reio is from Hamilton, and is on the executive of the Provincial Council of Women of Ontario. She is also a member of the local executive, and is the chairman of the Standing Committee on Migration and Citizenship. She is one of our newest citizens in Canada, and she brings a wealth of experience in respect of new Canadian citizens. She is a teacher by profession, and a graduate of the University of Tartu in Estonia.

Mrs. W. A. Wood is the chairman of our Poverty Study Committee. She has had varied experience in the field of education, and in voluntary cultural and service organizations. She has served on many boards, and on a royal commission in Manitoba. She has served at every level—local, provincial, and national—of the council. She and her husband have recently retired, and have come to Toronto, where they are finding that the cost of living is much higher than it is in Winnipeg.

We also have Miss Dorothy Dale with us. She is a vice-president of the Provincial Council of Women of Ontario, and a very active member of the Business and Professional Women's Organization. She is also a public relations counsellor in Toronto.

It is my pleasure to present to you the members of my committee. We have also other members from the Ottawa area who are present with us today.

Mr. Chairman and honourable senators: the Provincial Council of Women of Ontario wish to thank you for the opportunity of presenting this brief to you. The 17 local councils of women and the ten federated associations who participated in the study of poverty, share the opinion that poverty is living in an environment in which one cannot cope with the accepted standard of living. It is also felt that the real value of this study will probably not lie in the ideas which are expressed herein, but rather will be measured by the extent to which we have changed those hard core attitudes which we, in our various communities, hold toward the poor. It will be measured by the extent of our realization that the solution to poverty does not lie in a proliferation of welfare programs as they presently exist, but rather in making good the claim that Canadian society is one of equal opportunity.

If social rights are to have real meaning then the standard of living of the aged should not decline while that of other citizens is rising, nor should prejudice, which often creates a barrier to restoring the disabled to active work, be tolerated.

Dr. Kessler, in addressing a symposium of the Toronto Rehabilitation Centre recently, said that rehabilitation, both of the elderly and the disabled, can unlock human potential. The physically handicapped often wonder whether governments consult the handicapped when they are making decisions on their behalf. The handicapped have the right to take part in our society.

Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, I would draw your attention, in regard to the elderly, to the United States International Executive Service Corps formed in 1964 by a group of American businessmen headed by David Rockefeller. They recruited experienced people recently retired for the purpose of serving on short term assignments overseas, working with local businesses which requested their particular expertise or managerial skill.

We mention this because of the involvement of women, although we are cognizant of the fact that there are comparable and like organizations in Canada. Nine of the volunteer executives have been women, one of whom was in her seventies. This lady went to Panama to advise a shoe manufacturer. Other retired persons have gone upon request to Iran and to Greece as hospital administrators, and to Honduras as a trade adviser.

Our responsibilities to encourage the use of talents gained over a lifetime by our elderly should be no less than our responsibility to prolong life through improved medical services and living conditions. Many of our retired citizens find it impossible to live in their own homes, because of the annual increase in property taxes. They believe that they should be exempt from school taxes, although they are willing to pay taxes for other services.

Presently in Ontario 45 per cent of the educational tax is borne by the provincial government, with a suggested 60 per cent by 1973. However, home owners still face the problem of provincial re-assessment of property at market value by 1975. Income, if based upon the present structure, will not increase proportionately. There will be a further burdensome load for the elderly to carry. Yet a program of uprooting these people and placing them in new surroundings would be far costlier in social services than if they were left in their own homes amid their own surroundings.

This study, completed by volunteers, also indicates a very real need for senior citizens' counselling service centres and a comprehensive medicare program, not only with premiums related to ability to pay, but covering the cost of prescription drugs.

In the survey recently made public by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Hon. Stanley Ronald Basford, it was stated that the poor pay the highest average retail drug price in areas such as Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal and Halifax. It is necessary that there be a more careful study of the costs of retail distribution and a closer examination of some of the large markups in many prescription drugs. It is imperative that in order to allow our senior citizens to live in dignity and as we would have them live, adjustments in old age security benefits be directly related to the consumer price index and the purchasing power of the dollar.

The studies show that the most severe hardships in our rural areas are suffered by those on marginal farms. For instance, if a crop is wiped out by weather factors the entire family must resort to part time work until the next crop is harvested. The cost of clothing for children attending school, the high cost of dental and eye care and other necessities appeared to take precedence over housing and food.

It was found that those who had the least to say about poverty were those who put forth the most determined effort to better their conditions and to hide the fact that they were poor.

In marginal farming areas there is need for both retraining and an upgrading of educational qualifications if the poverty cycle is to be broken. It is also necessary that day care facilities be made more readily available where the need is evident if women in such areas are to be able to take advantage of employment opportunities.

As is probably pointed out in three-quarters of the briefs you receive, it is not a revelation that housing remains as one of the major factors in prolonging poverty. Many homes which were intended for a single family are being converted into small apartments and rooming houses. This results in over-crowding and a deterioration of the rights of privacy.

In many areas zoning regulations are not adhered to, simply because to implement them would create greater hardships. Because of lack of available housing and the high cost of mortgage rates, the working poor find it impossible to own a home. A classic example is mentioned in the brief from the Kingstons area, where a family had to do without a bathtub in their home for seven years in order to meet the mortgage payments.

A great disparity exists often between the income of the working poor and that of welfare recipients. The income of the latter is computed on the family unit while the income of the working poor is on set wage. If governments are concerned about poverty, as we believe they are, they will make sure that no man's net income is less than he would have received upon welfare.

The same disparity exists between those who are recipients of union wages and those who draw salaries as clerks, shopkeepers and in secondary industries. We are told that in Sudbury the average rate per hour for a 40-hour week in INCO is close to $4. However, average rate per hour for non-union members under the legal minimum wage in Ontario is $1.30 for a 48-hour week. Yet these people pay the same price for consumer goods in the market place. It is obvious that one group enjoys a higher living standard than the other. We ask why does this disparity exist and how can the gap be narrowed?

This study has also shown that low incomes are characteristic of families headed by women. Nearly half of all families with female heads rely on some type of welfare payment. This fact has important social and psychological implications for the individuals in addition to financial consequences for the family and the community. Many of these families could be self supporting if day care centres were available to these mothers or they were allowed to supplement the moneys received from welfare programs with additional earnings. It would also allow a measure of dignity and worth not presently enjoyed.

Even when the female heads of families do work the market value of their work is generally so low that the standard of living is severely reduced. Often poor education and the lack of occupational training make it impossible for them to break the poverty cycle.

Loneliness and feelings of inadequacy as members of the community often lead to withdrawal from society and create settings for further family breakdowns. It should not be necessary for a wife in a civilized society to have to police her husband for support. It is suggested in the brief that each provincial government set up a provincially administered maintenance award fund. Defendants would be compelled to pay their maintenance payments into the fund. Dependent families would receive regularly from it the maintenance awarded by the court, independently of the amounts paid in by the estranged father. The onus for collecting and administering the maintenance awards should be assumed by the province.

It is also felt that the right to declare bankruptcy should be available to low income families as it is to business firms. This could provide a solution to many families who find themselves facing a lifetime of debt, which is often the legacy bestowed upon one-parent families.

The study revealed that there should be tax exemptions for day care services, not only for working mothers, but for the working woman who must employ someone in the home where there is a dependant requiring care.

A permanent commission or board on the status of women would further the cause of women as workers. Incidentally, this was a resolution presented by the National Association of professional and Business Women, and one to which we adhere.

Poverty with reference to the Indian and Metis people exists in education, health, economic development and social acceptance. This study indicates that one-half of the Indian population is 16 years of age or less, which suggests that education may be one of the keys to the solution of present problems.

One of the fundamental differences between Indian and non-Indian is the question of land rights. Until this question is understood by all and solved the Indian will never be fully integrated. The culture and philosophy of the Indian that land is for the use of all is diametrically opposed to the belief of the non-Indian that land is bought, fenced and deeded by law.

To be truly integrated as productive citizens our native peoples must be allowed more responsibility in shaping their own destiny. Of the 63 Indian superintendents across Canada only three are Indians. With Indians and the Government working together priorities could be established and understanding achieved. Employment on or near reservations should be encouraged by the establishment of small industries and manufacturing plants. More credit for the purchase of homes should be available for Indians who have established good work habits. It has been noted that the sense of ownership and achievement has done wonders to improve standards of living.

Discrimination, fear and distrust still exist between the Indian and non-Indian. The preservation and promotion of the Indian culture is equally important to non-Indians as it is to the Indian people. It is the heritage of all Canadians. Understanding and pride in it would do much to alleviate the fear and distrust that still exist in both the economic world and the social environment.

Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, I have merely touched upon the material contained in the body of our brief. At this time may I thank you for the attention you have given to these remarks. We will entertain any questions you might like to ask members of the delegation or myself.

Senator Fergusson: I am greatly impressed by the tremendous amount of work that has been done to produce this excellent brief. We are very grateful to the Ontario Council of Women. I have very warm feelings for the Council, because I was President of the New Brunswick Council at one time, long before you would remember, Mrs. Armstrong. This was an unusual undertaking for one provincial council, and we appreciate it very much.

There are a number of questions I should like to ask. One thing that I have asked many other people who have appeared before us is this. You say that through your study you have come to understand a great deal more about the poor, and you are pleased that you have had this opportunity. However, we must make many, many more people aware of the things you have found out. Can you tell us how we are going to spread this out over Canada?

Mrs. Armstrong: First, may I say that I agree with you wholeheartedly. We as a council perhaps learned a great deal more than we may be able to offer you as a committee. The work contained in the brief is really the work of all the local councils in Ontario and federated societies; they are the ones who should take credit. This was done under the direction of Mrs. Woods and Mrs. Palmer.

We feel as women in our communities throughout Ontario we learned a great deal more about the problems besetting our own communities. We in turn changed many of our hard core attitudes. The people in coming to us learned that there was an organization or organizations concerned with the problems besetting them. My answer to your question is that we need better and more means of communication. Constantly in this brief mention is made of referral services at the community level, and information programs, whether it be for the elderly, the one-parent family or the Indian and Metis. Across the board we need better local communications, because there are many services and programs available to people if they could only be made aware of them. This was one of the major things we discovered.

Senator Fergusson: Your Ontario council includes, of course, a great many federated organizations.

Mrs. Armstrong: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: Through that it is not only the few here, but thousands of women.

Mrs. Armstrong: 100,000 women in Ontario.

Senator Fergusson: That is a start.

Mrs. Armstrong: Having learned ourselves has, I think, been one of the major steps, because so many of us were not aware of the problems besetting people caught up in the poverty cycle.

Senator Fergusson: In paragraph 23, at the top of page 21, in (b) you say that itinerancy is a cause of poverty. Do you think that poverty causes itinerancy or that itinerancy causes poverty?

Mrs. Armstrong: This is like the chicken and the egg, is it not? If there are itinerant people in our society today, they probably will at some point, if there is not employment for them, become poverty stricken. Again, if we make re-training and education available to these people, they have an incentive or a means to break that cycle. It is not just education but re-training, sometimes of an educated person, that is necessary.

Senator Fergusson: Then they would not need to move and be itinerant.

Mrs. Armstrong: No, that is right.

Senator Fergusson: You also mention that another cause is having too many children in the family. What access to family planning would there be? Would you know?

Mrs. Armstrong: This is a study that has come in, and I am speaking personally. In a small community there probably is not that much available by way of advice for family planning. I think in major cities, such as Toronto, Hamilton and Ottawa, there are centres where this information can be gained, or where it is available very easily. However, in smaller communities you not only run into the lack of information, but you may run into long-term attitudes that may possibly have to be changed in the future. This again must be done through education and understanding of what can be better for the whole family.

Senator Fergusson: Of course, with the variety of organizations you have, they would not all agree on whether it is good or not.

Mrs. Armstrong: No, definitely not. Again, it is a legal problem.

The Chairman: I understand that Controller Mallette had a solution to the problem. I do not know whether you endorsed it or not.

Mrs. Armstrong: He has been soundly reprimanded! I think he is in what you would call the doghouse at the moment in Toronto.

The Chairman: Senator Carter has to attend another meeting, as do most of us, although we are staying here. I think he should be allowed to put a few questions now before he goes.

Senator Carter: You may have answered my first question partly in your reply to Senator Fergusson. On pages 1 and 2 of the brief you speak of changes in attitudes. At the bottom of page 1 you say that certain attitudes towards those affected by poverty have changed.

Mrs. Armstrong: Very much so.

Senator Carter: Again, on page 2 you say:

... it will be measured by the extent to which we have changed, those hard core attitudes which we held towards the poor.

Has there been any significant change?

Mrs. Armstrong: Among us, yes, a very significant change. I would like Mrs. Wood to reply to this, because in compiling this material most of the comment came in not from the studies but from the council people themselves, which are definitely worth noting.

Mrs. W. A. Wood, Co-Chairman of Poverty Study Committee, Provincial Council of Women of Ontario: This came in a number of reports from local councils. We are so glad we undertook this study. We did not realize this before. We have learned such a lot, and we are so glad we did it. We did not know the types of poverty and conditions in which people were living, and the basic reasons behind these things. They felt that it had been a most worthwhile study, and that a whole new aspect of community life had been opened up to them. This is one of the purposes of the Council of Women, to create an informed public opinion, and I think this has been a valuable experience.

Senator Carter: That is what I was getting at. This is the key to the solution, because there can be no solution to this problem unless we can change the attitudes of the public generally. You people are organized all across Canada. Do you see how to mobilize and attack on the public to change their opinions? That is something that must be done, and it seems that you people have the organization to make a big contribution to it.

Mrs. Wood: I think that is a challenge that we should consider accepting and doing something about. There are some national officers here who perhaps might present this challenge to the national committee of officers and the national executive when next they are in contact.

Senator Carter: We want you to go a little further than merely accepting the challenge. We want you to develop a commitment to tackle this problem. In your brief you recommend that the whole welfare system policy should be overhauled.

Mrs. Armstrong: Yes.

Senator Carter: Which change is the most urgent?

Mrs. Armstrong: In many cases there seems to be a duplication of services; there seems to be a lack of communication about where one reaches these services. We feel that welfare systems as we presently experience them are not working, and therefore they have to be overhauled.

Senator Carter: When you say overhauled, what do you mean—a little change here and there?

Mrs. Armstrong: I think you should take a whole new look at the welfare system. This is my personal opinion. Whether this means a change in tax laws, exemptions, or the ultimate granting of a minimum wage, I do not know. When you look at the welfare system you must look at the whole environment and not just one or two programs. The welfare system, if you want to use that term in the future, must be geared to the cost of living, the worth of the dollar, and it must fluctuate with the needs of society. It cannot be a steady thing as we have experienced in the past. What we have is outdated and not working.

Senator Carter: You said that our system should be overhauled, but what you just said means tampering with what we already have. You said nothing about guaranteed annual income.

Mrs. Armstrong: I mentioned a minimum wage.

The Chairman: No, that is not what he is questioning you about.

Mrs. Armstrong: I am of two minds personally when it comes to a guaranteed annual income. I do not know enough about it to answer properly. I do not think many of us really do. This is what I mean when I saw that it has to be part and parcel of our new environment and not one program alone.

The Chairman: You say you do not know very much about the guaranteed minimum income. None of us know very much about it, but would you say that the old Age Security is working badly? That is a guaranteed minimum income.

Mrs. Armstrong: This is a type of guaranteed minimum income. I do not think that it is working well, because it is not geared to the cost of living.

The Chairman: In principle?

Mrs. Armstrong: In principle, basically.

The Chairman: No one is suggesting that it is adequate and that it should not be brought up to date. That is a matter in which we are in agreement. We are now talking about principle.

Mrs. Armstrong: I think it is working well in principle.

The Chairman: If it is working well in principle for them and for family Allowance—that is a guaranteed income.

Mrs. Armstrong: Family Allowance is another question.

The Chairman: I am talking about the principle.

Mrs. Armstrong: I realize that.

The Chairman: Why then do you question the minimum income for other disadvantaged people?

Mrs. Armstrong: I do not question the concept of minimum income but I lack the knowledge to answer your question satisfactorily.

The Chairman: In looking at this list I thought that the university alumni was here. Every one of these women are university graduates and they are qualified beyond question.

Mrs. Armstrong: we may be aware of our limitations too.

The Chairman: Who should know more about these things than you people? What is the mystery to it?

Mrs. Armstrong: There is a great deal of mystery to it because this involves the running of the economy and it involves taxation and new concepts.

The Chairman: Mrs. Armstrong, you hit it on the nose. That is what I thought was bothering you, the question of taxation. That is what we are getting at, our class, your class—the middle class. We middle class people are starting to worry whether it will cost us money. Do you think it is something which this committee should overly concern itself about?

Mrs. Armstrong: I think you should concern yourselves with the fact that what we have is not working.

The Chairman: When you say the welfare system is not working you are merely repeating what everyone else has said here. We would like to have your views because we think you know what you are talking about.

Mrs. Armstrong: I am glad you do.

Senator Croll, we are submitting today the findings of studies from the local councils. We can speak personally, and I think the members of this committee are well qualified to do so, but what we are presenting here are the findings which have come in from these councils. We do not want to imprint our personal feelings on these findings. We would like to keep the two separate.

Senator Carter: Do I understand that to mean that a reference to guaranteed annual income would be deliberately omitted because none of your councils mentioned it or had any opinions regarding it?

Mrs. Armstrong: It was not deliberately omitted. It was not mentioned as such by many of the councils. There were other things which were not mentioned and that surprised me, one being the building tax.

Senator Carter: Forgetting the council for a moment, if you had to choose between increasing Family Allowances and setting up a guaranteed annual income based on the size of the family—a family of four would get an income somewhere along the line recommended by the Economic Council which—would by your choice?

Mrs. Armstrong: The guaranteed annual income.

Senator Carter: You would prefer that?

Mrs. Armstrong: Personally, that would be my choice.

Senator Carter: You have had some experience, I presume, with the scale of allowances in the welfare systems in Ontario. Do you consider them adequate?

Mrs. Armstrong: I think they are being constantly reviewed and updated, more so during the last year than in previous years. Again, there is a new attitude toward allowances and the necessity of increased allowances, according to the escalated cost of living. This, in itself, is a good sign and I think ultimately in our Province of Ontario we will be able to reach that point where they will be adequate. There have been many changes over the last year and a half in Ontario which are for the better.

Senator Carter: Have any of your councils made a study of the Canada Assistance Plan and how it is being used in your province?

Mrs. Armstrong: I cannot answer that. Miss Steadman is the First Vice-President of the National Council of Women. Do you know if there have been any studies on the Canada Assistance Plan?

Miss S. M. Steadman, First Vice-President, National Council of Women: Yes.

Mrs. Armstrong: This would be at the national level?

Miss Steadman: Yes.

Senator Carter: I do not quite understand. You said you have studied the Canada Assistance Plan at the national level? It does not apply at the national level, but applies at the provincial level.

Miss Dorothy M. Dale, Vice-President, Provincial Council of Women of Ontario: We may not have studied it in quite that way, but we have studied a good many of the single facets of the Canada Assistance Plan. For instance, we are interested in day care and this is very much connected with the Canada Assistance Plan. I think we have studied a number of social welfare policies and these have certainly shown us what is done and lacking at the provincial level. Very often it is at the municipal level where education has to be done. We find this particularly true with day care and it is the municipal level which we have to perhaps stir up.

Twenty per cent may be somewhat high when setting the tax rate. We have studied it as councils and have been interested in the number of provisions of the act as they affect . . .

Senator Carter: You recommended day care. The Canada Assistance Plan makes it possible, but apparently Ontario is not taking advantage of it. Have you put any pressure on them?

Miss Dale: I would say very much so. At a number of our annual meetings we have devoted a great deal of time with the hope that the people will take back these ideas to the municipalities, and they have done so.

Senator Carter: Have you prepared a brief such as the one here and gone to the Government or the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

Miss Dale: Not as lengthy a brief as this one, but we have certainly presented briefs to the cabinet. I would say that we have spoken quite strongly about it and have had some success.

Senator Carter: You are recommending this, and it is possible, and the machinery is here to do it, and all you have to do is get the Government to use it.

Mrs. Wood: I would hope that this study has been done by municipalities and they could do even more.

Senator Fergusson: There is not much more that they can do but recommend it to the Government.

Senator McGrand: On page 20 you refer to "traveling people who are picking berries, raspberries", and you give what they earn. Then you say:

If, however, we are to have berries, fruits and vegetables, yes, and even tobacco, these crops must be picked and graded and packed by hand. Higher rates of pay for these workers would probably price these items out of the market.

That is just the problem we have. What would you recommend, to meet this problem?

Mrs. Armstrong: Again, this was a study which was made and which was submitted by a council. I think this comment, "if we are to have berries, fruits and vegetables, yes, and even tobacco, these crops must be picked and graded and packed by hand: higher rates of pay for these workers would probably price these items out of the market"—this was a comment that really came in from the committee, that even though we understood that the amount these people received for this type of work was insufficient, to increase it would also increase the price to the consumer. Here is the dilemma. We have not any suggestions as to how you can get around this. I do not know how you can get around it.

Senator McGrand: Is the number of these migrants that come in there picking berries and so on,—is it something like the "Grapes of Wrath", of some time ago. Is their problem increasing, are they becoming more numerous, are they encountering more difficulties as years go by? I think you mean that they become part of the "culture of poverty", eventually, if something is not done about it. Do you think they are increasing in numbers?

Mrs. Armstrong: This study did not indicate that they were either decreasing or increasing. It was only pointing out what was an actual fact. To answer your question, a survey would have to be made as to how many are employed in these categories today as compared to ten years ago. These studies we did not do.

Senator McGrand: These people in western Canada, they are mostly the metis and the Indians, are they not?

Mrs. Armstrong: This study that we are concerned with, as concerned with the Indians and the metis, was in the Brantford area.

Senator McGrand: The tobacco area?

Mrs. Armstrong: No, no. Delhi is a different part of Ontario, and that is a tobacco area.

Mrs. Wood: This came in in a report from Chatham and they were talking about the rural poverty and talking about these people who are share croppers and so on. They are those who do these hourly jobs, seasonal jobs. They mention this, to show the way these people have to survive.

Senator McGrand: There is a big difference now compared to the early part of the century when thousands of people in eastern Canada were desperate. It is a different thing.

Mrs. Wood: This is not that at all. These are local people who have these jobs on a seasonal rate. I do not have any solution to this. We are extending the format to California. There the strawberries are just not grown because there are no pickers and they import most of the strawberries from Mexico. This is what we are thinking of. If you have to pay people an hourly wage and it puts the price of this commodity out of the reach of the consumers, then how are they to live?

Mrs. Armstrong: This is the dilemma.

The Chairman: Is it a dilemma? I do not quite follow it. I found no difficulty. Are not people entitled to decent living wages? The very fact that we pay somebody two dollars an hour, is it my business to follow up what the consumer has to pay—if he is entitled to $2 an hour?

Mrs. Wood: If you were in business of raising this crop and you could not sell it, you would be in the same position.

The Chairman: I know Essex and Kent so well. I know exactly what you are talking about—the vegetables, the Heinz people, the canning factories and what not. These people in that particular area only work part time, and it is usually the women. The men have other jobs. Usually it is the women and that complaint has been there a long time, not that it is not justified but I think they are entitled to be paid a decent wage. That is the answer to it. You must listen to your chairman, as I do, you remember what she said about Sudbury, you remember she said, that the people who are working for International Nickel are paid $4 an hour and those who are not organized are receiving something far less.

Mrs. Armstrong: $1.30.

The Chairman: I have marked down a question here, to ask what the solution to that is, but we will get that a little later.

Senator McGrand: On page 21 you refer to the rural poverty, where the crop may be destroyed or some other disaster may occur and you suggest retraining. I would like to know, retraining in what? It seems to me that the only suggested solutions that come to us for rural poverty is retraining for industry. It seems to me that there is a limit to what industry can absorb in the retraining of people who are rurally oriented. With the increase of technology and the fewer number of people that will be involved in industry, I do not think it is any solution to say that these rural people have not much to do and they should be retrained for industry. I know that in one area there are 10,000 farms and it was suggested the number of farms be reduced to 1,500 and the other 8,500 farmers and their families be retrained for industry. Where is the limit that can be absorbed?

Mrs. Armstrong: Doctor, this was a study in which the findings came in to us. When we talk about retraining we do not necessarily mean retraining for industry. Some of the ARDA programs which have been released are excellent. It could very well mean retraining in the better uses of a farm. Under the new ARDA setup people on marginal farms can have their farms bought and they can move out into other spheres of life. They may be retrained for other methods of farming, how to get better use of the land, how to plant other crops, according to the needs of the community. It is not necessarily retraining for industry.

Senator McGrand: That is my idea of retraining, but the idea that comes to us usually is to retrain people for industry.

Mrs. Armstrong: No, we do not believe that. They can be retrained for many other things.

Senator McGrand: We will agree on that.

Mrs. Henio Reio, Chairman of Standing Committee on Migration and Citizenship, Provincial Council of Women of Ontario: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, in my mind, we have to train people how to use money. Whether they have ten dollars or a hundred dollars, it is a fact that some people need more than others. It is necessary to have training in how to use money, how to go shopping, and how to make the best use of money and know what you are doing with it. Many of these people come from the other countries really and truly come with empty pockets, and they are learning here how to succeed. It is especially necessary to train each woman how to be the finance minister at home, and how to be a very good finance minister. I believe that this would bring about some kind of solution to the problem.

Senator McGrand: What you mean is to train people to make the best of their environment.

Mrs. Armstrong: Oh definitely.

Senator Hastings: I would just like to return to where Senator Fergusson ended and compliment the ladies on their excellent brief. As I understand it, you are presenting here the findings of your local councils, and you state that probably the greatest contribution you have made is the education of yourselves to change the hard-core attitude which you held towards the poor. Now, in my opinion, that is one of the prime objectives of this committee; we have to change the attitudes of the middle and upper-income Canadians towards their obligations to the poor. Now can you tell this committee in the light of your experience how we could better perform that task?

Mrs. Armstrong: Going back to the hard-core attitudes, and whether this is because of the depression here in Canada or not, I don't know, but many of us who made it by virtue of hard work, skill and so on, and so forth—we did not have as industrialized a society or the society of technology that we have today—so the attitudes were—"well, fine, if you were starving, it was because you were either lazy or shiftless and just not worth saving." This attitude has prevailed among many people, and really it is a scapegoat. You can label it and say "this person is poverty-stricken because he is lazy." But we have found out during the course of this study this is not now necessarily true. They may be poor because of the society in which they live and because they have not been trained to be able to cope with this environment, and they have not had the education or the equal opportunities to be able to lift themselves out of it. They may perhaps have come from a rural economy into an industrialized society where they have not been able to move from one sphere of activity or labour to another. You ask me how we can change this. I think the biggest change is made when we change ourselves, and when we sit down first as a community, then as a province and then as a nation and express this feeling through our publications, and through the media. Then we may be able to sit around a table with these people who are in this environment and listen to them and work together with them toward eradicating poverty. I think this is really our main task, because merely to bring up program after program just to create an existence for people is not really solving the problem.

Senator Hastings: I agree wholeheartedly with what you are saying, but will you tell us what we should do about it?

Mrs. Armstrong: Well, we have found and some of our suggestions are that there should be referral services at the community level.

Senator Hastings: But I am not talking about communicating with the poor; I am talking about communicating with people other than the poor.

Mrs. Armstrong: With our own people, yes I know. But remember that many of our own people fall in that classification known as the working poor, and I think that sometimes the working poor have to change their attitudes as well. Some of the middle-class people today could really be called working poor because of their environment, our taxation system and the heavy load we have to carry. We are now being dropped to that level. Therefore I do not think that one can say that any particular class has to be communicated with in order to change the attitude. We all have to change.

Senator Hastings: But I think the big change has to come in the middle and upper income groups.

Mrs. Armstrong: Yes, but the only way you can do that is through better communications, through better use of public service broadcasting, through the C.B.C., through your local newspapers, through your local community organizations, through your national organizations—in short, the only way you can do it is through people and you must reach people through every means possible.

Senator Hastings: But your organization has had a change of attitude towards the poor.

Mrs. Armstrong: Yes, very much so. Perhaps not so much a change of attitude as a cognizance of what actually exists. I do not think that many of us held, let me say, a snob attitude. I think it was that we were unaware of the totality of the situation.

The Chairman: I think Mrs. Dale wants to say something.

Mrs. Dale: When you speak of a change of attitude, I would like to comment on what Senator Croll said about these people picking the strawberries and having no right to adequate payment for their job. I think sometimes women are to blame for low rates of pay in service industries, and in that connection I can tell you a story about a roast of beef. I had a group in for dinner one night and I served roast beef. It was the holiday season and so I went all out and got a roast of beef. One of my guests who has a great deal more money than I enjoyed it thoroughly and she said, "My, that was a good roast of beef; I have not been serving beef; I have been serving chicken." Now, I think she can afford to serve beef. I think sometimes we as women are loath to spend our money and channel it into industries where there are low rates of pay such as the farm economy. Taking strawberries, for example, we do not want to pay the amount of money asked for because we feel we should pay what we paid in 1929. Therefore I think that women are to blame for some of these low rates of pay, but that is a personal opinion. I do not know if it is valid or not.

The Chairman: Anything you say, Mrs. Dale, is valid.

Mrs. Dale: I think women can be educated to be fairer in the way they divide their money.

Senator Hastings: In the light of your study, do you feel that the affluent or upper-income Canadian is ready and willing to help the poor?

Mrs. Armstrong: You are asking me to make a judgment which really is not a fair one.

Senator Hastings: Well, I would like to find the change of attitude, Mrs. Armstrong.

Mrs. Armstrong: Let us say that according to my personal observation and my discussions with people in many brackets, there is a definite change, and I think they are very much aware that they are their brother's keeper—that the time has come, if we are going to be a productive and great nation, that we must concern ourselves with those who are less fortunate than we are. Not only that, but there is a very practical aspect as well; if you have a productive nation you have a rich nation.

Senator Hastings: I am glad you answered the question in that way. Now you have made, in the light of your study, a great many recommendations, many of them being very worthwhile. Carrying on from what you have just told me, would you say that the upper and middle income Canadians are prepared to back that up with higher taxation?

Mrs. Armstrong: That is loaded, isn't it?

Senator Hastings: Are they their brother's keeper to that extent, or does it stop short of that?

Mrs. Armstrong: Let us say that I would presuppose that, as good citizens, they would feel that they probably could.

Senator Hastings: That is a very loaded answer. In the light of your studies and findings, which reiterate what we are finding and what the Economic Council is finding, what do you propose to do now that you have presented the brief?

Mrs. Armstrong: Perhaps we will wait and see what your suggestion is and then maybe we will come back.

Senator Hastings: I do not think we can wait and see very much longer.

Mrs. Armstrong: I agree. I do not think we can afford to wait. But I think now that this study has been made and examined, it will go back to Council—

Senator Hastings: I do not think we can wait and see much longer.

Mrs. Armstrong: I agree, I do not think we can afford to wait, but now this study has been made and has been presented, this will go back to councils and probably some of the recommendations will come in—in fact, I know some of them will come in next year—as suggested resolutions which will be incorporated in a brief presented to the provincial government, or, in some cases, sent to the National Council of Women to be presented to the federal Government by way of resolutions, and these are suggested changes that we as a council feel would be in the best interests of our people.

Senator Hastings: You are not prepared to make a commitment to work with the poor in your local councils?

Mrs. Armstrong: Yes, we are prepared to make that commitment any day, and we have accepted that commitment. This is the work of Council.

Senators Hastings: Working with the poor?

Mrs. Armstrong: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: Do you feel that the interest that has been aroused in your councils is not going to die down just because you have presented the brief here?

Mrs. Armstrong: Definitely.

Senator Fergusson: You will continue, and you have a channel to both the provincial and federal governments, and you will probably make us of that?

Mrs. Armstrong: Yes. As a classic example, you will find that the Toronto Council suggested a referral service.

The Chairman: What do you mean by a referral service?

Mrs. Armstrong: A referral service or an information centre where people can go to seek information about where do they go for legal aid, where do they go for help in this area, where do they go to seek housing, where do they go to seek information on a variety of topics.

In St. Catherine's they have become very concerned with the elderly, and St. Catherine's submitted a very good study. They are thinking in terms of a program at their local level next year by virtue of what they have gained from this information.

Throughout Ontario you find local councils instituting in their own communities various programs to deal with many of these recommendations.

Senator Hastings: Would they go so far as to organize the poor at the local level?

Mrs. Armstrong: This has been suggested, that this is a new means of both suggested, that this is a new means of both communication and understanding that in the past we have not had, or many organizations have not moved out into the environment and organized definite groups. But the feeling now among many councils is that this is the best way to do things to move out among these various groups of people where there is a need, and work with them, teach them how to approach different agencies, how to approach Government, how to prepare a brief, in order to alleviate the conditions they may be suffering under. This is part of our responsibility in Council and in that way we will be moving out and working with these various groups.

The Chairman: Mrs. Armstrong, how many people have you in your organization who are on welfare?

Mrs. Armstrong: I cannot answer that; I do not know.

The Chairman: Do you suspect you have any?

Mrs. Armstrong: I think that from time to time in local councils, yes, we have had people who have been on welfare. At the provincial level—I am just thinking back and I cannot think of anyone who might have been—perhaps at some stage during their lifetime, if there has been a family problem or the head of the household has been out of work, or it is a one-parent family situation, but I think in local councils they could give you a better answer to this question, and this could very well be so.

The Chairman: The feeling we have reached here in the course of our hearings—which have gone on for a year—is that organizations such as yours and other great organizations have to reach out and involve the poor in an active sense at the top level, in minority numbers but at the very top decision-making level.

Mrs. Armstrong: Yes.

The Chairman: You are not going to get anywhere with them unless they are participants in decision-making.

Mrs. Armstrong: We agree. Again, this has been shown in studies, for instance, with the Indian people. I certainly did not know that there were 63 Indian administrators across Canada, only three of whom were Indians. I think this is ridiculous. If Indians are going to be concerned with Indians, why do we not have more Indian administrators? I think the same applies in many areas. With regard to the handicapped, for instance, who best can speak for that group of people but the people who are suffering from various afflictions? I think this has been one of our problems in the past, that in organizations and in Government we have told people what they can have or what they should do, rather than ask them.

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to endorse the complimentary remarks of Senator Fergusson with regard to the brief. I have read it through and I find it very complete and very interesting. On page 21 you speak of day nurseries. It is your recommendation that day nurseries be made readily available, and so on. Just last night I was reading an article about unwed mothers, and I believe many doctors and medical authorities today recommend that these mothers keep their children, if at all possible. I also read that a girl would have to earn between $80 and $90 a week in order to support her infant. This could be poverty. This is an area where there is great poverty. Have you ever given any thought as to how they could be helped?

Mrs. Armstrong: That point has not been brought out in the study. It may be brought out under the one-parent family, for instance, let us say, where a woman may have a family, may have been living common law and where she has been an unwed mother and suddenly she is faced with the problem of bringing her children up, schooling them and seeking employment and not being able to find day care centres, and so on and so forth. But as an express point of an unwed mother, this has not come up in this study.

Senator Inman: I think I read that there were 130-odd thousand in Toronto alone last year—

Mrs. Armstrong: I would not doubt it.

Senator Inman: —and in other comparable cities.

Mrs. Armstrong: I think Miss Atkinson wanted to reply to this.

Miss Mary E. Atkinson, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Laws, Provincial Council of Women of Ontario: I am a lawyer and I act for unwed mothers who are under 21 who give up their children for adoption, and I would say in the majority of these cases the girls are capable of earning between $45 and $50 a week. There is no way they can afford to bring up a child in these circumstances. In many cases it is very difficult even for the unwed mother to get welfare—the particular welfare officer has a prejudice against illegitimate children—and this is very difficult and it is an area that could well be looked at. Whether these children would be subsidized, again I do not know the solution, but it is a very serious problem.

Senator Inman: I know that is an area where there is great poverty, because sometimes a girl is rejected by her family and she wants to keep the child, and today I think the thinking is that the child needs the love of the mother.

Mrs. Armstrong: The mother can give the child much more than any agency or any other person.

Senator Inman: On page 18, in speaking of rural poverty, you say:

The most severe hardships are suffered by those on marginal farms.

I was interested in what assistance they should receive from Government—subsidization making it possible for them to continue farming on small farms.

I am rather interested, because that movement is going on in my own province of Prince Edward Island now.

Mrs. Armstrong: This study on page 19 came in primarily from the Georgetown area, did it not, Mrs. Wood? And I think when they were talking about marginal farms, again here—

The Chairman: A marginal farm around Toronto is quite a different thing from one in Prince Edward Island.

Mrs. Armstrong: Yes, we do not have as many potatoes, for one thing. But, I can see where it would be a greater problem in your area than it probably is in Ontario. We do have marginal farms in Ontario and we do have problems, but in many cases there is an industrial centre that is not too far distant and there is help forthcoming in many areas, whereas in your province there would not be the same amount of help forthcoming.

I wish I had the new ARDA program here, because some of the recommendations set out for occupants of marginal farms are very good. If a farmer has a marginal farm and wants to get out from under then there is Government assistance available that will allow him to do this. There is also provision for retraining by way of education. This is a study submitted by them, and they talk about affects the rural poor, and surprisingly enough it was not housing or food. Many of them have their gardens in which they grow their own food.

In Ontario, at least, a marginal farm usually has electricity and many other facilities of a good living environment, but they do have problems. For instance, they cannot outfit their children in the same way that the children in the towns are outfitted, and so the children suffer. If there is a breakdown of the family car then there is not enough money to repair it. If they have to have dental work done they have not the funds with which to pay for it, although this may be eased in future medicare programs. I think our concern here was that there be retraining, but not retraining for industry. We submit that there should be retraining to enable these people to cope with the environment in which they choose to live. Many of them choose to live in farms areas, and I do not blame them. I would love to live on a farm. They are happiest in this setting, and they should be trained to live within that setting. We should be thinking in these terms. They should not be retrained to move out of that setting in which they are happiest.

Senator Inman: I agree with you. That is true. On page 56 you recommend that the Government establish a permanent commission or board on the status of women. I thought that the women's branch of the Department of Labour had established that.

The Chairman: Is not that under study at the moment by a royal commission chaired by Mrs. Bird?

Mrs. Armstrong: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: But they are recommending that there be a permanent commission.

The Chairman: Is not that what the royal commission is studying?

Senator Fergusson: Yes, but they have the right to make this recommendation.

The Chairman: Yes. This is helpful, is it not, to Mrs. Bird's commission?

Senator Fergusson: Certainly.

Mrs. Armstrong: You must remember that this study was made over the past year, during which a great deal has been done within the Department of Labour. For instance, there is the new labour legislation that is coming into force in Ontario in the Department of Labour. There has definitely been an advancement when it comes to representation.

Senator Inman: I am just wondering whether this recommendation is not redundant.

The Chairman: Yes, it is very helpful.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, I do not think you understood Senator Inman's point. What she is trying to say is that we now have a women's bureau in the Department of Labour, and she is asking whether this recommendation is redundant. Would not the women's bureau cover everything that would be done by a permanent commission?

Mrs. Armstrong: In other words, you are saying that this is superfluous.

Senator Fergusson: Yes.

Mrs. Armstrong: Well, it is coming in, as you have mentioned, but this is part of the study that was started a year ago.

Senator Fergusson: I would like to say something on that. I think that a permanent commission that would be investigating and looking after all the things that the Royal Commission on the Status of Women is investigating, is a much broader thing than the women's bureau which only looks after women who are employed. There are many other problems that need to be considered.

Mrs. Armstrong: In the Province of Alberta, I believe, they have a department or a women's bureau which covers fields other than that of labour. I think that when this original resolution came in from the business and professional women their reason for asking for it was to give leadership and encouragement to women, and to assist actively in the enforcement of rights already achieved by women in the employment field. This has been covered recently by our new legislation concerning such things as equal wages for equal work, and that type of thing. These were the basic reasons for this original legislation. But, I can see your point, and where this would carry over into other fields and be much broader in its implementation.

Senator Fergusson: The women's bureau looks after problems of women who are employed, and there are great many other women who have problems in Canada.

Mrs. Armstrong: Yes.

The Chairman: You spoke of ARDA, and Senator Pearson is the man who headed the study which was responsible for the creation of ARDA. He has some questions to ask you.

Senator Pearson: This brief covers a tremendous number of things. You have made a very deep study, apparently, of problems in the Province of Ontario. How many different units of the Council of Women are there in Ontario?

Mrs. Armstrong: There are 17 local councils, and there are ten federated societies.

Senator Pearson: What do you mean by "federated"?

Mrs. Armstrong: Well, the Council of Women is an organization which is a nucleus of other organizations which may also belong to it. You have provincial councils and local councils in each province and most of the major cities, and then you have federations of the women who share like programs and like interests, and who band together and who join either the local council or the provincial council or the national council, according to how they are constituted. I believe in Ottawa they have almost 83. Is not that correct, Mrs. Gertsman?

Mrs. S. L. Gertsman, President, Ottawa Council of Women: We have 72.

Mrs. Armstrong: At the provincial level we only have ten. At the national level they have another number. The associations range in interest from business and provincial women to the Salvation Army, Jewish organizations, the Ukrainian-Polish Women's Alliance, the Women Teachers' Federation—Miss Martin is here representing the Women Teachers' Federation of Ontario—the superannuated teachers, and there are many other organizations of similar and like interests at the local level. At the local level you have broader interests, but it depends upon the community and the organizations that are set up in that area.

Senator Pearson: What dealings have you had with Indians in Ontario?

Mrs. Armstrong: Very little, unfortunately. I attended an Indian-Eskimo conference a year ago in Toronto, and I was quite impressed by the work that they have been doing. I suggested that instead of growing inward they should be growing outward, in that their people should be joining other organizations so that they could share their problems and their culture and their likes and dislikes with others who perhaps are not aware of them. This question of land rights, I dare say, is understood by only a very few people in Canada. But, if Canadians in general could understand the culture behind the very strong feelings of the Indian people over land rights then perhaps some of our opposition to the Indian peoples would be totally different. I feel that it is only a matter of understanding the difference concepts. On the other hand if we understood more about their culture then there would be less fear and less distrust, and there would be a better working relationship.

I asked one lady who joined us for lunch why they did not join the Provincial Council of Women as an organization. She replied that they could not do that. I told her that there was no reason in the world why they could not and that we would be very happy to have them and know about and help to solve their problems. They are Canadians and what bothered them bothered us from a practical and sociological standpoint.

She said they did not feel that they could get up and speak and would be looked down upon. Many of them have the attitude that they are not good enough to thake their place in society.

I suggested that the more they went outward and joined society the more of their problems could be erased. All of us would gain a better understanding and be able to assist in the solution to problems not just of the Indians and Metis people, but of other groups. They did not feel that they were confident enough, or that people would listen to them.

Senator Pearson: The Indians are a rural people—

Mrs. Armstrong: They are a land people.

Senator Pearson: Most of the people who try to assist them are from the cities. This scares them and they cannot talk to them. Indian children are sent outside their reserves to school with white children and become scared right away. Eventually they leave from grade three or four.

Mrs. Armstrong: I made a facetious remark at the time that we should send some of our own people to live on a reservation. It is not so facetious, as in that way we would better familiarize ourselves with their problems.

Senator Pearson: That is taking place now. A teacher from Regina lives in a trailer on the reserve and teaches school. This is one way of getting to the Indians.

Mrs. Armstrong: I also pointed out to this Indian group that they were wrong in the assumption that they alone had to preserve their culture. I told them that they have the responsibility and we an obligation to preserve it. Their culture is also ours and our children's heritage. This is Canada and what they are preserving we also have a right to have by virtue of the fact that we are all Canadians.

This particular group had not given much thought to the fact that we have an obligation and they a responsibility to Canadians, not just to Indians, to preserve it.

Miss L. Dorothy Martin, Vice-President, Provincial Council of Women of Ontario: With respect to the matter of having a permanent commission for women, I would certainly agree with what Senator Fergusson said.

I am rather a feminist because I head a women's organization, I suppose. However, I really do not like this business of a women's bureau or a page in the newspaper.

Women are 50 per cent of the population and I do not know why we should have—

Senator Pearson: Only one sheet in the newspaper

Miss Martin: I think we are entitled to the whole newspaper just as much as are the men. There should be a permanent commission to look out for women all the time. They are forgotten.

Senator Pearson would be interested in this. I think the Council could take a little credit for what we do as women teachers in our organization in Ontario. We do actively help Indian boys and girls to stay at school. We ask the secretaries of schools to let us know of any Indian children they may have who may not feel they are as well dressed as the others. We send money to these children through the teacher. After a while we automatically send them a cheque every month or so. Sometimes we help the mothers and little children. We buy toys or skates for the school. That may sound paternalistic, but it does help them to stay in school and feel more like the other boys and girls.

Senator Fergusson: Recommendation No. 3 on page 36 of the brief states:

That a study be undertaken of the disparity in income between persons belonging to unions and those who do not.

Maybe, Miss Armstrong, you do not know why this was suggested, but what good would it do? Can they make any recommendations even if they do carry out a study as to the disparity between the groups?

Mrs. Armstrong: I honestly do not know. We are cognizant of this disparity and the fact that it is a contributor to poverty.

The Chairman: Could you guess at the origin of this recommendation?

Mrs. Armstrong: This came in from several sources. It is something that I am primarily concerned with. I think there is far too much disparity, but that is my personal observation.

The Chairman: No; no, it is a very pertinent observation.

Senator Fergusson: There is a recommendation that Indians be appointed to civil service positions which have to do with the administration. You state that there are now only three Indians in such positions out of a total of 63.

Is this acceptable to the Indian people within the present structure? Recently I listened to the Indians from Alberta making a presentation to the Prime Minister. They want to change everything. I do not think they would care very much to have an Indian appointed to administer what now exists.

When an Indian accepts a position such as this, does he not rather put himself on the wrong side of the fence as far as his own people are concerned?

Mrs. Armstrong: This is a study from Brantford. Many of the opinions of Indian people in Ontario are totally different from those held by Indians in other parts of Canada.

Even within the Indian groupings in Ontario there are totally different opinions. However, I think the general concern is that if the Indian people are going to have a say in their future in Canada they could better have it by being put into more responsible positions in a better ratio than 63 to three.

This is a general opinion, but when you point out what happens out west and ask would this be a good thing, it is debatable, because there are many factions within the Indian people.

In some cases I would agree with you.

Senator Fergusson: Some of them think they could work better within the present organization.

Mrs. Armstrong: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: There is a very great diversity of opinion with respect to this.

Mrs. W. M. Marshall, Vice-President, Provincial Council of Women of Ontario: It might be an education for the Indian when he enters the organization and discovers what goes on, its workings and how these things are of benefit to Indians. This was our experience when we went out and discovered aspects of poverty with which we were not previously familiar.

Mrs. Wood: I will explain the context out of which his came. We had three submissions from Brantford. The one from which this came pointed out the feeling of trouble, discontent and misunderstanding which exists between Indians and non-Indians arises from past experiences with those who are in charge of the reservation.

The Chairman: That is the Indian agents.

Mrs. Wood: Yes. It was pointed out that there would be an improvement if, now that Indians are becoming better qualified for these positions, they were to become the civil servants responsible for the administration. I read in the paper the other day that the University of Western Ontario gave an honorary degree to Joseph Charles Hill, who had been superintendent of education on this nation's reserve for a number of years. I think he began in 1946. At the time he started there were 17 attending high school and now there are 407. In that period of time they have had 90 Indians graduate as teachers, 18 as doctors and four as lawyers. This may be an exceptional nation of Indians, I do not know, but it is an outstanding record. The University of Western Ontario was recognizing this man, who had been the superintendent of education there, an Indian.

The Chairman: Of course, the Brantford reservation is an exceptional one, as I believe every one of us knows.

Mrs. Wood: But this is an example of what can be done.

The Chairman: Yes, it can be done.

Mrs. Wood: This can be done if there is an Indian in charge directing the program.

Senator Hastings: I should like to comment on recommendation 17, on page 6, referring to greater encouragement for education,

... by initiating training for children, who are victims of the poverty culture, which would enable them to escape from the poverty cycle and would create in them a desire to escape.

I wonder if Mrs. Armstrong or any other of the ladies here have any specific program in mind for instilling an incentive to escape. Would you tell me how you would do it?

Mrs. Armstrong: That is well put. This was a suggestion that came in. Our feeling as a committee was that often third and fourth generation people find poverty and welfare a way of life. If you want to be analytical and practical, you could perhaps forget about the 40- to 50-age group, because ultimately they will come into social programs which will take care of them. If we are ever to break this cycle in Canada—we are concerned primarily with Ontario—we have to get to the young people; we have to provide incentives to them through education or other programs that will open their eyes to the opportunities available to them in the province, so that they will become self-supporting and self-sufficient, and have incentive, and not feel, "Well fine, I can always fall back on welfare programs".

Senator Hastings: I agree with you, but I want you to tell me how you are going to do this.

Mrs. Armstrong: It will have to be done through an educational process of some description, whether through the school system, Headstart programs, or through a community project that would take the children out of that environment and expose them to other factors in another environment. For instance, take them on trips, to places they might not otherwise go, to stimulate their thinking and their incentive. I think such programs will have to be brought in if we are ever to break this third or fourth generation cycle.

Senator Hastings: I appreciate this. I believe the only way to break this cycle is to instill the incentive, but I just do not know myself how you instill in a child whose father was on welfare the incentive of the value in education, when everything around him tells him he is beat before he starts, he quits before he starts, and he is a school drop-out at 16. I would like to know how you instill an incentive in that boy.

Mrs. Armstrong: That is a big problem. It is a psychological problem too, because there is the other side of the coin, that if you instill this incentive in the child he or she has to go back to that home environment; there is a breakaway from the family there. Even though we say that at certain age groups there is a write-off, if you want to be analytical about it, you still have to keep the incentive within the child such that he respects his parents and understand the environment. It is not a case of instilling just an incentive for him to get out of it. You also have to instill an understanding of why you want him to get out of that setting or environment; it is for his future, but he must still understand why his parents are in that environment. There is great concern that you do not go too far the other way.

Senator Hastings: I appreciate the problem. It is the answer I want to know.

Mrs. Armstrong: I know.

Senator Hastings: What would your views be, or those of any of the ladies—I would like to hear any views—on the payment of a meaningful allowance to high school students of, say, $50 a month. I am just using a figure. I am talking of a meaningful allowance, in consideration of them fulfilling the school term with satisfactory marks, in order, as an incentive, that he remain in school; give him enough money so that he can be part of the school system instead of a drop-out.

Mrs. Armstrong: My personal observation would be that you are treading on dangerous ground.

Senator Hastings: Why?

Mrs. Armstrong: You will have more paid high school students attending high schools for the sake of collecting the cheque than they are for education.

Senator Hastings: Mrs. Armstrong, I was paid to go through university by the Government of Canada.

Mrs. Armstrong: Yes, but I think when you arrive at the university level you are mature enough as an individual to understand and to cope with it. But many children—I call them children—who are in high school today are not mature enough to be able to cope with this. Some are. Nevertheless, I could quote an example from a small town, which happens to be Brantford, where a local alderman, who is a member of our council, said she was dismayed a year ago that many of the young students found a way out; they would leave home; three or four would get together in an apartment, collect a welfare cheque, which they could collect just as long as they attended school. They attended school, not to get an education, but to collect the moneys.

Senator Hastings: Of course, there will always be an abuse of any system you institute, but I am prepared to say that a child of 16 to 20 today is quite capable of handling $50 a month, and a large percentage of them are spending $50 a month, from the upper income groups.

Mrs. Armstrong: Some are spending $50 a week never mind a month. Personally I do not think it is a good idea.

Senator Hastings: You do not think it is a good idea to give a child enough to be part of the system?

Mrs. Armstrong: I think if a child is faced with a dilemma of having to leave school and wants to continue his education, is aware of his responsibility, is aware of the fact that in order to, if you want, survive or to get an education he must have these moneys, and if a proper authority can sit down with him—a member of the school board, of the school staff, the counselling staff, or someone who is competent to speak with him, aware of the fact that these children realize that they have a need for education but in order to get it they must have these moneys—then I agree with you that these moneys should be made available. But to bring it in as a general scheme, no. Personally I would not go for it.

Senator Hastings: Of course, I am not in favour of the means test, but if any child is certainly in need of it . . .

Mrs. Armstrong: If there is a need, yes.

Senator Hastings: . . . and he wants to continue his education, displays his ability and his intent . . .

Mrs. Armstrong: In that case I would agree with it, but not as a general suggestion.

Senator Hastings: You would not agree with it as family allowance?

Mrs. Armstrong: No. That is a personal view.

Senator Hastings: Do any of the other ladies have any views?

The Chairman: Mrs. Palmer and Mrs. Reio want to say something.

Mrs. J. B. Palmer, Co-Chairman, Poverty Study Committee, Provincial Council of Women of Ontario: I was thinking that where we could create an incentive, we could pick up the challenge of Senator Fergusson, possibly by making our neighbourhood organizations—and our local council is an organization in that community—draw these people into our organization so that there would be a neighbourhood pride. Possibly in that way they might get an incentive to get out of this poverty cycle, by really strengthening our neighbourhood organizations, voluntarily or otherwise.

Mrs. Reio: I say that if people do not come to you, you go to the people. I believe Senator Croll has done a wonderful job in having this committee established. Also Mrs. Armstrong at the provincial level and people at the local level have done valuable work. These are small groups all over. We have talked to them and we found out that they are just the same human beings as we are. In visiting their homes you see their needs and that they are not just without money, but without jobs. These people are so bitter inside that they forget they are in this great nation, this wonderful country.

I am from Hamilton. We had a meeting attended by 200 men and women. They would say, "Look, we are just the same as you. We are just the same human beings." That gives them strength to live. We must strengthen them inside and take out this bitterness against somebody else. When we do this I think we will have a wonderful solution.

These small groups are working at every level. I strongly believe that one day we will not have any more trouble about someone being poor. Certainly we will have the poor because there will always be people who do not know how to spend their money.

Now that this committee is in existence, people are reading the newspapers and they know someone is interested in them. They feel that they are a part of society. In Hamilton they really appreciate what we are doing. If we can work this way together it will help the Indians the same way. Sometimes one is so dark inside that he does not know how to come out. If someone comes along and gives you a lift you think that things are not so bad and that tomorrow there will be sunshine. This will happen if we all work together. Thank you.

The Chairman: We have had a good morning. I feel that everyone has had an opportunity to say whatever it was he wished to talk about. I must compliment those who made it possible to draw up an excellent brief, and Mrs. Armstrong for presenting it so well and understandably.

I would like to say to the last speaker that we too appreciate what people are doing. You are making it easier for us and for poor people. I cannot tell you what you should do, because you know best. There are things which trouble us. We are troubled by the fact that you and people like you, including myself and others, have so long been unaware of what has been going on right under our very noses. When you finally face up to the fact, in your quiet moments, you wonder just what you have been doing all the time and how this could have been possible. It is not your fault, but you can help in correcting it. One way to do this is not by waiting for them to come to you, but for you to go to them. It has been said that there is animosity against the environment. You have got to get to the poor and draw them to you. When you have done that half your battle will be over. That is one of the things you can do very well.

On behalf of the committee, I thank you and the other councils.

Mrs. Armstrong: I might say that this brief is the work of all the councils. Thank you.

The committee adjourned.

INTRODUCTION

1. "Turning to our domestic problems, perhaps the most intractable is the continuing poverty of far too many of our citizens ... This problem, however, is one which goes back into our history and which is made more acute by our geography. Even in a unitary state with unlimited funds and manpower we could not eradicate it in a short period. But if we are to live up to the expectations of the Canadian people we must make the best use of available techniques and devise new and better ones to deal with this cruel and costly blemish on our increasingly wealthy society."¹
2. The Canadian Operational Research Society (CORS) is a national society whose object is the advancement of the theory and practice of Operational Research in Canada. Operational Research (OR) is a science that is devoted to describing, understanding, and predicting the behaviour of man-machine systems operating in industrial, military, and governmental environments. It is sometimes defined as the application of the methods used in science to the problems encountered by organizations.
3. Appendix I describes the history of OR from its beginnings during World War II; and important aspects of operational research methods and practice that are bringing increasing benefits in applying the systems approach to organizational problems in industry, government, and the community.
1. Commons Debates, Hansard, September 16, 1968, p.68 (Mr. Trudeau speaking).

4. The Canadian Operational Research Society was founded in 1958. Dr. Omond Solandt, one of the founding organizers, was elected its first President. Society membership has grown during the 60's at an annual rate of 15%, and now totals close to 800 individuals. The national society holds an annual meeting where national members gather to disseminate and exchange new information on OR in Canada. It publishes a technical Journal three times yearly that is sent to all members and to about 700 subscribers in some 30 countries around the world, and is a charter member of the International Federation of Operational Research Societies. Active local sections of the society are organized in six major Canadian centres including Halifax and Vancouver. They hold regular monthly meetings where contemporary OR research work and interdisciplinary studies and problems are vigorously presented and discussed by society members and other interested individuals. These individuals are sometimes professionals who represent other physical and social science disciplines. More often they are managers and decision-makers in Canadian business, government and public institutions who are faced with complex problems which they feel OR approaches can help to solve.

5. When our scientific society was invited to present a brief on poverty in Canada, we were at first skeptical of what help we might be to assist your committee in its deliberations. None of the Officers or Council of the society, nor few if any of its members, work directly with the poor. Few operational research people in Canada are directly concerned in their professional roles with the problems of poverty. Most of them work in industry, government, universities, or professional consulting firms. But in the last few years a number of our members have become involved in one way or another in interdisciplinary studies of socio-economic and social problems. We are becoming increasingly aware of the assistance that the systems approach and OR methods can be to social policy planners, public service administrators, and community workers. We want to demonstrate to others how operational research might help them to better serve the Canadian people.

6. Those of us who have been blessed with that particular kind of scientific interest, training, and experience in studying organizations and systems that characterizes our members, are concerned about poverty in Canada. We want to work with others to remedy, reduce, and ultimately eliminate it. We hope we can make some small contribution to this end through the observations, conclusions, and recommendations contained in this brief.

DEFINING AND ELUCIDATING THE POVERTY PROBLEM

7. In assisting your Committee, our brief will not define poverty in Canada. This has been done by others in the past, perhaps most significantly in terms of income cut-off points suggested by the Economic Council of Canada in its Fifth Annual Review, which among its recommendations regarding the poverty problem, also suggested the creation of this Senate committee of enquiry.

8. Among the 4 or 5 million words of briefs and proceedings which your committee will have generated, a variety of other definitions of poverty have been presented to you. Some of these have been quantitative definitions which identify the poor in terms of their earning power, command over material resources, or opportunities for jobs, food, shelter, education, health care and leisure activities. Other definitions have introduced the concept of a culture of poverty with qualitative identifications of the poor in terms of behaviour traits, attitudinal approaches, belief complexes, and self-identified inferiorities of individuals, families, and communities. The most vivid verbal definitions of all have been those expressed by the poor themselves at these hearings, for example the simple words of Mr. Ivan Guindon in Ottawa² - "When I came out I tried to get myself a job in this trade. When I went to see the first person he said "We do not need people like you around here." I will always remember his words (-----) So I took all my draughting books and everything and threw them away. I went back to what you would call thieving"; and the thoughtful words of Mrs. Bernie O'Connor in Vancouver³ - "Possibly only someone who has been in a low income level for a long time with their whole life occupied in eeking out an existence can fully comprehend how you can lose your self-confidence and faith to such a degree that you finally believe that you are nothing but a drag on your community". Vivid visual definitions of poverty have indoubtably presented themselves to your committee on visits you have made to poorer communities and families during or before your investigation.

2. Proceedings of Senate Committee on Poverty, Tues., Feb. 3, 1970 P.17.10
3. Proceedings of Senate Committee on Poverty, Thurs, Nov. 20, 1969, P.9:19

9. You have been presented with excellent histories of the origins, growth, present status and proposed changes in today's welfare and assistance programs by various government departments and agencies at federal, provincial and local levels. Individual politicians and civil servants have added personal observations about these programs and other development projects which should serve to ameliorate the economic causes of poverty. Briefs from social and welfare organizations, plus statements by their representatives under questioning by your committee, have elucidated many practices, problems and helpful ideas in working with and for the poor to help them meet and beat poverty. And the poor people themselves, or their representative spokesmen, have clearly detailed in many ways what it is like to exist in and struggle against poverty, sometimes with the help of our current welfare system, sometimes despite it, and sometimes without knowing it exists.
10. You have also been presented with many recommendations for assisting the poor. An analysis of specific recommendations contained in a sample of 48 written briefs⁴ published as appendices in your committee proceedings shows the following general categorization:

Number of Briefs Specifically Recommending

More & better education, training & retraining for poor, & particularly for their children	32 (out of 48)
More & better direct financial assistance to poor (guaranteed annual wage, family allowances, negative income tax, old age pensions, etc.)	26
More & better social, community, and supportive services for poor	18
More & better health care services for poor	16

4. The 48 briefs were those remaining out of the 67 written briefs appended to Poverty Committee Proceedings Nos. 1 to 30 dated Monday, November 3, 1969 to Tuesday March 24, 1970; excluding 4 briefs by federal government departments or agencies, and another 17 which did not document specific recommendations.

More & better direct communication with & information to poor	14
More & better local involvement of poor themselves in developing programs to alleviate and remove poverty	12
More & better promotion and encouragement to get general public support and voluntary assistance to poor	10

Out of these 48 briefs, many focussed their attention and recommendations entirely on one area. Others contained 10 to 40 individual recommendations, relating to three or four of the above areas. As your committee is well aware, many briefs recommended other "more's & better's" such as more co-ordination between and among welfare services, social science disciplines and political jurisdictions; more federal-provincial-municipal co-operation; more prevention rather than relief; more economic expansion; more experimental and demonstration projects; and more national and provincial policy regarding poverty. Many briefs also recommended reorganization or reduction of social service jurisdictions, and changing patterns of help at every jurisdictional level. Many briefs recommended changes to reduce degrading practices and remove patronizing and dehumanizing aspects of "welfare services". And many briefs, explicitly or implicitly, recommended more action to help the poor help themselves. As stated in one excellent brief⁵ - "Once aware of the true nature of their condition, these people ("the poor") will indeed be able to help themselves. Then they will be able to tell other Canadians how to help. And only then can we attack the problem of poverty with a force which is meaningful."⁵

5. Brief presented by National Indian Brotherhood of Canada and Indian-Eskimo Association of Canada, No. 19, Tuesday, February 10, 1970, Appendix A, P.19:30

11. Your committee will have a great many facts, figures, ideas, and opinions about poverty to sort out. There are many factual and philosophical inconsistencies - between federal and provincial government submissions; between welfare agencies and the individuals dealing with them; between objectives and achievements of government, agencies, volunteer organizations, and individuals. This is natural. We are all human. We are all different. We all wear many hats. But reflections on human nature do not help your committee.
 12. In the submissions available to you, there is very little information on how to co-ordinate and combine all the evidence, or how to implement many of the recommendations. There is even less information on the implications of implementation. Your committee has often commented on these points during the hearings. To quote from an earlier submission⁶ - "We view poverty as a complex problem that will not be corrected by unitary measures. The architects of the plan to reduce poverty must adopt a systems approach and a global viewpoint". This is why it is difficult, and probably inappropriate, for individual submissions prepared by groups with specific interests and attitudes to comment at this stage of enquiry on the implementation of recommendations or on their implications.
6. Proceedings No.22, Thursday, February 19, 1970, Appendix A, paragraph 27 (brief submitted by Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation).

13. The Economic Council has emphasized the importance of the systems approach in developing more effective anti-poverty policies in Canada, and in conducting a truly comprehensive attack on poverty using help from experts drawn from all the social sciences, and to some extent from the natural sciences as well⁷. Your committee has confirmed the necessity of the systems approach so that the architects of new plans and programs to attack poverty, can properly interrelate all factors in this complex problem. As one committee member has expressed it - "Everything can't be done in a day, and while we must tackle air and water pollution, education, and medical care first, that is not the end of it. All these things link up with other things".⁸

THE SYSTEMS APPROACH TO THE POVERTY PROBLEM

14. How can public servants, social and physical scientists, administrators, and decision-makers, and the poor themselves combine in a systems approach to the poverty problem? Operational researchers are a cross-breed of social and physical scientists, trained and experienced in the analytic tools of both fields. They are used to collecting, interpreting, and analysing information. Good operational researchers communicate effectively with other scientists, administrators, workers, and the public. Operational researchers are professionals in the systems approach.

8. Poverty Committee Proceedings, No.16, Thursday, January 29, 1970, P.16:28 (Senator Fournier speaking from the Chair)

15. Operational research techniques and approaches have proven successful many times in the military, industry, and technical areas of government on organizational problems which are relatively clean-cut, where costs and benefits are relatively easy to measure. They are beginning to be applied with increasing success to problems in social and service institutions, and to socio-economic problems of government and society. Operational research techniques, approaches and practitioners can help to fight poverty by helping government, public servants, and the poor themselves to understand, analyze, and control the poverty problem, and develop new methods to solve it.
16. Operational research and OR models are probably best understood by example. Moreover, examples in one problem environment can frequently serve to indicate possible applicability in another problem environment. Sometimes they can be directly transferred to that environment.
17. Appendix II contains summary descriptions of seven OR applications in industry and government. These examples cover a wide range of system problems, interrelated factors, OR models and approaches, and results achieved. All examples are Canadian. Fuller information regarding each application could be obtained from appropriate members of the Canadian Operational Research Society who were involved in the conception, analysis, and implementation of results of these studies. Some comments follow regarding possible transferrals of the approaches used in each example to help organizations and individuals fighting poverty.

18. Example 1 (Railway Inventories)

Inventory models are one of the oldest and most commonly used OR approaches. Hundreds of Canadian companies, warehouses, and retail stores use them effectively, as do many government warehouses and departments. Large welfare agencies and health and social service centres could lower costs of supplies without affecting service to their communities, or be able to improve their services at no increase in cost, by using simple and easily transferrable inventory models.

19. Example 2: (Oil Refinery Scheduling) -

Linear programming models are one of the most widely and profitably used operational research tools. There should be many applications in the operation of welfare organizations; in locating and organizing new social, educational, and health services for the poor; and in generally optimizing the allocation of scarce physical, financial, and human resources available at any time to fight poverty.

20. Example 3: (Project Planning & Control)

Network analysis techniques have proven very successful when correctly and judiciously applied on major construction projects and other large non-construction programs (e.g. military aircraft acquisition, political campaigns). Acronyms (PERT, CPM, PEP, GASP) and associated false images promoted by overzealous consultants and advertisers notwithstanding, the underlying sound concepts such as events, activities, technological sequence, slack, and network calculation have provided a permanent and useful framework of management knowledge on how to plan, schedule, and control massive programs and projects including getting men on the moon. Government departments, social service agencies, and "poor" communities themselves should make more use of this technique to co-ordinate efforts and reduce delays in planning and implementing new development projects and public service programs. Such co-ordination is particularly valuable when many organizations are involved, or where there is a danger of jurisdictional foot-dragging.

21. Example 4 (Uranium industry policy-planning)

The sort of policy-planning simulation approach used for the uranium industry would be an extremely useful tool for government poverty-program planners at every level. There is considerable evidence that a number of government departments in different jurisdictions are already developing and using such models. Many of these applications are being effectively used to resolve jurisdictional differences in objectives, co-ordinate data from many sources, and assist decision-making on complex issues. Others are being used, often covertly, to support a-priori positions related to jurisdictional disputes. Still others are providing analyses and results which suggest new solutions on complex issues, but they are not being effectively used because administrators and others feel that their time for discussion and implementation "has not yet come".

22. Example 5 (Macro-economic educational planning)

Briefs to the Poverty Committee frequently recommend more and better education for the poor and their children as one major solution to the poverty problem. Models such as the one described for the Ontario educational system can be used to test the likely socio-economic effects of certain government policies regarding educational programs for the poor. Similar OR models of the educational systems in other provinces may already exist, or could be developed on a similar basis, to furnish federal-provincial planners with useful information and analysis concerning the possible effects of national and regional educational policy changes on the poverty problem.

23. Example 6 (Health Sciences Centre Planning)

This example shows how an OR unit operating at a health sciences centre can calculate for students, faculty, and administrators of that centre the implications of any proposed educational program or policy alteration in a short period of time and in considerable detail. This permits systematic, logical planning so that positive proposals originating from within the centre can replace crisis planning and decision making. This application involves two important areas related to suggested action on poverty, the educational and health care areas. It has been designed so that a similar OR model system could be implemented in several centres in a province, or across Canada, so that the characteristics of each local health science centre could be incorporated in an overall policy planning approach. A similar systems approach to policy planning in other poverty program areas such as social and welfare services, and direct financial assistance, might enable the diverse and sometimes conflicting information and ideas from the "poor", and the various agencies and governments assisting them, to be described, co-ordinated and explored. This would better enable local, regional and federal decisionmakers to examine the consequences of alternative plans, policies, and programs proposed to fight poverty.

24. Example 7 . (Water Resource Planning) -

The management of water resources involves large allocations of public funds and resources, and in effect brings about some redistribution of "real" wealth. For example, multi-purpose flood control reservoirs are commonly used for recreational purposes. The location of reservoirs, transportation facilities, admission prices, and a number of other factors affect the recreational opportunities of various classes of people, including the poor. Public works programmes connected with water resource management are commonly used to provide local employment opportunities for unemployed people (e.g. through Federal funding of "winter works" projects). The effects of water resource development projects on the poor can be evaluated using systems analyses models.

25. The previous 7 examples of OR studies from Canadian experience range from relatively simple tactical examples to broad policy planning examples, some far from the poverty problem, others in areas close to it. There are many more examples of multidisciplinary studies involving OR models that have been applied successfully in Canada, the United States, and elsewhere to socio-economic problems and public service or resource systems (like Examples 5, 6 and 7). Because they use the systems approach to model and evaluate cost effectiveness in those areas where the "poor" need "more", a few studies which might interest and inform your committee, and those who will act on its findings, include:

- a simulation model of community colleges in Ontario;
- macro-analysis of public education systems in the United States;
- urban planning model systems;
- models to assist fire-fighting and rent-control programs in poor areas in New York City;

- models of the total criminal justice system in the United States;
- models to assist personal decision-making in population and family planning;
- an optimization model related to tuberculosis epidemiology;
- systematizing health care priorities and expectations in rural areas;
- study of the welfare cost of health insurance in the United States;
- methods and concepts of an interdisciplinary regional hospital system;
- policy analysis of economic opportunity programs in the United States.

Our society would be pleased to assist your committee in obtaining further information on these or other OR studies related to needs of and services for the "poor" if you so requested.

26. A final example of an OR model approach to one aspect of the poverty problem is presented in Appendix III to this brief entitled "A Note on Poverty and a Guaranteed Minimum Income". This note was prepared by one of our society's members, and the CORS National Council unanimously approved its inclusion with our brief. More direct financial assistance to the "poor" has been recommended in many submissions to your committee, and particular attention has been paid to one form of this assistance, a guaranteed minimum income. Appendix III includes some background discussion and problem definition of the poverty problem. It then uses a simplified mathematical model to analyze alternatives and draw conclusions regarding the implications of a guaranteed minimum income. The data used in the analysis is illustrative. Better guaranteed annual wage models using better data have undoubtedly been developed within the Economic Council and in a number of Federal and Provincial government departments. Fuller analyses and conclusions regarding the effects of a guaranteed annual income may already have been presented to your committee. We have included this analysis merely to illustrate how a systematic description of the poverty problem and a simplified mathematical model can be used to draw some general conclusions about one proposed policy alternative aimed at alleviating poverty. Some important points developed in Appendix III are:

- a) Only governments have the breadth of interest to put the poverty problem in context, and the resources to do something about it.
- b) Some redistribution of net individual income is justified, and the concept of a guaranteed minimum income is certainly worth investigation.
- c) In a free enterprise social system, it is probably easier to provide income than to provide work.
- d) It would appear that a guaranteed income in the range of $500 to $1,000 per head would be feasible if redistribution of income is the way to provide it and the rate of taxation is to remain within a reasonable range.

CONCLUSIONS

27. We agree with the Prime Minister, the Economic Council, and the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, that new ideas and approaches are needed to alleviate and eradicate poverty in Canada. New methodologies and analytic expertise are also needed to help groups and individuals test and evaluate the feasibility of these new ideas and approaches and their true costs and benefits to the "poor" and the rest of the people of Canada.
28. Poverty in Canada takes many forms. It exists in many places, and has different definitions. There are many ways of attacking poverty. The success of most of them will depend on the willingness of "richer Canadians" to help "poorer Canadians", and to transfer some of their present and future riches so that the "poor" can help themselves.
29. Any decision is the result of a process involving interest reconciliation, political and moral considerations, and analysis of information. The systems approach and operations research deal with information and analysis. Good information is not knowledge. There is no direct flow from operational research to action. But good operational research provides insurance against bad decisions and can play an important role in organizing for action and assessing its effectiveness. Good operational research can help decision-makers who are wrestling with the poverty problem to make wise decisions and take effective action which should involve, and will affect all Canadians.

RECOMMENDATIONS

30. Recommendation 1: - The systems approach, and operational research, should be used in formulating new policies and programs to reduce and eliminate poverty, whether these policies and programs are federal, provincial, local, or interjurisdictional. The Senate Committee on Poverty is to be congratulated for making use of operational research methods to co-ordinate and analyze the evidence before it, and evaluate the possible implications of recommendations it may bring down.
31. Recommendation 2: - There should be more interdisciplinary teams including public servants, social workers, social and natural scientists, and the "poor" themselves studying poverty problems and implementing new approaches. Operational research workers could make valuable contributions on such teams.
32. Recommendation 3: - Any recommendation for action on poverty which proposes greater use of limited resources to fight poverty (e.g. - more education, more social services, more health care, more assistance) should be fully evaluated and tested, using suitable cost/benefit analysis, before it is adopted.
33. Recommendation 4: - Educational institutions and faculty teaching operational research techniques should encourage students to work on social and socio-economic problems like "poverty in Canada", and should try to organize theses or research projects which would bring OR students and community groups together to model and analyze social problems in the community. Control of the particular studies and implementation of their results should rest with the user groups.

54. Recommendation 5: - Operational research specialists should switch their attention from narrowly defined, specialized, and relatively easy problems in the military, industry, government and "academia"; and start confronting the real social and political problems in the world (like poverty, and action on poverty) in all their disorganized complexity. This will only be possible if government and social planners and administrators make a psychological commitment to the systems approach to social problems. Appropriate OR models will enable decision-makers to examine the consequences of alternative plans and programs that will help the "poor" and affect Canadian society. Decision-makers who are reluctant to describe and explore alternatives cannot take advantage of OR models.

APPENDIX IIINOTE ON POVERTY AND A GUARANTEED MINIMUM INCOME

1. Poverty is a relative state and its existence can only be recognized by reference to some explicit or tacit standard. The major barrier to approaching the problem in a scientific or logical manner is the multiplicity of standards and criteria. As a consequence, most analyses of the problem are carried out from the point of view of some interested organization, usually with undue concentration on some specific type of hardship.
2. The first essential is to recognize the existence of two types of poverty:
 - a) Group Poverty: the common poverty of groups of people due to a temporarily or permanently unfavourable environment.
 - b) Individual Poverty: arising from personal or family misfortune which depresses the individual's income below the norm of the group to which he belongs.

Welfare organizations should be primarily concerned with the second type. However, they are increasingly concerned with the first type which is usually beyond their resources; only governments have the breadth of interest to put the problem in context and the resources to do something about it.

3. The aim should be to solve the problem of group poverty either by removing it or making it supportable. If this could be done, cases of individual poverty would be few enough to be dealt with by voluntary organizations or perhaps on some kind of insurance basis. This would also concentrate the emotional appeal on those few cases with special needs rather than spreading it over a large proportion of the population as at present. It is almost a truism that our society and economy as presently organized depends on the existence of group poverty, two notable groups being the elderly and the unskilled. There are also some groups such as young adults and teenagers who appear over-privileged. It would appear, therefore, that some redistribution of income is justified, consequently the concept of a guaranteed minimum income is certainly worth investigation. The difficulty with the concept lies in fixing the level of guarantee. If it is based on aspirations, the desired level will continuously increase; what appears satisfactory now when many are below it will not satisfy when everyone receives that much or more. For that reason the level should be fixed from the other end, namely according to what the economy can afford or what the public is prepared to pay rather than according to the level desired. This approach has the administrative advantage that the level of guarantee and the cost can be readily evaluated.

HUMAN RIGHTS

4. Even if the problem is approached from the point of view of what we can afford, it is still necessary to justify income redistribution to make it palatable. This is perhaps best done on the basis of accepted human rights. Some candidates for consideration are discussed below.
5. Right to Survive: This right seems to be universally recognized, even sometimes in the extreme cases of convicted murderers. Major efforts are made to save any human life where the need is apparent, although it is believed that there are still cases where nothing is done because the need is unrecognized.
6. Right to Work: This is a right which many people believe in but it is not officially recognized. So long as the rate of unemployment is regarded as a variable which can be manipulated to control the economy, or so long as a free enterprise system exists, a reservoir of unemployment is almost essential. It is probably easier to provide income than to provide work.
7. Right to Live without Excessive Hardship: This right is recognized in varying degrees by governments and most individuals. The mass media have fostered a decidedly inflated idea of what constitutes a normal standard of living. They also publicize cases of extreme hardship, but there is no real indication of an acceptable standard between these extremes. Certainly in Canada a certain minimum standard of accommodation, heating, and food is necessary in order to survive, but there is no agreement on what it is and no evidence that anyone is trying to provide it at minimum cost. Once again it seems better to approach the problem from the other end, determine what could be afforded as a guaranteed minimum income, and then attempt to provide facilities for living as comfortably as possible on that income. Much might be done in that way. For example the range for rents for housing is now quite inconsistent with the range of quality; as much might be paid for a slum flat as for a middle class family home.

8. Right to Equality: In North America, the right to equality is a heresy which is only accepted in education. A life cycle starting off with great inequality in childhood followed by a period of equality in university at a reasonably affluent level is poor preparation for adulthood in a free economy which depends on a supply of workers at all income levels. If education continues on its present lines, the next generation may possibly be disposed to a greater degree of equality in incomes which would allow higher guaranteed incomes, but I doubt it.

THE APPROACH

9. Since there are almost as many definitions of poverty in terms of income as there are interest groups, it is impossible to state an agreed minimum income in advance. To analyze a range of possible levels, it is desirable to use a parametric approach. This is relatively easy if income distribution among the population can be expressed in a simple mathematical form, but is likely to be tedious if such an expedient is not available. For a quick preliminary analysis, a simple distribution has been assumed which is believed to give the right kind of variation, although the fit has not been tested. More information would allow the parameters to be adjusted to give a closer fit. Moreover, all distinctions other than income have been ignored; for example, it is assumed that everyone has some income. This implies that family income is distributed among the members of the family and the guaranteed minimum income applies to all individuals. Once the simplified analysis has been carried out, the complication of family and class could be introduced as a second stage in the calculations, if the necessary data was available.

10. Example: In this example, the distribution of individual income in the population is assumed to be log-normal, i.e. the logarithm of the income is normally distributed with a mean of 3.11 and a standard deviation of 0.5. Details of the calculations are given in a supplement. With this distribution, the mean income per head is approximately $2500 which agrees approximately with the 1968 figures given in the Canadian Statistical Review (total personal income $51,600 millions, population 20.4 millions). The cumulative distribution is shown in Fig 1. Using the distribution it is easy to calculate for any level of guaranteed income:

- a) The percent of population whose income would have to be supplemented to some degree to bring their income up to the minimum.
- b) Assuming that tax is only levelled on that part of income in excess of the guaranteed minimum, what percentage tax on it would be necessary to provide the supplementary income.

- c) Assuming that a general tax equal to say 10% of the total of all personal incomes is required in addition to the tax for income redistribution, what percentage tax on excess income is required to provide both.

Curves showing these percentages as a function of guaranteed minimum income are given in Fig 2.

11. Results: From the curves of Fig 2, a number of interesting deductions can be made. For example:

- a) If income is evenly distributed at $2500 a head, 71% of the population will be receiving an income supplement. The other 29% will be financing this by giving up all their income in excess of $2500, i.e. a 100% tax.
- b) If 10% of total income is required as general tax, thus reducing the amount available for redistribution, the maximum level of guaranteed income falls to $2250. In this case about 68% receive a supplement, the remaining 32% provide it and the general tax.
- c) If the guaranteed income is fixed at the median level of $1300, 50% will receive a supplement and the remaining 50% will be taxed at a rate of 22% to pay for it (or at 37% if the 10% general tax on all income must be covered in addition).

- e) It would appear that a guaranteed income in the range of $500 to $1000 per head would be feasible if redistribution of income is the way to provide it and the rate of taxation is to remain within a reasonable range. Even this would involve distribution of income to 20 to 40% of the population so distribution costs are likely to be a major item.
- f) Since it costs in excess of $3000 to support a student at a university for one year, the provision of this for everyone must inevitably lower the level of guaranteed income that could be afforded for other classes.

REMARKS

12. The kind of analysis carried out above could answer vital questions and should be done properly if possible. However, there is always a deficiency of accurate data. Even when this is so, there are many approximations and expedients that can be used to build up a general picture as the example shows. The actual figures quoted should, however, be treated with considerable reserve.

APPENDIX III - SUPPLEMENT 1

1. Let the population be N .

Let the medium individual income be A_0 and $m = \log_{10} A_0$.

Individual income I is assumed to be log-normally distributed

i.e. $x = \log_{10} I$ is normally distributed about a mean " m " with $SD = \sigma = 0.5$

The proportion of population with an income less than B (where $\log_{10} B = c$) is given by $$F_B = \frac{1}{\sigma^2 \sqrt{2\pi}} \int_{-\infty}^{c-m} \exp\left(-x^2/2\sigma^2\right) dx$$

2. The average income is given by

3. The total of all incomes less than B is $NS(F_B)$ where $S(F_B)$ is given by

$$S(F_B) = \frac{\bar{A}}{\sigma^2 \sqrt{2\pi}} \int_{-\infty}^{c+\alpha\sigma^2-m} \exp\left(-x^2/2\sigma^2\right) \cdot dx$$

Consequently the amount required to bring all incomes less than B up to B is

4. The total amount of individual incomes in excess of B which is assumed to be partly available for redistribution to those receiving less than B is

Therefore the percentage of excess income required to bring up the minimum income to B is

$$100 \cdot \frac{B F_B - S(F_B)}{\bar{A} - S(F_B) - (1-F_B) B}$$

5. If there is a general tax of $x\%$ of total incomes which has priority over any redistribution tax, the percentage of incomes in excess of B required to provide both the tax and the money for redistribution is

$$100 \cdot \frac{B F_B - S(F_B) + 0.01 x \bar{A}}{\bar{A} - S(F_B) - (1-F_B) B}$$

6. For the rough calculations made $N = 20$ million

$$A_0 = $1300 \quad m = 3.11 \quad \sigma = 0.5$$

This gives

$$\bar{A} \approx $2500$$

DEFINITION: Poverty is living in an environment in which one cannot cope with the accepted standard of living.

I. INTRODUCTION

1 The Provincial Council of Women of Ontario, organized in 1923, is a Federation of local councils in seventeen cities and towns and ten provincially organized societies. Whether at the local, provincial, national or international level, Councils of Women are Federations of various societies and associations working together for the betterment of conditions pertaining to the family and the state, and for the creation of an informed public opinion.

2 These objectives were well and truly served during the past six months as member councils have shared in an investigation and study of poverty as it relates to the aged, the one-parent family, the unemployed, the disadvantaged, the working poor, the Indian and Metis peoples, and to those engaged in farming in certain rural areas. The existence, and to some degree, the extent of poverty has been realized by those taking part in this study. Poverty has been given visibility with the result that certain attitudes towards those affected by it have changed and an understanding has developed with regard to its social and economic implications. Excerpts from reports illustrate this fact. "We feel that we have learned a great deal about the problems of our area in working on this study on poverty." "Many times during the course of this study I have asked myself, 'What is poverty?' The same answer recurs to me. Poverty is living in an environment in which one cannot cope with the accepted standard of living. Primitive man living in the jungle has law and order to live by. He worships his gods, but he has no clothing, no elaborate shelter, no stockpile of food. He is happy. He is in his own environment. He is not living in poverty." Speaking of people in a rural area who are just getting by, one report says, "The poor here consider themselves poor but not to be 'living in poverty' - poor is something that can happen to you through no fault of your own but 'living in poverty' somehow implies a lack in personality, a lack of ability or know-how and pride."

2 Prior to our study of poverty, our considerations of the poor and those living on welfare were too often conditioned by images and stereotypes. The real value of this study will probably not lie in the ideas which we express in this Brief but rather it will be measured by the extent to which we have changed those hard-core attitudes which we held towards the poor. It will be measured by the extent of our realization that the solution does not lie in a proliferation of welfare programmes as they exist today but rather in making good the claim that Canadian Society is one of equal opportunity. The poor lack many things but surely their most fundamental lack is one of opportunity.

4 This Brief is a condensation of the reports of the studies done by volunteers who are members of Councils of Women in eleven communities in the province. For example, Windsor Council reported on a study of that group of people who are able to work but who are without jobs; Kingston Council reported on housing problems of low income families and welfare recipients; St. Catharines and London Councils investigated poverty among the aged; Georgetown and Chatham Councils confined their investigations to poverty in adjacent farming communities. The recommendations came out of the studies and are in line with accepted policies of the Provincial Council of Women.

5 For the purposes of the studies, we used as a reference point the poverty lines established by the Economic Council of Canada.*

*The Fifth Annual Review, Economic Council of Canada - Using 1968 dollar purchasing power and annual income, poverty lines were set at $1,800 for a single person; $3,000 for a family of two; $3,600 for a family of three; $4,200 for a family of four; $4,800 for a family of five.

II - SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That adjustments in old age security benefits be directly related to the consumer price index and the purchasing power of the dollar.
2. That old age pensioners with supplement who own and live in their own homes be exempt from school taxes on their homes.
3. That one of the existing agencies set up and operate a senior citizens' counselling service centre where older people could discuss and obtain information and counselling.
4. That information regarding welfare programmes and all forms of assistance available to pensioners be included in mailings of pension cheques.
5. That radio and TV stations include in public service announcements information directly concerning pensioners as spot announcements.
6. That municipal welfare departments consider subsidizing organizations that undertake the provision of Meals on Wheels to pensioners.
7. That prescription drugs be made available through Medicare, to pensioners who are receiving supplementary assistance.
8. That day nurseries be made more readily available where the need is evident.

II - SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS (continued)

9. That single parents be permitted to earn supplementary income in addition to Welfare and Mothers' Allowance payments; this additional amount to be determined annually for each family according to its size and to be sufficient to maintain a reasonably acceptable environment for the family.
10. That day care for children of single parent families be subsidized so that the financial burden of such care be substantially reduced.
11. That day care costs be deductible for income tax purposes.
12. That dental and optical services be included under the National Health Service (OHSIP).
13. That single parent families have priority in obtaining low rental housing.
14. That each provincial Government set up a provincially administered maintenance award fund into which defendants would be compelled to pay their maintenance payments and out of which dependent families would receive regularly the maintenance awarded by the court, independently of the amounts paid into the fund by the estranged father; and that the onus for collecting and administering the maintenance awards be assumed by the province.
15. That the various Government departments and social agencies institute creative and innovative means of communication with single parent families in order that such families become fully aware of all the services which are available to them.

16. That there be a complete overhaul of our present welfare policies since these do little to lessen the incidence of poverty or to restore dignity.
17. That greater encouragement should be given to persons to take advantage of courses offered for training and retraining:
 - a) by developing programmes to motivate their escape from the poverty cycle; b) by creating incentives to motivate adults to overcome their inadequacies in education, employment, income, housing and parenthood; c) by initiating training for children, who are victims of the poverty culture, which would enable them to escape from the poverty cycle and would create in them a desire to escape.
18. That a study be undertaken of the disparity in income between persons belonging to unions and those who do not.
19. That projects be established in areas which are populated predominantly by recent immigrants, similar to the Toronto project known as "Services for Working People".
20. That the Government expand its credit to Indians who qualify for loans for mortgages to buy homes.
21. That Indians be appointed to civil service posts which have to do with the administration of Government programmes for Indians.
22. That the Government of Canada, through combining the resources of its retraining programme with that of economic development, make it possible for native communities to initiate industries, thus providing employment on or near the reservation.

23. That Governments seek to prevent through more adequate allowances the cultural alienation of the physically handicapped person who must live in an institution.
24. That in setting allowances, Governments take greater notice of additional expenses faced by some physically handicapped persons.
25. That automobile licences for paraplegics and others who cannot travel by public transportation to their places of employment be reduced in price or issued free-of-charge.
26. That other provinces follow the lead of British Columbia in returning to paraplegics and others who must travel to their places of employment by car at the end of the year money paid in provincial gasoline tax.
27. That Manpower offices be required to bring to the attention of employers the ability and availability of handicapped personnel.
28. That Governments consider allowing the handicapped person to earn a much higher amount before the disability allowance is reduced.
29. That minimum wage laws be examined to insure that they protect the handicapped worker who is fully capable of performing on the job, without reducing opportunities for seriously handicapped persons who, by special arrangement, might be employed at a lower rate.

30. That there be additional research which may lead to a better understanding of the problem and to a decrease in the incidence of retardation.
31. That since sales taxes fall most heavily on low income people, they be a matter for immediate study by Government.
32. That the way in which all forms of taxation enter into consumer prices be a matter for immediate study by Government in the interest of low-income people.
33. That Governments make long-range plans for control of Government spending.
34. That the Prices and Incomes Commission be urged to continue to press labour to agree to co-operate in the efforts to fight inflation.
35. That the Government establish a permanent commission or board on the status of women.
36. That Government be requested to increase the basic exemption in the Income Tax Act.
37. That the Government be asked to study further its proposal for child care expenses in an effort to find a method that will benefit the low-income earner.
38. That the Minister of Health and Welfare be urged to table at the earliest possible moment, the White Paper on Social Security referred to in the Speech from the Throne (October 23, 1969) in order that there may be a better informed public discussion of incentives and related matters.

39. That there be more basic study of the subject of minimum wages.
40. That the Government be urged to remove the 12 per cent federal sales tax on margarine.
41. That there be a study of the possibility of making the declaration of personal bankruptcy more readily available to low-income people who cannot otherwise be helped.
42. That all levels of Government jointly support information bureaux operated at the municipal level to provide information and act as referral services.
43. That more study and experimentation be undertaken in Canada to find the best method to assist the working poor to rise beyond the poverty level.

III. THE AGED

6 When we read in the Fifth and Sixth Annual Reviews of the Economic Council of Canada, in statements by the Canadian Welfare Council, the Ontario Welfare Council and in the daily newspapers that there are about one and a half million Canadians who are 65 years of age and over; that a large percentage of them are unemployed; that they are living, by the hundreds, below the poverty line established by the Economic Council of Canada; that the chances of being poor are many times greater if the head of the family is 65 years or over; we know that poverty among the aged is a serious problem and we say that it is a problem which requires immediate action.

7 Most of these older citizens are caught in this bind through economic circumstances over which they had little control. They are poor, not because they are lazy, shiftless, indifferent or simply willing to live on hand-outs, but because they were victims of the depression era during the most productive years of their lives. The majority of these people whom we interviewed or contacted believe that such necessities as shelter, clothing, food, health services and small comforts should be their social right and that they should have assurance that these are going to be available to them so that these latter years of their lives can be free from anxieties and actual need. If social rights are to have any meaning then the standard of living of the aged should not decline when that of other citizens is rising. One step which could be taken towards this end would be to relate the adjustments in old age security benefits to the consumer price index. This would not guarantee that the standard of living of the aged would keep pace with the rising standards of the rest of the nation but it would keep it from continually decreasing. The 2% limit on the annual increase should be dropped at once and replaced by an escalation clause tied to the consumer price index. (There has been a 16.5% loss in purchasing power in the five years ending in 1969.)

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That adjustments in old age security benefits be directly related to the consumer price index and the purchasing power of the dollar.

8 A survey conducted in the City of St. Catharines and the County of Lincoln where the percentage of the population 65 years and over is higher than the national average,* resulted in the following findings and comments:

Income Source - 70% old age pension only 30% old age pension and other sources

- 55% were independent of family
- 42% had no form of entertainment
- 42% required further health services
- 40% never had a vacation
- 12% found their diet inadequate
- 49% were not in good health
- 70% require prescription drugs
- 46% were not familiar with financial help available from agencies other than welfare

9 A survey of accommodation showed that seven senior citizens' homes and ten nursing homes provide adequate accommodation for those requiring it at present. However, a change in the Ontario Hospital Services policy regarding discharge of patients will increase the needs for convalescent homes.

* Population by age groups - 1966 census -
 65 and over - National average is 7.7%
 St. Catharines - 7.8%, Lincoln County - 8.2%

10 THE REAL SHORTAGE exists in low cost housing units where there are 350 applications on the waiting list. High rent is the most severe problem for pensioners, forcing many into light housekeeping rooms and attic apartments, which are the most expensive and least desirable in terms of value received.

11 A significant number of old age pensioners find it impossible to continue to live in their own homes although they sincerely desire to do so. "Being in one's own home avoids the tensions of family conflict with children and in-laws and frees the pensioner from the fear of increases in rent and eviction." Annual increases in property taxes are forcing many to give up their homes. They believe that they should be exempt from school tax although they are willing to pay taxes for other services.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That old age pensioners with supplement who own and live in their own homes be exempt from school taxes on their homes.

12 Many senior citizens do not know about the help which is available to them from private social agencies and organizations. It is perhaps understandable in a rapidly changing society that people could be unaware of programmes available from private agencies and that they could also be uninformed about changes in assistance programmes and regulations regarding them. Although changes in availability of assistance are given publicity, it is easy to miss reading the newspaper or hearing the radio newscast just when changes are announced. Cases came to light in our investigations where persons were enduring unnecessary hardship because they were not informed as to the appropriate agency from which help could have been forthcoming. A senior citizens' counselling service under one of the existing agencies would be a great boon to those who need to talk over difficulties, where information and helpful advice would be available. Such counselling service centres would have to be in a central location and easily reached by public transportation. Problems such as types and costs of available accommodation, finances, in fact, just the simple problems of living in a changed environment could be discussed and information furnished. By discussing health needs, hours of waiting in a doctor's or a dentist's office could be avoided. It could put a senior citizen in contact with an optometrist, a chiropodist, a chiropractor or assist in getting a hearing aid. Counselling experience in geriatrics would be required for such a centre but the services of volunteers could also be utilized. Information could be put right into the hands of pensioners through enclosures in envelopes along with the monthly pension cheque. A series of spot announcements about services available to the aged could be given on radio and TV as part of the public service announcements. Local stations could make announcements relevant to the local community. Repetition of the same information at intervals would be desirable and all to the good. Organizations within the church often have organized programmes for visiting senior citizens and many have clubs for them. Information pertaining to welfare and assistance programmes could be a regular service offered by church organizations.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That one of the existing agencies set up and operate a senior citizens' counselling service centre where older people could discuss and obtain information and counselling.

13 Meals on wheels is a valuable programme now being offered by some organizations. One good meal at regular intervals, served at cost, in the pensioner's home breaks the monotony of toast and tea and lessens the incidence of malnutrition. A problem in continuing and expanding this valuable programme is the rising cost of food and too few volunteers. Municipal welfare departments would be well advised to consider subsidizing an organization that would undertake this programme.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

- a) That information regarding welfare programmes and all forms of assistance available to pensioners be included in mailings of pension cheques.
- b) That radio and TV stations include in public service announcements information directly concerning pensioners as spot announcements.
- c) That municipal welfare departments consider subsidizing organizations that undertake the provision of Meals on Wheels to pensioners.

Some typical comments made by pensioners are:

- 1. Rents are too high for most older people.
- 2. Low rental housing is badly needed.
- 3. Rent restrictions are needed - a house rented for $35.00 per month until last year, now the rent has been raised to $95.00 per month.
- 4. The cost of food is too high for those living on the old age pension to have a balanced diet.
- 5. A reduction in food, clothing and drug prices is badly needed.

6. It is obvious that those of us on a fixed income or on O.A.P. have a very real problem as inevitable expenses occur.
7. It seems that every month the cost of essentials is up in price.
8. Financial help with drugs would help greatly.
9. Inadequate income is the biggest trouble in obtaining medical needs.
10. If only the price of drugs was brought down, this would be a welcome relief.
11. Formulation of a comprehensive medicare programme with premiums related to ability to pay would help the pensioner.
12. Reduced fares on buses would help disabled pensioners.
13. Everyone on a pension or on O.A.P. should have at least one radio for entertainment.

Quotes from the London Council Report:

14 The extent of poverty among the aged is not readily apparent. It is hidden behind the curtained door of a forty-five year old house; it is within the partitions of a three-room flat made out of living rooms of an old mansion; it is a chilly bedroom with a few shelves and a hot plate in the clothes closet; it may also be found in municipal, private and nursing homes for senior citizens. It can be discovered by the watchful eye and the listening ear. We listened and we heard: - "I have to keep this pail here to catch the drip. I haven't been able to manage to have my roof repaired." "I've cut my circulation pills down to one a day so that I can make them last from one pension cheque to the next." "I tried to make some biscuits but there is something wrong with the oven so I made pancakes instead. You know I am right out of bread but I can't go to the store until my pension cheque comes."

"Coffee is such a terrible price that I have started drinking hot water with powdered milk and sugar. Maybe it is better for me anyway."

15 After working a lifetime to educate children, pay off a mortgage so as to own a modest home, after keeping the ever-increasing taxes paid on it, and after struggling to build up a nest egg so as to live in dignity, people reach retirement and find that existence is a real struggle. Well may they ask the question, "Prolong life! What for?" Many are forced to sell their homes to move into cheaper quarters or into a lodge or senior citizens' home where their pension barely covers the monthly cost. They are dependent and forced to live out their lives on a small subsidy in an affluent society.

16 The high cost of prescription drugs and the hardship experienced by pensioners in paying for these, calls for some action to lessen this burden.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That prescription drugs be made available through Medicare, to pensioners who are receiving supplementary assistance.

CHAPTER III - RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That adjustments in old age security benefits be directly related to the consumer price index and the purchasing power of the dollar.
2. That old age pensioners who own and live in their own homes be exempt from school taxes on their homes.

IV. RURAL POVERTY

17 The existence and extent of poverty in rural areas was investigated by councils in urban communities where the adjacent farming area is a significant factor in the economy. In substance, the report from Chatham Council said that from contacts which were made with farm families during the study period, it was concluded that "those families that are living in dignity and pride have learned to live within their means." Those who said that their income was not sufficient for food and warm clothing for their children were those who did not have the knowledge or the inclination to establish priorities in their spending. "They waste their worldly goods and expect hand-outs", the report said.

18 The most severe hardships are suffered by those on marginal farms. For example, heavy rains causing flooding last year wiped out the entire crop, in which case the whole family takes on part-time and odd jobs. The father and older children may pick fruit and vegetables, the mother may work in the canning factory during the run. There is no welfare for these cases so they get out and find temporary jobs and hope for better luck next year.

19 A number of non-farming families live in rented houses on farms. It was found that in some cases the head of the family limits the number of weeks he works so as to be eligible for welfare. Houses, often the former hired man's house, can be rented cheap on farms in the area. For example, for $50.00 per month a family can rent a warm house with electricity, running water and a central heating plant. Examples of interviews were included as follows:

- a) A family of seven - two children in secondary and three in elementary school - a share cropper, raising tobacco and cucumbers. Benefits were a free house and garden. Expenses included utilities in the home, car, food, clothing, miscellaneous: Food ($40.00 per month) - $2,080.00; Clothing (Buying in the Spring and Fall) - $2,000.00; Car (Installments, Gas, Upkeep) - $500.00; Utilities (Gas, Hydro, Water) - $200.00; Taxes, Insurance, Medicare - $1,000.00; Miscellaneous and Savings - $300.00

- b) This family has lived in Canada for six years. They raise tobacco and the father picks up as much part-time work as he can during his off season. The whole family helps with the farm work during the summer and at tobacco harvest time. The man and his wife, with help of the two older children on week-ends strip the tobacco. The father says that the family likes working out-of-doors and that anyway he does not have enough education to work elsewhere. His income is considerably higher here than it was in the old country. He appreciates the education his children are getting and thinks that they will be able to earn a good living without working as hard as he does. He would like to own his own farm but he says that is not going to be possible because it takes all he can make to live. For dental care, glasses, drugs, he has nothing to spend.
- c) A family of five - three children in school. The father is a hired man working for a farmer who raises pigs, tobacco, potatoes, grain and some fruit. He is earning $75.00 per week and receiving family allowance for the children. He has a free house and utilities, a garden and fruit. The farmer pays his medicare, hospitalization, unemployment insurance and contributions to the pension plan. His expenses are: Food - $1,000.00; Clothing - $1,000.00; Car - $750.00; Insurance - $500.00; Miscellaneous - $200.00; and the most he can hope to save is about $500.00 a year.

20 A survey was also made of wages paid for various types of farm work: A hired man working by the year - $75.00 per week; a share-cropper - 50% of the selling price of the crop; for day labourers - tobacco harvest - $2.00 per hour; stripping tobacco in winter - $1.65 per hour; picking tomatoes - 20¢ a basket; picking strawberries - 10¢ a quart; raspberries - 10¢ a pint; picking cherries 35¢ per six-quart basket; picking pears, peaches and plums - $1.50 per hour; grading and packing fruit - $1.50 per hour; canning factory - $1.25 per hour.

21 The report offered no solutions to the problems of poverty as they saw it. It would appear that in the cases cited, a lack of education and a lack of capital are unsurmountable barriers to improved economic circumstances. If, however, we are to have berries, fruits and vegetables, yes, and even tobacco, these crops must be picked and graded and packed by hand. Higher rates of pay for these workers would probably price these items out of the market.

22 The comment, "We feel that we have learned a great deal about the problems of our area in working on this study of Poverty", was the brightest note in this report.

23 A different set of circumstances was evident in the report from Georgetown Council of Women. There the incidence of poverty is slight with only scattered instances of it on the fringe of villages and towns in the area. With the industrialization of the area, it is not difficult to find employment. Where poverty does exist it was found to be due to one or another of the following causes: a) inability to budget for family needs, or improvidence; b) itinerancy; c) too many children in a family, indicating a lack of family planning; d) long-term illness of a parent; e) second and third generation relief recipients to whom poverty has become a way of life; f) the one parent family (almost invariably female).

24 It was found that those who have the least to say about poverty were those who put up the most determined effort to better their conditions and to hide the fact that they are poor.

25 There was considerable evidence that day care centres are urgently needed to make it possible for mothers to accept employment. In the cases of the single parent families and the low income families, day care is a necessity which must be given highest priority.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That day nurseries be made more readily available where the need is evident.

CHAPTER IV - RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That day nurseries be made more readily available where the need is evident.

V. HOUSING AND LIVING CONDITIONS

26 It is in housing and living conditions that the corrosiveness and misery of poverty becomes clearly visible to us. We have little difficulty in understanding the social handicaps and the loss of morale, of public order and civilized relationships which are products of ugly surroundings, inadequate facilities, overcrowding and a low status address.

27 While maintaining that the City of Kingston cannot be classified as an average city, a report from a study committee of the Council of Women there stated that Kingston does have its share of poor people whose living conditions may well be typical. This committee found that two factors contributed to the state of living conditions, one internal and the other external, as follows:

Internal

- a) low earning power due to lack of education and training
- b) mother working and house not kept on day-to-day basis
- c) large family of children in crowded quarters
- d) poor management of income by both mother and father
- e) one parent homes
- f) mother lacking in housekeeping know-how or, if working, too weary to care
- g) frustration due to not being able to save enough for a down payment on a home
- h) poor relationship between tenant and landlord

External

- a) rising cost of land and lack of serviced lots
- b) high cost of building material
- c) slum landlords take advantage of their position. They can charge any rent they wish and still get it. (In Kingston, there is an influx of 4,400 students, or about 70% of total enrolment, living off campus).

- d) Rents are high as illustrated by the fact that average weekly wage is $100.00 per week and the average rent for a three bedroom apartment is $175.00. (It is generally estimated that a fair price for rent should not be more than the average weekly income.)
- e) Thirty per cent of the total assessment of Kingston is provincially owned and no grant in lieu of taxes is received.
- f) The policy of the city is to raise taxes on improvements to property.
- g) Army personnel living outside their quarters.

Living Conditions

28 Many homes which were intended for a single family are being converted into small apartments resulting in overcrowding. Housing by-laws are not enforced because of the scarcity of accommodation. Maintenance of these rentals is neglected and back yards are allowed to become the repositories of old cars and discarded household appliances.

29 Efforts are being made to alleviate the conditions and it is expected that the following programmes will furnish some relief:

203 units in town houses renting on a priority system based on points

94 bachelor units for senior citizens in a privately owned project where rents are well below the going figure for similar accommodation

90 units for old age pensioners under the City Housing

Authority

76 units for families under Limited Dividend Housing

30 In spite of these programmes, there were, as of April of this year, approximately 730 applications for housing on a waiting list. Of this number, 151 were for senior citizens.

31 The following interview illustrates how difficult it can be for a low income family to buy a house. This is a family of five and there is one roomer living in their home. The father is 63 years of age, a cook by trade, presently unemployed. The mother works as a library assistant at a general hospital. Only one of the children is living at home as the other two did not find it compatible. The roomer is from the rehabilitation centre. The house is one in a row of old stone houses in the oldest part of the city. The family is buying the house and has a first mortgage for $5,500.00 at 10 1/2% and a second mortgage for $5,000 at 13%, which still has two years to run. Payments are $105.00 plus $15.00 monthly, which means that very little is being applied to the principal. (The $15.00 per month is to pay the taxes.) The family has no car. They are not able to buy in quantities nor take advantage of sales and bargain prices. They have taken the roomer to make ends meet. The home is modest, containing a kitchen, living room, four small bedrooms and a bathroom. A shed of wood originally attached to the back of the house is falling away. The house is badly in need of repairs. Even the replacement of a toilet became an emergency and was finally given as a Christmas and Birthday present to the mother. (Her only comment was that it was the most expensive present she had ever received.) This family had lived in a house without a bathtub for seven years so that they could get out of debt. They were finally able to buy their present home. They cannot afford to go to the theatre nor even buy a cup of coffee without worrying about the expenditure. The struggle which people with low incomes have to own a home would be eased if they were not subject to income tax as well as property tax, sales tax and the many other taxes, many of them hidden. If governments are concerned about poverty as we believe they are, they will make sure that no man's net income is less than he would have received on welfare; that the tax burden for education and welfare is taken off of real estate so that municipalities can permit cheap housing without fear of bankruptcy; and that social insurance plans are more effective. Surely the greatest problem of the poor is housing.

VI. THE SINGLE PARENT FAMILY

32 In our society, each of us eventually experiences some form of family disorganization and the breakup of a normal family unit inevitably creates adjustment problems for the adults and children concerned. Some of the most serious of these adjustment problems occur when one or other parent is missing from the family unit.

33 According to the 1966 Canadian Census, 8.2 per cent of all Canadian families were classified as single parent families. Up-to-date statistics are not available but in 1961 when the average earnings of the family breadwinner in Canada were $4,133, the earnings of single parent families were substantially lower. When a male was the single parent, his earnings averaged $3,550 but when a female was the single parent, her earnings averaged only $2,047. Since 81 per cent of all single parent families had female heads, the plight of these families is obvious. In addition to the personal adjustment problems mentioned above, most single parent families suffer serious financial problems as well.

34 Low incomes are characteristic of families headed by women. Most families with male heads report earned income as their main source of family revenue but nearly half of all families with female heads rely on some type of welfare payment. This fact has important social and psychological implications for the individuals as well as financial consequences for the family and for the community.

35 As a result of a series of investigations conducted by the Sudbury, Ottawa and Hamilton branches of the Provincial Council of Women, some of the most pressing problems experienced by these families are presented below. We cannot claim that our investigations were exhaustive or that our findings are original but we are sure that the Members of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty will note that these findings corroborate and underscore the results of research carried out by professionals, results which demonstrate the distress and degradation of being poor in an affluent society.

Problems Reported by Single Parent Families

36 Obviously, the most important problem is inadequate income. While Mothers' Allowances and Welfare payments keep families from starvation, many families suffer from malnutrition because rent consumes a disproportionate share of the family income. For many, recreation or holidays are unknown. Yet, most women report a willingness to work if their earnings could be used to supplement rather than reduce the financial help they receive from various welfare programmes. This one provision alone would improve dramatically the circumstances of the single parent family.

1. Even when the female heads of families do work, however, and try to rely on their own earnings rather than on welfare payments, the market value of women's work is generally so low that the standard of living of their families is severely reduced. In these cases, discrimination against women means an injustice not only for the individual but for her unfortunate children as well. (We note the new legislation, Women's Equal Opportunity Act, 1970, aimed at eliminating this injustice.)

2. The lack of day care centres where working mothers might leave their children is deplored.

What facilities there are, and they are few in numbers, are far beyond the financial means of the average single parent family. Industries might very well provide day care centres for the pre-school age children of mothers they employ and they should be encouraged to do so. School boards should initiate programmes of after school supervision, where the need is evident, so that children whose mothers are working could remain at school until called for by a parent. Such a programme would make use of facilities already provided and not used by the school after 3.30 or 4 o'clock. It could provide supervised play, supervised library and homework periods and would provide employment for perhaps 15 hours a week for supervisors. It should not necessitate any marked increase in school budgets.

3. While a majority of the families considers that medical services are adequate, dental and optical care place a heavy burden on poor families.
4. Many single parents report that poor education and lack of occupational training make it impossible for them to break the cycle of unemployment and dependence on welfare payments.
5. Loneliness and feelings of inadequacy as members of the community often lead to withdrawal from society or sometimes to aggressive and anti-social behaviour.

6. Lack of help with budgeting their resources, poor home management and the availability of easy credit can compound the difficulties of the single parent and leave her with a legacy of life-long debt.
7. The depressing nature of the lives of many single parents can lead to a lack of family harmony, and often to a too ready dependence on alcohol for a little temporary relief.
8. The implications of all these drawbacks for the children of such families are enormous. Since they have never known any other way of life, these children may accept their circumstances as inevitable and never develop the initiative or motivation to try to change them. They are trapped in an environment which tends to be self-perpetuating.
9. There is a real concern that the direct dependence of a family of an estranged father may place that family in constant fear and uncertainty of its economic security. In some provinces, for example Ontario and Manitoba, legislation places an estranged family in a position of direct economic dependence on the estranged father and requires the wife to police her husband to ensure payment of the court-awarded maintenance payments. The two problems, first of support for the dependent family, and second of enforcing the estranged father to maintain his economic responsibility toward the family he founded, are two distinct and separate problems. We believe that a provincially administered maintenance award fund should be established, into which defendants would be compelled to pay their maintenance payments and out of which dependent families would receive regularly the maintenance awarded by the court independently of the amount paid into the fund by the estranged father. The onus for collecting and administering the maintenance awards should be assumed by the province.

10. There is a particular need for single parent families to be better informed not only about their rights but also about possible sources of help for a multiplicity of their problems. Often they have no idea of where to turn for assistance. Much more imaginative means of calling to their attention all the services available must be used. Pamphlets could be mailed with Mothers' Allowance cheques; meeting points in a neighbourhood such as community centres, libraries, supermarket noticeboards and so on, could be used to advertise available services; brief public service TV and radio programmes could be developed to put across in 60 seconds ideas which a social worker simply does not have time to explain.

CHAPTER VI- RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That single parents be permitted to earn supplementary income

CHAPTER VI - RECOMMENDATIONS (continued)

- in addition to Welfare and Mothers' Allowance payments; this additional amount to be determined annually for each family according to its size and to be sufficient to maintain a reasonably acceptable environment for the family.
2. That day care for children of single parent families be subsidized so that the financial burden of such care be substantially reduced.
 3. That day care costs be deductible for income tax purposes.
 4. That dental and optical services be included under the National Health Service (OHSIP).
 5. That single parent families have priority in obtaining low rental housing.
 6. That each provincial Government set up a provincially administered maintenance award fund into which defendants would be compelled to pay their maintenance payments and out of which dependent families would receive regularly the maintenance awarded by the court, independently of the amounts paid into the fund by the estranged father; and that the onus for collecting and administering the maintenance awards be assumed by the province.
 7. That the various Government departments and social agencies institute creative and innovative means of communication with single parent families in order that such families become fully aware of all the services which are available to them.

VII. UNEMPLOYED: ABLE BUT WITHOUT WORK

37 The phrase "Unemployed - Able but Without Work" immediately raises the question, "Why is a man or woman physically able to work and not working? Is it because he or she will not work because of physical laziness or are there deeper reasons?" Information obtained by consulting representatives of Government agencies, revealed there were few actual cases of "sheer physical laziness" but there were many other deeply lodged reasons.¹

38 The Windsor Council of Women found that the problem of the unemployed person who is able to work could be divided into two categories; Physical and Emotional.

1. Many persons are physically able to perform but lack the skills or training for the job.
2. Sometimes they do not have suitable clothes for the work offered.
3. Persons may be physically unable because of long periods of inactivity or may have a long pattern of poor nutrition. They may lack dentures.
4. Families of the third and fourth generation who have lived continuously on welfare have developed a "way of life" under the protection of welfare assistance, resulting in a false sense of security.
5. If trouble arises, the problem can be taken to the social worker who can help in many instances when necessary such as a) if rent is raised; b) hospitalization and medical care; c) extra food and clothing.
6. When the head of a family moves from welfare to employment he faces new problems in the modern industrial world a) due to cut back in production;

- b) layoffs either temporarily or permanently; c) he may not be eligible for the money benefits available to the steadily employed man.
7. Pay for work may be below welfare payments. This is particularly evident in the case of the man with a large family. Welfare rates recognize the number of dependents but the rates of pay in industry are based on classification of work and do not recognize family responsibilities. Once off welfare, his increase in rent, transportation costs, hospital and medical expenses are now his problem.
8. In a high wage area, a man could have a sense of failure in accepting work at a rate below that which he earned in his last employment.
9. Inability to adjust to the change from an agricultural rural economy to an industrial urban economy.²
10. Inability to cope with rapidly occurring technical changes which require retraining.³
11. Automation results in skills becoming obsolete.
12. An economic recession resulting in fewer jobs and more welfare.⁴
13. Immigrant worker has difficulties in fitting into the Canadian economy.
14. Special concern should be given to the young people on completion of training who need experience in order to obtain employment.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

1. That there be a complete overhaul of our present welfare

- policies since these do little to lessen the incidence of poverty or to restore dignity.
2. That greater encouragement should be given to persons to take advantage of courses offered for training and retraining.
 - a) by developing programmes to motivate their escape from the poverty cycle
 - b) by creating incentives to motivate adults to overcome their inadequacies in education, employment, income, housing and parenthood
 - c) by initiating training for children, who are victims of poverty culture, which would enable them to escape from the poverty cycle and would create in them a desire to escape.
 3. That study should be given to the disparity in income between persons belonging to unions and those who do not. An outstanding example of disparity exists in Sudbury where we are told 14,000 workers belong to the United Steel Workers Union. The legal minimum wage in Ontario is $1.30 per hour for a 48-hour week, but the average rate per hour for a worker in INCO is close to $4.00 for a 40-hour week. Here we have an example of a large percentage of the population of a community earning good wages while the unorganized, who work in small stores, secondary industries or for the City Works Department are beyond help.⁵
 4. That projects be established in areas which are populated predominately by recent immigrants, similar to the Toronto project known as "Services for Working People".⁶

29 Several reports which were received pointed up the necessity for a complete study and overhaul of present welfare policies, with a view to making these more effective in combating poverty. It was also emphasized that in any comprehensive plan to change present welfare policies, motivation, incentive and encouragement is of paramount importance in overcoming poverty.

VIII. POVERTY AMONG INDIAN AND METIS PEOPLES

40 This chapter is a compilation of reports from the Brantford Council of Women based upon the observations of people who are conversant with the historical background and whose observations are tempered by their understanding of the traditions and culture of the peoples of the Six Nations Confederacy. It would be redundant to recite the past again but it must be remembered to better understand the nature of these people today. However, poverty with reference to the Indian peoples exists in education, health, economic development and social acceptance.

41 What does the Indian want? He wants to have a share in Canada's wealth and opportunities; to be accepted into the community on his own merit. In the past, Indians have been segregated from the rest of Canadians by living on the reservation. Attempts at integration with the rest of the community have been greatly hindered by a lack of acceptance on the part of the community and have been extremely painful and difficult for the Indian. It will take time for acceptance to grow and for the Indian people to make the adjustments required to become a part of an entirely new environment. Dr. Elliott Moses, an Indian leader, warns that, "the past must not be allowed to destroy the present and the future". Chief Virginia Sumners of the Oneidas urges, "the sooner Indian children are integrated into regular schools, the better their chances of being accepted by non-Indians. Indian parents are just beginning to recognize the value of education."

42 Technological and trade training must be part of the education offered to Indian children so that they will have an equal chance for employment. When they are able to compete successfully for jobs their self-image will be strengthened and their self-esteem will be built up.

43 We are told that today over 3,000 Indians are taking university and adult education courses and that 95% of the children are attending school. One half of the Indian population is 16 years of age or less, which suggests that education may be one of the keys to a solution of present problems. A hopeful indication is to be found in developments in southern Ontario. The Iroquois and Allied Indians of southern Ontario reservations who have had educational advantages are organizing a task force to provide leadership and help the one quarter of the population without education. They are drawing up counter proposals to the old Indian Act and studying the new Indian policy outlined in the white paper, last June, by the Minister of Indian Affairs. The Indians are voicing opposition to provincial control. New concepts in education are being suggested which would bridge the gap between Indians and modern society. A factor in the success of gaining equality of opportunity for employment will be a change in the image of the Indian worker in the minds of employers. It will require a determined effort both on the part of the worker and the employer. Mr. C. G. Monture, O.B.E., the Indian geologist, says, "Our faith is rooted in the belief that Canada will be stronger and her reputation brighter, that prosperity of her industry and commerce will be greater if the nearly half million citizens of Indian and Eskimo background are helped to find their way into the national community, to stand on their own legs, economically, and politically, and adjust to the white man's civilization on terms they can understand and accept".

44 The fundamental differences between Indian and non-Indian on the question of land rights must be understood by both sides so that acceptable solutions can be found. Until the land-rights question is solved, the Indian will never be truly integrated. When land was set aside for Indian reservations, long before Confederation, this seemed to be a practical solution to co-existence of native peoples and settlers. When roads were built, when hydro, telephones, provincial police protection and even running water came to towns, villages, and rural areas, the reservations were by-passed. As some Indian leaders resented an over-protective Government, this was not considered a serious realm of neglect at the time. When pioneer cabins were replaced by new houses, very few new houses were built on reservations. Poor housing and lack of modern conveniences contributed to frustration, to loss of pride and to the general lowering of morale. When Indians move into urban areas, a lack of training means low earnings and the poorest living conditions. Providing welfare houses has not been any more successful with Indians than with non-Indians. A system of purchase by mortgage has been worked out in some instances whereby band members with good working habits may purchase a house. The sense of ownership and achievement has done wonders to improve standards of living and to develop a pride of ownership.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That the Government expand its credit to Indians who qualify for loans for mortgages to buy homes.

4.5 It was pointed out that a law may be a very good one but bungling in the implementation of regulations by a civil servant may miss entirely the intent of the law. Some of the fear, distrust and hostility towards non-Indians has grown out of past treatment by Indian agents on reservations. It is true that more Indians are being employed in such posts, in services to Indians, in industry and construction but discrimination still exists. For example, there are 63 Indian Superintendents across Canada but only three are Indians. There is considerable evidence to show that some of the problems relating to Indians and Metis peoples have been caused by the attitudes, the indifference and the incompetence of the lower echelon of officialdom at all levels of Government. Efforts to overcome the near insurmountable bureaucratic obstacles to Indian self-government are interesting and revealing. The evolution of Walpole Island illustrates what is happening in southern Ontario. Ten years ago, another reservation called Muncey, about 20 miles down the Thames River from London, was considered to be in a hopeless condition. Today, an underpaid staff of two Indians is not only doing the work formerly done by eight civil servants, but they are improving it. The changes which have taken place are remarkable. Of course, there is still some poverty but not as dire as it was.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That Indians be appointed to civil service posts which have to do with the administration of Government programmes for Indians.

46 Poverty among the Indian peoples began in the past. We are realizing now that steps must be taken which would help Indians become productive and creative once more. The Indians themselves must decide what their needs are and how they can be achieved. They must be listened to when they have made these decisions.

Unilateral planning by the Government cannot assume to be effective. It has not been successful in the past. With Indians and the Government working together, priorities could be established and understanding achieved.

47 There are increasing numbers of requests from Indians for the establishment of manufacturing plants and small industries on or near Indian reservations. One type of industry which seems admirably suitable for such location would be for the manufacture of authentic Canadian souvenirs using Indian designs. There is a ready market for souvenirs of this kind. Much of this merchandise is presently made in Japan, Formosa, Hong Kong and the United States and is imported for sale here.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That the Government of Canada, through combining the resources of its retraining programme with that of economic development, make it possible for native communities to initiate industries, thus providing employment on or near the reservation.

IX. THE DISADVANTAGED

48 "We, the handicapped, have the right to take part in our society...." This thought appeared in a letter to the editor of the Globe and Mail on April 24, 1970, and the writer seems to have summed up in a very few words the content of this chapter. The sentence applies equally well to the physically and the mentally handicapped. Poverty must not be allowed to be an additional hurdle to the disadvantaged, neither to those who are capable of entering fully into Canadian life, nor to those who can enter only partially.

The Physically Handicapped

49 Basically, the same question was asked by two physically handicapped people who were interviewed during the preparation of this study. Each of them wondered whether Governments ever consulted the handicapped when they were making decisions on their behalf. The influence of disadvantaged people was so slight, they said, as to be almost non-existent.

50 A specific example quoted was the "comfort allowance" provided to the physically handicapped confined to nursing homes and hospitals. In Ontario, this is $15 per month and it must pay for clothing and other necessities, particularly for the person who has few friends or relatives to help out. The amount is inadequate. When Ontario recently increased the allowance made to handicapped persons living at home or independently, no increase was provided for those in institutions. It may be wondered how they could afford to "take part in society", even if they are well enough to enjoy hobbies or attend outside activities, as many of them can. Special transportation, for example, is very costly for a wheel-chair patient.

IT IS RECOMMENDED

That Governments seek to prevent through more adequate allowances the cultural alienation of the physically handicapped person who must live in an institution.

51 The second specific complaint was made by a physically handicapped man who lives independently and whose Government pension is under $150 a month. As a single man in Ontario, he may earn up to $24 a month without reduction in allowance, but once he passes that earned income point, his disability allowance is reduced. He cannot pick and choose where he will live with economy in mind, since he must live where he can enter in a wheel-chair. His expenses for transportation are necessarily high.

IT IS RECOMMENDED

- a) That in setting allowances, Governments take greater notice of additional expenses faced by some physically handicapped persons.
- b) That automobile licences for paraplegics and others who cannot travel by public transportation to their places of employment be reduced in price or issued free-of-charge.
- c) That other provinces follow the lead of British Columbia in returning to paraplegics and others who must travel to their places of employment by car at the end of the year money paid in provincial gasoline tax.

- d) That Governments consider allowing the handicapped person to earn a much higher amount before the disability allowance is reduced.

52 It might be remembered that when allowances are reduced dollar for dollar as earned income is received, the earned income in fact is taxed at 100 per cent.

53 Attention is drawn to a principle suggested in the white paper on welfare recently released in New Brunswick. It is suggested that there might be more than one category of payment and this might be investigated also in the case of disability allowances. Those who could not be employed because of their handicap might be paid a higher sum than those who have the ability to earn a living; those with good earning power might be permitted to retain up to one-half of what they earn before disability payments would be reduced; those who had a limited potential for earning might receive a level of payment between the other two groups.

54 Employers must be encouraged and educated to employ the physically handicapped and to make special arrangements to do so when necessary.

IT IS RECOMMENDED

That Manpower offices be required to bring to the attention of employers the ability and availability of handicapped personnel.

55 There is a difference of opinion with respect to just how minimum wage laws should be written with respect to physically handicapped persons. In many cases, the physically handicapped person can perform on the job as well as, and sometimes better than, the non-handicapped person. Minimum wage should be mandatory for a handicapped employee who is capable of earning the full rate. An exception might be allowed only for an employee who for reasons of disability is less productive. Some people fear that if employers encounter too much red tape in the case of applying for the right to pay a lesser amount, there will be a loss of jobs open to the handicapped.

IT IS RECOMMENDED

That minimum wage laws be examined to insure that they protect the handicapped worker who is fully capable of performing on the job, without reducing opportunities for seriously handicapped persons who, by special arrangement, might be employed at a lower rate.

56 In a report received from Owen Sound Local Council of Women, there is a reference to the situation faced by the physically handicapped child and the parents of the physically handicapped child:

"While poverty presents obvious difficulties for the physically handicapped, the Owen Sound investigation showed that poverty need not prevent a child from receiving proper treatment or needed prostheses. Public health workers and service clubs are willing to assist in making arrangements for the provision of these."

The Mentally Retarded

57 The position of the retarded in the community is also described in the Owen Sound report:

"A large percentage of the many Canadians who are physically, mentally or emotionally handicapped will never be self-supporting. The largest group, about 600,000 are mentally retarded. Modern medicine and therapy may help some to escape from long-term dependency but the majority will have to rely on social assistance measures all of their lives. We can only hope that research may discover the causes, preventatives and cures for retardation. The severely retarded will require custodial care, an area in which marked improvement should continue to be made. Special schools and sheltered workshops are making it possible for the less severely retarded to become personally independent for longer periods of their lives."

IT IS RECOMMENDED :

That there be additional research which may lead to a better understanding of the problem and to a decrease in the incidence of retardation.

58 When these children are ready to move into employment, as many are, it is now almost universally accepted that they should be integrated into normal community life. Many retarded people are qualified to work and there should be vocational training opportunities for those who can work in industry and for those who must always remain in a sheltered workshop environment. There is need for Government financial assistance and for education of industry and Government in their hiring policies.

59 More on-the-job training is required.

60 Employers should be willing to lower their requirements for less skilled jobs.

61 Study of jobs in industry would likely reveal that many could be divided: that routine parts of some operations could be done by the retarded and the more skilled parts done by others. That is, jobs could be adapted to the individual, not the individual to the job.

62 Legislation should protect the right of the retarded to minimum or prevailing wages, where these can be earned, and there should be proper safeguards if exceptions are permitted.

63 More sheltered workshops should be set up near large industries to produce small parts on contract.

64 Manpower offices should be directed to co-operate in placing mentally retarded in jobs they can perform.

65 Nor should Government agencies be overlooked by Manpower. They, too, should absorb retarded personnel whenever possible.

Conclusion

66 Employers, Government included, have often been hesitant to welcome the handicapped. When they are hired, it is often because no one else can be found. This attitude must be changed and a more positive one must be adopted.

X. THE WORKING POOR

67 At the outset of the study of poverty by the Provincial Council of Women of Ontario, members were told by Professor D. L. McQueen of Glendon College, York University, Toronto, that most of the poor are working poor - either they have jobs or are extremely anxious to get them. One of the most serious unsolved policy problems of our day, he said, is the problem of restraining inflation in a high-employment, high-growth economy, which is so important to their welfare. There have been some changes in that economy in recent months, but the problems of the working poor remain the same.

68 As this study progressed, it became obvious that those problems are many and varied. It might be said that almost all departments of Government should have this group in society in mind whenever new legislation is under consideration.

Burden of Taxation Borne by Working Poor

69 An attempt was made to investigate the total impact of taxation on the working poor, including municipal taxation, corporation taxation and all forms of sales taxes. The percentage of sales taxes at the consumer level in, for example, the prices of a pair of shoes, house furnishings or clothing can be established, but there is apparently continuing discussion by academics and tax experts on where the full weight of taxes lies. It is generally admitted that a proportion, and quite a high proportion, is passed on in prices, but there is no agreement as to the percentage.

70 In this connection, a quotation from the Chairman's Preface to the Report of the Special Committee appointed by the Government of Alberta to study Assessment and Taxation is of interest:

"Commercial properties - Properties containing wholesale or retail sales businesses, so long as they are assessed and taxed fairly relative one to another, may to a large degree shift the burden partly onto the buying public. It would appear that this is the case in Alberta." It is not likely that the experience of Alberta differs from that of other provinces.

71 Sales taxes are regressive since those with low incomes pay a higher percentage of their incomes in this way. The exemption of tax on food, children's clothing and some other items is helpful.

72 Large families pay more of their income in sales tax than do small families. A newly-formed family that buys and furnishes a house pays a great deal in sales tax that is not paid by other families. Some families may pay a higher proportion of the income through sales taxes than others because they choose to buy different items. There are taxes on taxes, since parts of a product may already have paid a sales tax and since machinery used in production may be taxed.

73 It would seem only sensible to reduce sales taxes by shifting them elsewhere if this could be done without interfering with necessary Government revenue.

74 The White Paper on Taxation indicates that the matter of sales taxes is not urgent, but if the Government considers their importance to the working poor and other low-income people, surely it would become of first importance. As it is, the White Paper leaves largely untouched the whole problem of pyramiding taxation.

75 A large part of the tax burden is made up of various kinds of taxes, including both federal and provincial sales taxes. Under the White Paper, the working poor will be relieved of income tax or pay a minimal amount through an increase in the exemption, but what is not known is how much these people will pay in other taxes. It is difficult to believe that this information cannot be extracted, in spite of the statement made by Mr. R. B. Bryce, economic adviser on the Constitution to the Prime Minister, when he appeared recently before the Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. He is quoted as saying that the Government gave serious thought to trying to account for inflation in the tax system but "found the task too complex". Its complexity does not make it go away.

76 One estimate noted in the press is that sales taxes across Canada now raise about $4 billion a year. For most Canadians, this is equivalent to a combined retail rate ranging from about 13 per cent to more than 16 per cent.

77 It is disturbing to read that the Director of the Canadian Tax Foundation believes that further major growth of Government spending in Canada may force the tax authorities to bear down more heavily on consumption taxes. Total Government expenditures rose from 1938 to 1948 by 170 per cent; from 1948 to 1958 by 195 per cent; from 1958 to 1968 by 140 per cent. He estimates a doubling of Government expenditure between 1967 and 1975 to $43.5 billion. Wider use of sales taxes, he warns, will be required. He suggests that the regressive feature of the tax can be offset by adjustments in income tax and through social security and welfare systems.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That since sales taxes fall most heavily on low-income people, they be a matter for immediate study by Government.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That the way in which all forms of taxation enter into consumer prices be a matter for immediate study by Government in the interest of low-income people.

78 Whatever recommendations are made by this committee, it should try to avoid making suggestions that will increase taxes of taxpayers in the lower brackets.

Business Growth as a Benefit to the Working Poor

79 Following is quoted from the testimony of the Director of the Economic Council of Canada before the committee on April 22, 1969:

"In attacking poverty, everything depends on a satisfactory performance in the economy at large. That is to say, there must be economic growth, there must be a high level of employment. Without that we will not be able to make much progress with other anti-poverty devices. It is extremely important that the aggregate of employment opportunities in the economy be sufficient. This should never be forgotten."

80 The working poor will be the first to suffer from slower business growth, just as they are the first to suffer from inflation. The Prices and Incomes Commission, which is attempting to control inflation might be reminded that wages and salaries make up 55.2 per cent of the Gross National Product, Government expenditures 33.5 per cent and profits before taxes 10.2 per cent. The commission has recently sent a circular to taxpayers advising the consumer to be a tough customer and to have a commonsense approach to pay increases. What the commission did not mention in its leaflet was Government expenditure. This was in spite of the fact that the approach of the commission, as widely advertised earlier in the year, was a three-pronged effort to combat inflation by means of policies affecting prices, wages and Government expenditure.

81 According to the Statistical Review of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, total Government current expenditure on goods and services in 1969 was $13,745,000,000. (This figure is exclusive of transfer payments.) With a population of 21,260,000, this means that the expenditure was at the rate of $646 per capita. If the average family consists of 3.6 persons, then this expenditure was $2,325 per average family. (For purposes of comparison, the average family in the city of Toronto is estimated to spend $1,400 per annum on food.) It would seem that the most inflationary factor is Government spending, which has increased at a much greater rate than have expenditures on food, clothing, housing and other factors.

82 All levels of Government, federal, provincial and municipal, should make even greater efforts to curb or reduce unnecessary spending. It is recognized that much Government spending is fixed by agreement and that it increases because of population growth, but Governments should always have before them the situation of the working poor whenever they make decisions on spending.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That Governments make long-range plans for control of Government spending.

83 The curbing of business growth is damaging to the working poor. It should be a tool used sparingly.

Demands for High Wage Increases

84 The Prices and Incomes Commission has not succeeded in securing the co-operation of labour unions in its efforts to reduce inflation. The working poor stand to lose when excessive wage demands are granted. Canadian Grocer, April, 1970, comments on the current round of union negotiations in the food retailing industry. If the demands are accepted, the magazine states, food prices could increase another 4 per cent. The request is for up to 50 per cent increases in addition to shorter hours. The only way increased prices could be prevented would be if there were a very great increase in sales per man hour, which does not seem to be possible. Net profit figures for the stores concerned are running at a low rate, according to the article.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That the Prices and Incomes Commission be urged to continue to press labour to agree to co-operate in the efforts to fight inflation.

Status of Women

85 The report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women will, it is hoped, have something to say about the plight of those women who are low-income earners, and in particular those who are the heads of families.

86 The Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs (which is one of the federated societies of the National Council of Women) presented to the Prime Minister in February of this year a resolution requesting that a permanent commission or board on the status of women be constituted. Such a permanent body would, in our opinion, further the cause of women as workers.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That the Government establish a permanent commission or board on the status of women.

87 It would also be expected that the Women's Bureau of the Manpower Department would continue its concern for women in the low-income bracket.

Basic Income Tax Exemption

88 It is noted that the Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs pointed out in its brief to the Prime Minister in February that while the Government has made changes in income tax statutes over the last twenty years to relieve the tax burden of certain groups, no tax relief has been granted to single persons, especially those in middle and low income groups.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That Government be requested to increase the basic exemption in the Income Tax Act.

Exemption from Tax of Child Care Expenses Recommended in White Paper on Taxation

89 As it now stands, the suggestion with respect to the exemption from income tax of child care expenses up to a certain amount would benefit to the highest degree highly-paid working mothers.
It was suggested by one person interviewed that the deduction should be allowed from the income of either parent in a family where both parents are employed, and not from the wife's tax only, as seems to be implied in the White Paper. This would mean that a mother could take a low-income job if she had no special training or a part-time job and the family would still benefit from deduction for child care expenses.

Special Senate Committee

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That the Government be asked to study further its proposal for child care expenses in an effort to find a method that will benefit the low-income earner.

Working Women with Dependents who Require Care

90 No provision for tax exemption is made for the working woman who must employ someone in the home where there is a dependent requiring care. The White Paper on Taxation recommends tax relief for working mothers only. The Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs brought this matter to the attention of the Prime Minister in February. This is of special importance to a woman who is working in a job at which she receives a low rate of pay.

Welfare and the Low-Income Earner

91 During preparation of this brief, it was noted that the Alberta Government plans a pilot project to give welfare recipients the financial incentive to become self-supporting. Those in the project will be able to earn up to $75 a month before welfare cheques are reduced (a basic $25, plus $10 for each dependent up to $75). At present the ceiling is $25. It is argued that it is better to invest something in the working poor by means of supplementary assistance than to keep people on total welfare. This experiment should be observed by all provinces.

92 Other provinces should also follow with interest study of the

New Brunswick White Paper on Welfare. It is suggested that permanent welfare cases should be paid a higher sum than those with the ability to earn a reasonably good living. As an incentive, those on welfare with earning power would be permitted to retain up to one-half of their earnings. For the in-between group with ability to earn at a lower level, there would be a third category. The principle would be "a decent standard of living" for the sick, disabled, the aged and families with female heads, while the "work incentive" would be applied to those who could be employed.

92 It is not, in our opinion, a fact that the majority of poor people prefer to be on welfare rather than to take low-income jobs. Most would respond to incentive programmes. It was noted that the Director of the Economic Council of Canada said (April 22, 1969, before the Committee) that all welfare structures, all anti-poverty structures should contain some kind of incentive for those who have potential to seek earnings.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That the Minister of Health and Welfare be urged to table at the earliest possible moment, the White Paper on Social Security referred to in the Speech from the Throne (October 23, 1969) in order that there may be a better informed public discussion of incentives and related matters.

Minimum Wages

94 Although the Government has refused in the Commons to release a Labour Department study of the effects of minimum wages on the economy for the reason that it was done for departmental use only, it is suggested that the Senate Committee should ask to have access to the study since the whole matter of minimum wages is of concern to low-income earners.

25 A recent study published by Queen's University and prepared by Frank Whittingham, a research officer with the Ontario Department of Labour, says that "some contribution towards alleviating poverty" has been made by the introduction of minimum wages, but the study states also that more direct redistribution of income would be brought about more efficiently by methods such as a negative income tax geared to providing a guaranteed minimum income.

26 It is noted that the Director of the Economic Council of Canada could only say to the committee (April 24, 1969) that "minimum wages are a controversial subject". He added that the minimum wage is not striking at the real heart of the problem which is that of raising the productive capabilities of the poor so that they can move permanently into the mainstream of the economy. There is also the fact that if it is attempted to cope with the problem of the working poor only by raising minimum wages, some low-wage-rate industries may disappear, and with them, jobs.

IT IS RECOMMENDED

That there be more basic study of the subject of minimum wages.

Federal Sales Tax on Margarine

27 Because margarine is the only staple food that is subject to federal sales tax, it is felt that it deserves special mention. The price of margarine is of special importance to anyone on a low income. Removal of the tax has been recommended by consumers' associations for many years and, according to a report noticed in the press, it has recently been recommended by the Canadian Consumer Council. If the dairy industry must be protected or subsidized, some method should be sought other than one that penalizes low-income consumers.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That the Government be urged to remove the 12 per cent federal sales tax on margarine.

98 The question of Government subsidies of Canadian butter and the discouragement of butter imports should also be investigated. It is noted that at trade meetings in April of this year, New Zealand made a particularly strong appeal with respect to the admission of dairy products into Canada but made little progress because the Canadian representatives at the talks insisted on the need to protect the domestic industry. It is recognized that this is a difficult problem but the low-income consumer should be given consideration whenever possible where staple foods are concerned.

Consumer Debt

99 Most of those who commented on consumer debt were agreed that it can be disastrous for a low-income family. While it is a provincial matter under the Constitution, it would be valuable to have uniform credit legislation across the country. The Provincial Council of Women of Ontario has endorsed the need for education on this subject at the elementary and high school level for both boys and girls. While it is also obvious that there is need for more debt counselling, it is a fact that all the counselling in the world will not assist the family that cannot get out of debt through its own earning power.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That there be a study of the possibility of making the declaration of personal bankruptcy more readily available to low-income people who cannot otherwise be helped.

The Marketplace

100 It is sometimes possible to over-emphasize standards and it is suggested that this may have been done in grading foods, to the degree that low-cost foods are not available, although they may be just as nutritious. Occasionally, in times of shortages, some of these low-cost items will appear on the grocers' shelves. They should be there always for the benefit of the working poor and, in fact, for all consumers.

101 Efforts to make known to the public that low-grade foods are often as great in food value should be increased for the benefit of low-income earners.

102 In the case of some durable goods, low-cost items may be of shoddy quality. The working poor may not be able to afford to buy good quality items and are, therefore, at a disadvantage. More shopping guidance should reach the working poor.

Information

103 The working poor very often do not know what are their rights and what services are available to them, such as legal aid. In a study by the Welfare Council of Canada of credit buying and debt, it was discovered that many families who were in difficulties did not know that debt counselling services were available.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That all levels of Government jointly support information bureaux operated at the municipal level to provide information and act as referral services.

Need for Study

104 There is an obvious need for continued study of the problem of the working poor. More has been done in some other countries in this regard than in Canada. With some adjustment, the results of one United States study might be related to Canada. This is the study by the University of Wisconsin Institute for Research on Poverty of a $5 million experiment in New Jersey, in which outright grants of money were given to some families to bring their incomes above $5,300. It is reported that this form of guaranteed income appeared to encourage the poor to work harder, to spend their money more wisely and to save the taxpayer administrative costs. A similar study is now being done with a group of families in a rural area.

IT IS RECOMMENDED:

That more study and experimentation be undertaken in Canada to find the best method to assist the working poor to rise beyond the poverty level.

CHAPTER X - RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That since sales taxes fall most heavily on low income people, they be a matter for immediate study by Government.

CHAPTER X - RECOMMENDATIONS (continued)

2. That the way in which all forms of taxation enter into consumer prices be a matter for immediate study by Government in the interest of low-income people.
3. That Governments make long-range plans for control of Government spending.
4. That the Prices and Incomes Commission be urged to continue to press labour to agree to co-operate in the efforts to fight inflation.
5. That the Government establish a permanent commission or board on the status of women.
6. That Government be requested to increase the basic exemption in the Income Tax Act.
7. That the Government be asked to study further its proposal for child care expenses in an effort to find a method that will benefit the low-income earner.
8. That the Minister of Health and Welfare be urged to table at the earliest possible moment, the White Paper on Social Security referred to in the Speech from the Throne (October 23, 1969) in order that there may be a better informed public discussion of incentives and related matters.
9. That there be more basic study of the subject of minimum wages.
10. That the Government be urged to remove the 12 per cent federal sales tax on margarine.

11. That there be a study of the possibility of making the declaration of personal bankruptcy more readily available to low-income people who cannot otherwise be helped.
12. That all levels of Government jointly support information bureaux operated at the municipal level to provide information and act as referral services.

Curriculum Vitae

Lt. Gen. Frank J. Fleury, CBE, ED, CD

Born in Montreal on 30 June, 1914, Frank James Fleury attended elementary and high schools in that city and graduated in Arts from Loyola College in 1934. As an undergraduate, was active in the Loyola College Contingent, Canadian Officers' Training Corps (COTC)—holding successively the ranks of Private, Sergeant, 2nd Lieutenant and Lieutenant. After qualification and commissioning, served as Platoon Commander and Adjutant.

At Loyola, played on the intermediate Intercollegiate Football Team and was a member of the Debating Team which in 1933 won the championship of the Inter-University Debating League.

In 1934 joined his father, as planned, in the latter's florist business in Toronto and remained there until early 1937, when he returned to Montreal. There employed by the Retail Credit Company as an inspector and resigned in 1940 to go on active service with the Canadian Army.

During this latter period (1937-1940) was again associated with the Loyola COTC, as Instructor and Company Commander, on an evening and weekend basis. Promotion to the rank of Captain was gazetted in January 1940.

Capt. Fleury was appointed Adjutant, A40 Canadian Infantry Training Centre (Farnham, Que.) in August 1940, following a training course and short tour as Instructor at "C" Wing, Canadian Small Arms School (Connaught Ranges, Ottawa, Ont.). Proceeded overseas in October 1941 and was appointed Adjutant, 9th Brigade Wing, 3rd Canadian Infantry Divisional Reinforcement Unit (Crookham, Hants). In April 1942 was summoned to Canadian Military Headquarters (London, England) and appointed Staff Captain in the Branch of the Military Secretary.

Promotion followed in September 1942 to the rank of Major on appointment as Deputy Assistant Adjutant General. Remained on the staff of CMHQ until November 1943 when he proceeded to Italy and filled a new, equivalent position with the Canadian Section GHQ 1st Echelon, 15th Army Group. This formation was then commanded by General H. R. G. Alexander, later Field Marshal Earl Alexander of Tunis, Governor General of Canada.

Major Fleury was ordered back to CMHQ, London, in March 1944 to take up the position of Military Secretary in the rank of Lieut.-Colonel. Continued in this post until June 1945; meanwhile promotion to Colonel was approved in December 1944. Despite the title, the Military Secretary's functions in the Canadian Army Overseas were related to Officer Personnel Services—promotions, appointments, postings, etc. The comparable appointment in Canada was Director of Personnel Services, to which post Colonel Fleury succeeded in July 1945 when he returned to HQ Ottawa from overseas following V-E Day. Shortly thereafter, Colonel Fleury's responsibilities were extended to include personnel services and records of all Army personnel, not only Officers. And this reorganization resulted in the redesignation of his appointment as Director of Army Personnel.

In the summer of 1946 was selected to attend the first post-war course at the U.S. Command and General Staff College. Completed this course of studies at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas from August 1946 to July 1947 and graduated with distinction. Returned to Army Headquarters, Ottawa and was appointed Director of Organization early in September 1947. During 1948/9 was for some months acting Deputy Adjutant General, in addition to his duties as Director of Organization.

Left Ottawa for Winnipeg in July 1949 on appointment as Chief of Staff, Prairie Command. This HQ was responsible for all Army activities in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Northwestern Ontario. Of special interest during this tour were the development of Fort Churchill into a major Army base and the "Winnipeg Floods" of 1950.

Following the outbreak of hostilities in Korea and the decision of the Canadian Government to contribute to the United Nations Command, was promoted Brigadier and appointed to command the Canadian Military Mission, Far East. With a small staff, proceeded on short notice by air to Tokyo in September 1950. Initially Brig. Fleury operated out of temporary accommodation in the Canadian Embassy by courtesy of the Head of Mission (then Dr. Herbert Norman), to whom Fleury was additionally accredited as Military Adviser. "Permanent" quarters were soon established in an office building not far removed from General Douglas MacArthur's HQ United Nations Command.

As Commander, CMMFE, Brig. Fleury was primarily responsible for preparing for the arrival of Canadian troops in the Far East. But he was also given certain responsibilities related to the Navy and Air Force; and he reported to the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee, Ottawa, as a natural consequence of this triservice or "integrated" appointment. Officially was also on the staff of HQ, United Nations Command. As the Canadian Army later built up its forces in Korea and Japan, Brig. Fleury assumed responsibility for certain base and L of C installations and personnel. In 1951 was requested for the further appointment of Chief of Staff, British Commonwealth Forces Korea, by its Commander-in-Chief (Lt. Gen. Sir Horace Robertson, an Australian) but this was not approved by the authorities in Canada.

In accordance with policy, Brig. Fleury's tour in the Far East ran twelve months and he returned to Canada to take on the appointment of Commander, Eastern Quebec Area, in September 1951. From HQ in Quebec City was responsible for Army activities in the area of Trois-Rivières to Gaspé until October 1956. Was particularly concerned with the development of Camp Valcartier and La Citadelle, the principal Regular Army installations in the Area, and with the many keen Militia units under command. Became actively involved in a variety of community activities and gained many friends with whom he continues to keep in touch. In 1956 was selected to attend the Imperial Defence College (London, England). With mixed feelings he and his family sailed from Quebec City in October; there was regret at leaving Quebec after five happy and fruitful years, but excitement in anticipation of some fourteen months ahead in the United Kingdom. The course at IDC was highly rewarding and ended in December 1957, when Fleury returned to Ottawa on appointment as Vice Quartermaster General at Army Headquarters. This branch concerned itself with procurement, distribution and control of supplies for the Army, with maintenance of equipment both warlike and otherwise, with engineering services, traffic and transportation, food and catering, real estate and buildings, research and development, postal services.

Remained in Ottawa as VQMG until October 1961 when he was promoted Major General and named General Officer Commanding, Quebec Command, with HQ in Montreal. The geographical limits of this command were, for all practical purposes, those of the Province of Quebec though the GOC had certain operational responsibilities outside the Province. Thus, the territory included the Army's Eastern Quebec Area, with which he was well acquainted from his previous five years in Quebec City as Area Commander.

In response to an invitation from the responsible Officers, was honoured to accept in October 1962 appointment as Colonel Commandant, Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps. In this capacity has periodically visited RCO units from Halifax to Vancouver and in Belgium, Germany and the Middle East. Continued to hold this appointment and to play a role in Corps affairs until January 1968, when he resigned.

During 1964/65 Maj. Gen. Fleury had much to do with implementation of the policy on integration of the Canadian Armed Forces, with particular reference to Quebec Command. In furtherance of decisions which stemmed from the Government's White Paper on National Defence (March 1964), the three Service Headquarters in Ottawa were abolished and Canadian Forces HQ was formed to control the Navy, Army and Air Force on an integrated basis. And in September 1965 was promoted Lieutenant-General and appointed Comptroller General, CFHQ. Remained in this post until July 1966 when approval was given to his request to be retired.

In November 1966 became associated with R. L. Crain Limited, Business Forms and Systems Service. Following a period of familiarization and training, he was named successively Manager Administration and Executive Assistant to the President. Appointed General Manager in July 1968. Elected to the Board of Directors, and appointed Vice-President and General Manager in March, 1970. He was invested by HM the King at Buckingham Palace in 1944 as a Member of the Most Excellent Order of the British Empire (MBE) and was admitted as an additional Companion of this Order (CBE) in 1952. Is an Officer Brother of the Most Venerable Order of St. John of Jerusalem; and was awarded the Canadian Efficiency Decoration and the Canadian Forces Decoration. Holds the Italy Star, Defence of Britain Medal, Korea Medal and United Nations Service Medal amongst other wartime and service awards. For service in the Far East, was granted the Legion of Merit (Degree of Officer) by the President of the United States in 1951. In 1968 was honoured by appointment to the Sovereign and Military Order of Malta.

Is a Governor of Loyola College, having resigned as Chairman of the Board of Governors on transfer from Montreal to Ottawa in September 1965. Has been active in support of the Canadian Corps of Commissionaires and served as Director and Vice-President of the Quebec Division. Was on the Board of the Greater Montreal Poppy Fund for four years and a founding member of the Executive of the English-speaking Union in Quebec City.

A life-long golfer, Lt. Gen. Fleury remains an active member of the Rivermead Golf Club, which he joined over 20 years ago on first posting to Ottawa, and of the Royal Ottawa Golf Club. Has also been an active member of the Royal Quebec Golf Club, Royal Wibleton Golf Club (U. K.), Fort Leavenworth Golf Club (U.S.) and the Koganei Golf and Country Club (Japan). Also enjoyed honorary membership at various times in the Kawana Country Club (Japan), RAC Country Club (U.K.), Royal Montreal Golf Club, Marlborough Golf and Country Club, Farnham Golf Club and Club de Golf St. Hyacinthe.

Is a member (and ex-President) of the Quebec Garrison Club, of the Rideau Club, of l'Association des Anciens Officiers du Régiment de Maison-neuve; and is an honorary Life Member of the Army Ottawa Officers' Mess.

Has been a regular or privileged member of other clubs such as the Mount Royal Club, Montreal United Services Club, Quebec Winter Club, East India and Sports Club (London).

Has been active for 3 years with the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Ottawa Board of Trade; holds executive posts in each of these. And is an Executive Officer of the Priory in Canada of the Order of St. John.

Long interested in Philately, Postal and Military History, Lt. Gen. Fleury has found little time to devote to these hobbies in recent years but remains a member of the Postal History Society and Ottawa Philatelic Society.

Was married on 2 January, 1941 to Grace Rankin at St. Columbkille's Cathedral, Pembroke. They have two sons—"Jay" age 22 and Paul age 19.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, June 18, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this meeting concludes our sittings for this session. The timing has been good. We are likely to adjourn on the 25th. We have a program of summer visits. Mr. Askwith will be contacting all of you this week, or certainly by the early part of next week to make travel arrangements for the visits. When we get back in the fall we shall have eight or nine other bodies and organizations to hear, the Provinces of Quebec, Manitoba and British Columbia, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Town Planning Institute, Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton, and maybe one or two more.

Before I go on any further, I want to express my appreciation, as chairman, of your devotion and dedication. This has been a very hard working committee. I think it will accomplish a great deal. The cause is a worthy one, and we have devoted ourselves to it. There is still much ahead of us but I am confident we will be able to make a valuable contribution.

I have a letter from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. He says, "It was brought to our attention quite forcibly that there was a typographical or recording error inserted in the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Number 14, Tuesday, January 20, 1970." That is when the Department of Indian Affairs came before us.

The error is on page 99, subheading Cultural Development. Second paragraph, last line, last word. The word should be "noting" instead of "nothing".

This page was read out by a very disturbed delegate in the recent National Conference on Indian Culture held in Ottawa. The word "nothing" tended to deprecate Indian culture.

It was never the intention of the Cultural Development Division of the Department who prepared that portion of the submission.

This is the way it read:

A variety of forces have tended both directly and incidentally to downgrade the traditional cultures of Indian nations. Although old folkways and values were assailed by waves of European culture and technology, and many of Canada's Indian population still retain a definable culture, a strong sense of identity and self respect, some people of Indian ancestry have difficulty in sustaining this view of themselves. For many years, governments were not concerned with preserving or recognizing Indian culture and the fact that it has survived in any form is a fact worth nothing.

The word should be "noting".

People have taken the trouble of reading not only the evidence but the brief in total which is, of course, a great compliment. I wanted to clear up the matter.

We shall hear today the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. On my right is Mr. Roland K. Carty, Vice-Chairman of the Executive Council. He will introduce the delegation.

Mr. Roland K. Carty, Vice-Chairman of the Executive Council, Canadian Chairman of Commerce: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, certainly we are very pleased to be invited to appear before you to submit the views of the Executive Council of The Canadian Chamber of Commerce on poverty.

The Executive Council is the governing body of the Canadian Chamber on a day-to-day basis. I am Roland K. Carty and I am Vice-Chairman of the Executive Council. With me today in our delegation is General Frank Fleury, Chairman of our Health and Welfare Committee and Messrs MacPherson, Mondoux, Moreland and Smith, Members of the committee. We have, also, Mr. C. H. Scofield, general manager of The Canadian Chamber of Commerce, and Mr. W. J. McNally, secretary of our Health and Welfare Committee.

I believe our brief can be effectively summed up by saying that in order to achieve social justice we must have a strong and improving economy, and that before we embark on further social welfare programmes we should pause and reflect as to where we are and where we should be going in this field. Certainly we are looking forward to studying the two important White Papers on Social Security and Unemployment Insurance.

Your committee has had our brief in advance and we are now in your hands. However, I would request that you direct any questions to General Fleury who will either answer them himself or refer them to another member of our delegation.

Mr. Chairman and Honourable Senators, we on the Canadian Chamber of Commerce side feel that all Canadians are together in the fight against poverty, and that with the proper cooperation between government, management, labour and education, and indeed the poor themselves, we will improve life for many Canadians. We are here today to try to make a contribution in that direction.

I would like now to ask General Fleury if he would generally comment on, and perhaps summarize, our brief before we answer questions.

Lieutenant General Frank J. Fleury, Chairman of Health and Welfare Committee, Canadian Chamber of Commerce: With your permission Mr. Chairman, I will not go over the brief, which is extensive and available. We did prepare a summary of the brief which is not too long, and if you will agree I would be quite prepared to hit the highlights in this summary.

As Mr. Carty has said, the submission is presented by the Executive Council of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. As indicated on page 17 of the brief, this is a preliminary submission, and I would like to stress this, because of gaps in information in the social security field, particularly the White Paper on Social Security and the White Paper on Unemployment Insurance. The latter of course was tabled in the House of Commons yesterday, but I for one, have not seen it. I shall attempt, then, to give a capsule comment on the objectives of the presentation and the special point of view of the members of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce which, I might point, out is the national federation of over 800 autonomous boards of trade and chambers of commerce, plus 2,700 corporation members, and 29 national business and professional association members.

The next point that I should like to make has been italicized in our summary, and this is quite deliberate. The Chamber yields to no group, I submit, in its concern for the quality of life of all Canadians, and in its determination to discharge its social responsibility in addition to performing its immediate economic tasks. If this brief seems to address itself largely to the practical and economic aspects of the poverty problem in Canada, rather than to the humanitarian values, let it be noted that we speak for business and we make no apology for concentrating on features with which we are in daily contact and on which we should have experience and specialized knowledge, and which we are sincerely prepared to place at the service of our disadvantaged fellow citizens. As our policy statement indicates, we believe that sustainable social betterment depends on healthy, competitive enterprise, and economically strong Canadian enterprises.

The foregoing indicates, I trust, that the executive Council is concerned with Health and Welfare, or, to put it another way, with the welfare of Canadians and Canadian welfare. It is the Council's submission that "Growth alone may not cure poverty, but poverty will most certainly not be cured without buoyant, sustained growth. Distributed poverty may provide equality, but new wealth must be produced and distributed if poverty is to be eliminated."

To illustrate the Chamber's longstanding concern for disadvantaged citizens, its policies on social security and on the employment of special categories of workers are set out. These are from our annual policy statement, and appear on page 3 in the Senate submission.

Let us now look at the economic criteria for the amount and extent of health and social welfare. The criteria for the foregoing are need, which involves the definition of poverty, ability to provide social security payments, economic effects of increased social security expenditures on Canada's growth potential, shortfall of domestic funds for growth potential, and universality. These are covered on pages 6 to 16 of the brief.

Since the guaranteed annual income is now under consideration by the Canadian Government, it is examined in some depth in our brief.

The universal payment scheme, which is covered on page 17, and the negative income tax, on page 18, are discussed as well as the cost of the guaranteed annual income, on page 19. It is concluded that the cost would range from $951 million to $2,151 million. Professor Thur's study for the Chamber is also referred to.

Since over 90 per cent of the jobs in Canada are with private employers, and considering the fact that 60 per cent of the poor are employed, the submission expressed the view that the Canadian business community is one of the central and effective groups for dealing with the problem. This is covered on page 27 of our submission.

The submission also quotes the current President of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce as saying: "What is good for Canada is good for business."

Imaginative and innovative schemes to help the disadvantaged conducted by the Bank of Montreal and Bell Canada, to name but two, are cited as indicating what private enterprise employers have done and what they are prepared to do. The submission stated the Chamber membership is prepared to cooperate with government, labour, educational authorities and others, in placing the Chamber's and its members' expertise at the service of the poor so that the shackles of poverty can be struck down.

In conclusion, we feel that every individual in Canada should have an opportunity to attain a standard of living adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and his family. The best guarantee of high and rising incomes for all Canadians is a high and rising level of economic activity. To this end, Government policies must create an economic environment which favours growth, in terms of proper monetary policy, reasonable fiscal policy, and realistic commercial policy. Such public policies, together with a sensible selective approach to social security, will give Canada a strong dynamic economy with high and rising productivity, and more than enough goods and services to go around.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a summary of our brief. One hates to start off by pointing to typographical errors which have crept into the brief, but there are some figures in our brief which require amendment. There is one figure, in particular, that is incorrect, and other figures which have been left off. The amendments are not extensive and possibly before we are questioned on incorrect or omitted figures, we might, with your indulgence, make these corrections.

Mr. R. B. MacPherson, Member, Health and Welfare Committee, Canadian Chamber of Commerce: The first one is on page 24. This has to do with Professor Thur's submission. You will note the figure of $500 million; that should be $1,426 million.

I can explain how this came about. This $500 million is what Professor Thur would recommend as an incentive to people who are receiving the guaranteed annual income. It does not apply unless you receive the guaranteed annual income. By itself it is quite meaningless. His minimal requirement is $1,426 million.

On page 25, Table 5, I think it would clarify the situation if under the first three columns, under the year 1975, we indicate what these columns really mean. They apply to various growth rates of the Canadian economy. The first one should be 4 per cent. The next column should be 5½ per cent and the next column should be 7 per cent.

I should point out that Professor Thur was commissioned by the Chamber to undertake this study. I think it is not the policy of industry, to endorse the work of an academician, or take the responsibility for it. In view of his current position we felt that his work was so valuable that it might contribute to the Senate's deliberations.

The Chairman: We share that view with you. We have had his study before us almost at the time it was delivered to you. You may consider it as being carefully looked at by the staff.

Senator McGrand: I am very much interested in this brief. Evidently you are not convinced that the New Jersey experiment is an accurate representation of what a guaranteed income will do, and I agree with you that it is not adequate.

It you were assigned the task of relieving poverty in Canada at the present time, what methods would you use? Industrial growth is the long term answer to this problem of poverty, but I am referring to the present.

In New Zealand, which is a strictly agricultural country of 2½ million people, it has no mineral wealth, no oil resources, most of its good land is in the North Island, and it is half the world away from the natural market. Yet they have produced an economy and a political system in which slums are practically unknown and there is very little poverty. When you consider their limited resources as compared with our gross natural resources, what would you do at the present time to use our resources to relieve poverty?

Mr. Fleury: This, of course, is a very basic and fair question, but it is also a very large question. If you are asking me personally, then I shall have to say that I did not come here in a personal capacity. I came here with my colleagues to represent the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and as such, I have no qualms whatever about this. I must support, and put to you gentlemen for your consideration, the views of the Chamber as contained in the brief. We have not discussed, as a council or a committee, an answer to your question.

Senator McGrand: My question has been answered. You said you have no particular policy.

Mr. Fleury: The only thing I can add to that is that we are certainly concerned about the long-term effects and we are disposed, naturally, to go for the long-term alleviation of poverty through sustained growth rather than, as we put it in our brief, what is in effect a distribution of poverty at the present time.

Senator McGrand: I agree with you that long-term industrial growth is the answer.

What I meant is: What would the Chamber think of a policy for the present to be built into the policy of the future?

Mr. MacPherson: Would you like to hear from an industrial economist? I would direct your attention again to page 25, to Table 5, and I can go into a bit of background on that.

If you look at the distribution of gross national product between 1959-60 and 1969 and, in fact, the first quarter of 1970, you will see a very startling thing, and that is that consumer expenditures have declined from about 66 per cent of gross national product to 60 per cent today. It is a little bit less in the first quarter, I believe. You will see that the consumer is obtaining relatively less. In absolute terms he is obtaining a little bit more. This is putting a real pressure on the consumer. When you put pressure on the consumer, who suffers? It is the poor.

This change in consumer expenditures means that a smaller share is received. The offset to that is increased Government expenditures. If you are really considering poverty, I would direct your attention to the mounting level of Government expenditures as a percentage of gross national product.

During this interval, if I remember correctly—and this is a bit confusing because we now have two GNPs—Government expenditures in total have gone up from roughly 31 per cent to 36 per cent.

I have just come back from Japan, and if you want to see evidence of affluence look at our four pavilions at Expo 70—more than any other country. I think we can repeat this throughout the country. If you are considering poverty, I suggest that you take a very hard look at the distribution of gross national product between the consumer, the Government, and capital investment.

The Chairman: We are looking for some help. If there is anyone who feels inclined to say something in response to the senator's question we would be delighted to have his view. It does not have to be the Chamber's view. You are Canadian citizens and you are here.

Let me frame it a little differently. We have had, for the last 10 years, high economic activity in this country. It is as high as ever in our history. Yet the number, in real terms and in relative terms, of poor has increased. How do you explain that?

Mr. Fleury: I am not sure that our studies would indicate clearly, in relative terms, that the number of poor has increased. Surely, there is considerably less poverty today regardless of what standard you use, than there was years ago.

The Chairman: In 1967 the Economic Council gave us a figure. That figure, as far as our studies indicate, has not decreased but grown somewhat.

Mr. Fleury: In relative terms?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. MacPherson: I think if you look at the decade of the sixties you have to divide it into two periods. There is the great period of recovery from 1962 to 1966. With one exception, the economy has tended to level off since that time. If you trace Government policies from 1966, you realize there has been a deflationary program of growing intensity, and there is absolutely no doubt that unemployment today is serious. By my own calculations it is higher than the official figures.

Of course, when you get a figure of 5½ per cent unemployment for the country, and over 9 per cent in the Province of Quebec, you have poverty.

The Chairman: I was not thinking of the immediate crisis of inflation and unemployment. I was thinking of 1967, 1968 and 1969. We did not suffer as badly from unemployment in 1969 across the country. We were down to about 4 point something, were we not?

Mr. MacPherson: Yes. If you look at Quebec, and look Maritimes, it was a very serious problem in 1969, a year of relative prosperity.

The rate of growth in GNP, with the exception of one year, slowed down after 1966. The Government, even as early as that date, was fighting inflation.

Mr. W. J. McNally (Manager, Policy Department, Canadian Chamber of Commerce): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can make a limited response to your question. As I understand it, you are asking why it is that with a high level of economic activity we still have, relatively speaking, a high level of poverty? Was that your question?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. McNally: On page 29 of our brief, paragraph 62, I think there is a limited response to your question.

We spent a fair amount of time in the Committee putting this brief together and we have had considerable conversation about this question of the lack of skill potential in our poor people. If we have a general comment to make about the amount and kind of the statistical information we have about our poor, it is that we think it is rather limited. We do not feel that the statistical information that is available to us enables us to make too precise suggestions. We suggest, first of all, there be more work and research done on who are the poor people, to give a profile on the poor people.

Galbraith says: "To the best of my knowledge there is no place in the world where a well-educated population is really poor." Sensitive, thoughtful and skilled manpower training will go a long way towards taking Canadians off the welfare rolls and providing those that are working, but are poor, with upgraded, well-paying employment. We speak for our membership in offering to co-operate with Government, labour, education, et cetera, in placing our expertise at the service of the poor.

Mr. Léon Mondoux (Member, Health and Welfare Committee, Canadian Chamber of Commerce): As an actuary, Mr. Chairman, I am not supposed to get away from facts. I have the impression that technology and automation have increased so quickly that education has had difficulty catching up. This rejoins what Mr. McNally was saying, that the basic problem is really an educational one. I am taking advantage of the fact I may speak as a citizen.

The question was raised a few minutes ago as to what to do now about poverty. The inference was that it was a cyclical matter. At the moment it is really bad. I am certainly not authorized or qualified to speak about a guaranteed annual income, but I see that not only as an immediate measure but as a perpetual measure which could be used to cure cyclical or temporary poverty.

I would not go any further than that on the guaranteed annual income. This is partly philosophical. It is not actuarial. This is not the Chamber of Commerce; this is Mondoux speaking.

Mr. MacPherson: The Economic Council, said that if income data had been available in 1961 it would have been found that there were 150,000 farm families in low income brackets, and that the preliminary estimates for 1967 indicated that the number of all poor families, including farm families, has dropped to 840,000.

The Chairman: Yes, Mr. MacPherson, but that was adjusted for the cost of living and not for the standard of living. It makes a difference.

By the way, Mr. McNally, I cannot resist saying that Galbraith thinks we ought to have selective wage, price and profit controls, and we ought to have them immediately. Do you like that statement, as well as the one you have quoted.

Mr. McNally: I would have to reserve judgment on that.

Senator Pearson: Is there any particular line, of work that is phasing out now or that is disappearing because of the change in our technological advance? Is there any particular job that people should be trained for?

Mr. Mondoux: I will answer that partly. I work for an insurance company and I am also a Member of the Quebec Health Board. You should see the difficulty we have in getting good programmers and good systems analysts? The price is going up. There is inflation there, and a terrific inflationary pressure. We have full employment in those sectors where people are well educated to the point where it is overflowing.

The Quebec Health Board has been trying for a year to get a systems analyst. We are willing to pay the price. Money is not the problem; it is the scarcity of people. We just cannot find them. They are happy where they are, and they have a bright future where they are.

Senator Pearson: This, of course, will not affect the poverty stricken people. They do not come into that class.

Mr. Mondoux: No. That is what I say. Education, especially in Quebec, is picking up so fast that we may find ourselves with much less poverty of that type in another five or ten years.

The Chairman: Mr. MacPherson, you spoke about the Government expenditures, and you have a point, of course.

Mr. MacPherson: I think it is worthwhile considering.

The Chairman: I have a document here from the Department of National Health and Welfare. We asked for it some time ago. It was not for this occasion, but they appeared before us a month or so ago. This document shows government expenditures on social security as a percentage of the Gross National Product for selected countries for the fiscal years 1961 to 1967 inclusive. For Canada it reads:

Year	Percentage
1961-62	9.6
1962-63	9.5
1963-64	9.1
1964-65	9.2
1965-66	8.8
1966-67	9.1

I am not sure what it was for 1968.

Now, Britain is, of course, higher than we are. The Americans are somewhat lower. They stay in the 7.0 to 7.8 per cent bracket. I am not talking about Australia or New Zealand, because they are not quite comparable. The figure I gave you is not out of line, is it?

Mr. MacPherson: That would require a quantitative answer which I am not prepared to give. I think that the Chamber has taken the position that this is something we want to come back to after we have seen the deliberations on the White Paper. I am, merely as an economist, looking at GNP as a whole. I am very disturbed about the low level of capital investment which is a major contribution to our current difficulties.

If I may take the liberty of answering this gentleman's question, we are, as this committee knows, rapidly decreasing the number of employees in our agricultural sector. The food producing industries are showing a very disappointing rate of increase in employment. In fact, it is so small that it is alarming.

The Chairman: This year, do you mean?

Mr. MacPherson: I am talking about the decade. We not only had to provide jobs for people coming out of agriculture but we had the fastest growing labour force in the world among industrial countries, and we had to provide jobs for this group. They are going into services. We think a well balanced economy would have more going into the goods producing, particularly manufacturing. Here is where the great employment opportunities exist. Our manufacturing industry employment rate is growing at a much slower pace than that of manufacturing throughout the world. I think this is something that merits the closest investigation.

Mr. Carty: Mr. Chairman, Mr. MacPherson is commenting on Government expenditure in total, and I do not think he is commenting on whether there is too much in the welfare area. I think he was concerned about the 36-37 per cent.

If I might perhaps sum up my views, and maybe the Chamber's views, we feel that there are really regional problems in Canada which emphasize our poverty problem. The question of mobility of labour, we think, is important. Mobility will probably only come through the education or training of people. In other words, people who are not educated and who are not trained are nervous about moving from their home environment. We will never remove poverty if people are left in places from where it cannot be removed. I think mobility of our people is going to be a must, and we have to find a way of making it easy for them to move. It is easy to just say "Move", but that is not the answer. Training, retraining, and education, are necessary and do not necessarily mean a university classical education, but education to do things. Unskilled jobs are decreasing very fast, and the skilled ones are increasing. The people without skills are going to be in a real problem.

Another thing—and perhaps Mr. MacPherson has commented on this—is that the only way to use our trained people and move our people into trained jobs is to have enough capital spending so that Canada, as a nation, can compete and produce. There is no sense having people trained to run the machines or computers or anything else if there is not the money being spent to put those machines and factories in place. We must also be able to do the same for agriculture.

I think, in general, our feeling is that training, education, retraining, mobility of people, is both a short and a long term, maybe the best, answer to the poverty question in Canada.

The Chairman: I am going to give the members of the Committee an opportunity to ask questions. I will come back and discuss this with you in a few minutes.

Senator McGrand: What are you going to do to put money in the pockets of people who need it? We are talking about welfare schemes. What would you do at the present time—increase the family allowance, increase old age pensions, have a guaranteed income, or a negative income tax? What would be your suggestion as the best temporary means of relieving poverty as of the present time? That is what I had in mind.

Mr. Fleury: I do not think that we have an answer to that, senator, because we feel very strongly that if any expenditure were made for a temporary and current alleviation of poverty, which may result in greater poverty and more poverty in the long term it is not in the country's interest.

Senator Quart: One of my questions has been answered. I read your brief. I am very interested in it, because I have known some of the witnesses for years.

You express a concern that if any group is assured a substantial welfare assistance without working for it, a much larger proportion of the population, whose efforts must support those on welfare, will eventually lose their incentive to work.

Mr. Fleury: The suggestion has been made, and I think it has validity. We do not suggest it is like the laws of the Medes and Persians.

If you tax people so highly that there is nothing in it for them, you take away their incentive. If, for instance, a man finds that by working hard 40 hours a week for 50 weeks a year he ends up with a net income of only a few hundred dollars a year more than somebody who does not work at all, where is the incentive to work? This is a question rather than a statement in our brief.

Senator Inman: I have read this brief, and found a lot in it to think about.

I would like to ask Mr. Carty a question referring to training and retraining programs. Do you feel the university education is perhaps stressed too much at present? I am thinking of a man who was before us in Vancouver. He was a plumber in his late forties who had served his apprenticeship and was an excellent plumber. He could not get a job because he had never gone beyond Grade 6. I think one of our senators once said that you did not need a university education to run an elevator.

Mr. Carty: This is right. There has been stress laid on a university degree, senior matriculation, and so forth, as something you should have. If you do not have it, socially you are looked down. I believe that in training for some trades—plumbing, electrical, and so forth—a basic amount of education of the theoretical type is required. Certainly, even just to enjoy our way of life, we need a basic amount of education. I do not know whether you should attain Grade 8 or Grade 9 before beginning to qualify for a trade. I want to be careful not to be too critical of a subject I am not strong on. There have been some barriers raised against people entering the trades by various means, and I think they should be careful.

The Chairman: Speak openly here. We know what you are saying. Say it. It has been said before.

Mr. Carty: I think there are many labour problems. They say you cannot come in, and so forth. The country has to find a way to allow people to get into a trade or skilled job. If a group says we are only going to let a hundred in, they are doing this to control the intake. I think this is a problem. The rest of us will have to have handouts. Somehow we have to find a way in which to get our people educated in a very broad sense.

Mr. McNally: Mr. Chairman, may I just supplement what Mr. Carty has said? Of course, I agree completely. I would suggest that there are two ways of looking at this education problem: one is from the point of view of the economy as a whole; the other is from the point of view of the individual.

From the point of view of the individual, we would all agree that he should be trained or educated to the limit of his capacity so that he will have a quality of life as well as a quantity of life.

In respect to the economy as a whole, the report of the Senate Committee on Manpower laid great stress on training our people to the highest possible skill level, as well as on the quality of life. In that respect, as we say in our brief, the innovative programme of the Bank of Montreal—a very imaginative programme which you have read about—is a breakthrough in taking disadvantaged people, particularly chosen because they had a bad employment record, and bringing them into the bank. This is a social gesture on the part of the Bank. Also, we discussed in our brief what Bell Telephone has done with hardened criminals. Recently, in Montreal there was a graduation ceremony at St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary at which eight male prisoners were given diplomas because they had passed a course in a complicated electronic system which was given to them by supervisors of Bell Telephone in their own time. We think this is rather interesting.

Mr. Mondoux: Mr. Chairman, I was quite interested in the problem raised of over-education being required for certain positions. When they revamped the whole system in the Province of Quebec, they seem to have neglected the fact that a university degree was a status symbol. Every father wanted his son to have a university degree, with the result that everyone is heading towards university now. This will create an overdemand. Universities will have to be severe in their admissions. Then I, as a father, will lose the privilege of having my son repeat a year because he failed the first year. I have the privilege to make I don't know how many men work on a Cadillac, but I cannot have the privilege of keeping my son in the same class for two years. Again this is philosophical and has nothing to do with the Chamber's policy, but you just sparked me, Senator Inman.

The Chairman: We hope to spark more of you before we are through.

Senator Fergusson: Like my colleagues who have spoken, I found the brief extremely interesting and I wish I had had a little more time to read Professor Thur's reply on the social policy for Canada, because I am extremely interested in Canadian welfare policy. I find interesting the presentations that the Chamber makes from time to time to Government. I read them every time they come out, and I appreciate getting copies.

One of the things I had in mind to ask you about was on page 3, where you set out some of the views that have been adopted by The Chamber of Commerce. Under 128 you say:

... Most Canadians can, and wish to, provide for their own security.

I am quite willing to accept that they "wish to provide for their own security", but I am not entirely convinced that they "can." Do you not think there are things that prevent a great many Canadians from providing their own security, such as low wages? I cannot accept the "can".

Mr. Fleury: We do say "most Canadians".

Senator Fergusson: Yes, but I do not agree with that either. What would you say that would be, about 75 per cent?

Mr. Fleury: Certainly over 50 per cent. If we accept one of the current guides on the poverty or near-poverty level, I do not think any figure is above 30 per cent.

The Chairman: 20 per cent of the total of 4 million.

Mr. Fleury: So the balance must be in a position to provide for their own security through a variety of devices, obviously, not excluding insurance, demo grants, and so on.

Mr. Carty: I think there is a feeling that there are many people who could, if they wanted to, but perhaps just do not want to. Obviously, there are some who cannot, some who need help, and so forth. I think there are many listed below the poverty level who could get up and do something and find work. Take four members of a family that starts out below the poverty level. Two will rise above it and two will remain below it. In many cases all four could.

Senator Fergusson: I do not know how you can say "the whole four could". Perhaps there was something that prevented the other two rising above it.

Mr. Fleury: You mean a social disability or a physical disability?

Senator Fergusson: They may not have been fortunate enough to have the opportunities that the other two had. I do not think you can just compare the members of a family.

Mr. Carty: This is right, but I think the point we are speaking to—that we feel most Canadians can—is correct. Obviously there is this question of what is “most”, and there is much room for work to be done.

Senator Quart: Mr. Carty or General Fleury, also would you not agree that some of this is caused by the employer exacting too many qualifications for an ordinary job? Some employers almost expect a man to have a Ph.D. to run an elevator or to cut grass. Would you think along these lines?

Mr. Fleury: There certainly have been instances of that, Senator Quart. I can not help but recount a little personal experience. Many in this room have lived through the depression. In 1937 I was associated with the company that solemnly advertised in the Montreal Star for a “mail clerk, B.A. required.”

Now, you say this is absolutely foolish. Let us recall the circumstances of 1937. There were probably 100,000 people in Montreal who would have been glad to get a job as a mail clerk at $10 or $15 a week, or whatever the going rate was in those days. This was a device on the part of the employer to screen possibly thousands of applicants down to a few. We needed a mail clerk with a B.A. like we needed a hole in the head, to be perfectly honest with you, but the old law of supply and demand enters into that too.

I know that some employers have gone overboard in seeking, for instance, for senior executive and planning positions, those with a Master of Business Administration degree. This is the ‘in’ thing, to have MBAs coming out of your ears. I suspect, as an individual, that the bloom on that particular rose is starting to wear off.

We are all the victims of our own environment, our own circumstances and our own education. We all realized some years ago that executive positions in business generally should be upgraded over the long-term, from an educational point of view. Universities, notably Harvard in the States and Western Ontario in Canada, started to produce this new product, the Master of Business Administration, and the first thing you know, everybody wanted to have an MBA. Certainly I would not suggest for one minute that employers have been universally without guilt in this field. Sometimes there are reasons for it. It is a little more than just keeping up with the Joneses.

Senator Fergusson: The mail clerk is the best explanation I have heard as to why you use this device.

I would like to refer to page 3, to item 131, in which you refer to “overlapping programmes” and say you think these should be “resolutely pruned”. Would you give us some examples of those that you consider do overlap? We were under the impression there were gaps.

Mr. Fleury: Well, Senator, I would not like to lay too much stress on this particular statement of policy. It was adopted by The Chamber many years ago. It may be that today it has less validity than when it was first adopted. I think we were looking at the principle rather than individual cases.

It so happens that we had before us recently—and we are in the process of making representations on it—one almost classic example, and that is the overlapping between the disability provisions of the Canada Pension Plan and the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. We do not suggest that there are not gaps—God forbid. There are gaps. This does not mean to say that in trying to fill these gaps we should not pay attention to overlapping. Certainly, we should never put ourselves in a position, either as employers or as individuals, where two benefits for the same disability can be obtained and an individual can end up making more money not working than working.

Senator Fergusson: Of course, this problem exists at the present time in some cases. People can get more money accepting welfare rather than taking a low paying job.

Senator Pearson: Just to follow along the same line as Senator Fergusson, could these programmes be combined to cut down the overhead?

Mr. Fleury: This is a vast field. As we pointed out in our brief, according to the Government's figures, produced by the Department of Welfare, there are some 200 federal welfare programmes. I must confess that we are not competent to examine each of these 200 welfare programmes and see in detail whether there is overlapping amongst them, to say nothing of any possible overlap between them and provincial programmes and municipal programmes. One would have to suspect that since the programme—if one can call it a programme—has been produced piecemeal over a period of many years, there has been some lack of coordination.

Senator Pearson: Would it not be worthwhile for the Chamber to make a study of the problem that exists in the country? It is a very serious problem, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Fleury: I would not want to say "Yes" on behalf of the Chamber, because I suspect it is a mammoth undertaking. Our staff resources are really quite limited. We have done work in this field, but I think the results today certainly indicate that a great deal more work should be done. However, I am not sure that The Chamber is the body to take it on.

Mr. Carty: I think our feelings would be, as we have said in various places, that this is perhaps a job the Government itself could do better. They have the resources to make a report. The Chamber just does not have the monetary backing or resources to do that kind of work in total.

Senator Pearson: On page 4, paragraph 99, you say "...the older worker group represents a reservoir of skill and experience that the country can ill-afford to waste." Is there any reason why an older worker should be retired at age 65? Do all businesses feel that their employees have to retire at 65, or that they are forced to retire them at 65?

Mr. Fleury: I do not know if I am qualified to speak for all businesses, Senator, but I can give you some background. The question of a set retirement age, be it 65 or some other age, seems to be based on two general principles. The first is that if older people do not retire it blocks promotion of younger people. I think that is self-evident. Secondly, like a lot of other policies adopted not only by business but by government, it is very difficult for any employer, business or government, to sit in judgment and say that "A" should be retained beyond 65 but "B" should not be. These are judgment calls which are not always easy to make.

You may say in Department "X" in the Government or Company "Y" on Civvy Street that you want to keep Bill Smith on beyond age 65 in the interests of the company, but is it really in the interests of the company? It may be in the interests of Bill Smith, but it may not be in the interests of the company. These are difficult decisions to make. Obviously, individuals vary. One man at 65 is a very old man and maybe at 60 he should have been retired. We know of cases, and I have cases in my own company, of people over 70 who are just as vigorous as some people 20 or 30 years younger.

I think most employers feel that it is difficult to make distinctions; therefore, it is easier to try to stick to a policy. Secondly, young people coming in, and seeing the top jobs continuing to be held by older people, do not usually stay with you very long.

Mr. Carty: I think also, Senator, generally with regard to companies having this policy, it is usually tied into a pension scheme. A person at age 65, with perhaps three pension schemes—the private pension scheme of the company, the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan, and the Old Age Security Plan—is not going to create a poverty problem in relationship to the existing poverty levels. A married couple at 65, both drawing the old age pension—and in a few short years they will be drawing the maximum of the Canada Pension Plan—with a pension scheme of any reasonable amount, there is a $4,000 to $5,000 total package. With retirement at age 65, this is going to be of real assistance in fighting poverty because they are usually geared to retire people at 65. They have a plan, and it is geared to it.

Senator Pearson: On page 7 of your brief, you talk about an average income in Canada of $2,250 per annum as compared to $1,700 in Germany and, again, in Japan of $1,100. Have you any figures of the cost of living in those three countries.

Mr. MacPherson: Senator Pearson, I could only comment on that quantitatively. Having been both Germany within the past year and in Japan within the past few weeks and being very interested in such questions as that, I really threw up my hands. In Japan food and rent may be relatively cheap, but the accommodations, of course, are just atrocious. It is really very, very difficult to say what real income is. We do look at this in terms of competition with Canadian industry and if we are in competition with a Japanese product the price in Canada is determined on this particular figure, regardless of whether living standards are higher or lower than in Canada. This seems to be somewhat of limiting factor in an open economy, although for the moment I know the living standard in Canada is substantially higher than in Japan. For instance, in Japan today there is one car for 33 people. In Canada we are down to one car between 2 or 3 people. Our housing is much better. Our food is probably about the same, depending upon taste. Their mass transportation is much better.

Senator Pearson: Is the housing situation there any different from that in the centre of our big cities where you get the slum areas and that sort of thing.

Mr. MacPherson: Yes it is. It is the higher price of the land. In a suburban community the price of land is $300 per square metre. Even middle class families who have inherited a lot of, say, 100 feet by 100 feet have now sub-divided their backyard, and there are little two storey narrow houses on it. The Japanese themselves will tell you that this is very unsatisfactory, but with their great increase in productivity averaging 9 per cent per year, which everybody expects to continue, Japanese living standards will exceed ours some time during the eighties.

Senator Pearson: You mean these old places will be torn down?

Mr. MacPherson: Yes. They are being torn down and high rise housing units are going up. They call them 'mansions', which I think is a Japanese word for apartment.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman, the question I was going to ask related mostly to education and I see it has been pretty well covered.

I appreciate this brief very much, although I receive it with a bit of disappointment. I think the brief expresses views, rather than bringing solutions to the poverty committee today. The brief contains the views of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, and the discussion seems to be rather limited at times.

I have one question to ask related to the poor, the problem which this Committee is facing—and this was touched previously—concerns education and the standard required for employment. I quite agree that in order to become a full-fledged and above average electrician or plumber you need Grade 12. But, there is a certain class I would label as helper which, due to education and ability, will never reach that standard. We are living through the 1970's and through no fault of anyone—you cannot pinpoint any individual—there are great numbers of poor people. They are poor because they lack education, and ability although possibly they would have the ability if they had the education. Our old system only provided for Grades 4, 5 or 6. They are in their forties and some are in their fifties. They are married, and have built a little home. They manage to live very miserably, but they are taxpayers and Canadian people, and we have very little to offer them. We have a great number. I think if you look around the country this is where you will find the poor people today. What can we do with these people?

I am not critical of Manpower or anyone; everyone is trying to do their best. It is impossible to think we are going to upgrade a man with Grade 5, 6 or 7 to Grade 12 in one year. Most of these people are taking advantage of these upgrading schools but are mostly going there not with the intention of improving their education, but because they get a salary while they are attending school. There is a great number of those. Nevertheless, they are Canadian taxpayers and, part of our society. What can we do with these people? Have you anything to recommend? They seem to be the lost group like the Métis. They do not fit anywhere.

Mr. Carly: I think that we would be foolish to say that we can bring these people back. You cannot start with a person who has been away from school for so long a time, and who has not had much education.

I think our feeling would be that we should try to ensure that the children of these people do not get left in a position of moving along the same way, because in many parts of our country, and in your own province, Senator, there are areas where we are just going on with this same thing. The children are there and they go to school for one or two years, and that is it, and they are through. Somewhere we have to find a way to ensure that we do not continue this problem, and having in 30 years the same group uneducated, and still having to ask "What can we do?". We are in the welfare area and I think we have to be careful with this. If you have just a general wage, or a negative income tax, everybody has so many dollars. When you are 9, 10 or 11 you would rather go fishing and run around in your bare feet than go to school. Somehow in our system, while we protect the people who cannot be changed and give them enough on which to live, we have to ensure, as part of the payment for this, that their children are educated and trained, so that we just do not keep going with the same group.

You cannot expect a person of 45 who has never lived out of a community, and who has no education, to move, but we must not allow his children to be in the same position in 40 year's time. I think we may have to take what in America they call their "hard core black problem" and accept them, and give them enough. But we have to make sure that their children do not fall in the same category. We must be in a position to take care of it. This has to be a part of any change, and I do not think that just making sure that everyone in the country gets $3,000 a year is going to do that.

Mr. Mondoux: We were all silent and all of a sudden we are all ready to speak on that. I agree with your comments, senator. You were kind enough to say that it was an extremely difficult problem. I think basically we are facing a mentality problem in North America. What happens is that we all want the people to be well cared for, but when we are taxed we go to our employers and say, "My purchasing power has gone down." I think this is part of an inflationary problem. Deep inside of us we do not want to give anything up, but we do not want any poor.

In the Oriental countries the mentality is different. They accept the fact that they have to give. They are more group or population-minded than we are. In North America we work to save our souls. This is sticking. We have that on our backs and we cannot change our whole mentality in 10 years. We are not in Europe; we are in North America. The man who wants to help the poor does not want to pay for it.

Mr. McNally: Following along with what the Chairman and Mr. Mondoux have said, and speaking partly personally, I think probably the saddest child in Canada would be the child of a father who has lost his dignity, and who is locked into poverty. That child is going to be that way for the rest of its life.

The senator plainly asked, "What can we do?" I think the basic thing is to try to get those families who are locked into poverty back to some basic human dignity so that the father of the family, particularly, can be looked up to by his children, and get out of the situation into which he was placed by his generation.

In the brief that we submitted to the Royal Commission on Health Services before Mr. Justice Hall, we provided some figures which indicated that in various parts of Canada 5 per cent of the people on welfare were consuming 75 per cent of the welfare funds. In other words, that 5 per cent was using up all the welfare funds. As Mr. Carty said, we must make it possible for these particular people to be given intensive care.

I was very interested to read in the Gazette yesterday a Canadian Press story, quoting an official in the Department of Manpower and Immigration, that for every $1 of Government expenditure on counselling, training, and retraining, $3 comes back in terms of national income. I do not think the Chairman would like to give the impression that we are against Government expenditure. We are for sensible Government expenditures. We think that money spent for training, retraining, and education is productive expenditure.

Mr. C. H. Scofield, General Manager, Canadian Chamber of Commerce: I have been sitting here, and a few thoughts occurred to me as the discussion went along. I was interested in the comment that perhaps the Chamber's presentation today does not seem to give any solutions. I think we are conscious of this because we realize, with you, the immensity and complexity of the problem.

We might have said that we will wait until we have seen the White Paper on Social Security, or until we have studied the White Paper on Unemployment Insurance. We are here today because we are dedicated to the problem, and are trying to make a contribution that will help this committee. I think we said earlier this morning that we look upon this as a preliminary presentation. You might like to talk to us again. We might like to talk to you and make some suggestions, and perhaps as things develop more concrete and helpful thoughts might come along.

If you accept the philosophy that sound economic growth is the way to get at the problem, then it seems to me—and we made this point before the House committee on taxation last week—that economic growth is the most important way to raise the standard of living of the people of the country. We heard reference this morning by Mr. MacPherson to Japan. This suggests that if we are going to rate as a country, and if our standard of living is going to increase, we have to be competitive. But, we are competing with countries which accept a lower standard of living and do not call it poverty, which have lower wage rates and sell their products at lower costs. This all gets back to the comment made by a provincial premier back in 1966 when speaking to a Chamber of Commerce organization, that we are placing too much emphasis on, and talking too much about, the cost of living index. Maybe one of the things we should be thinking more about in order to solve our problem, and to raise the standard of living, is the productivity index. I really believe that this is one of the points we should be giving more consideration to, our productivity index, to enable us to attain the economic growth that is going to provide a higher standard of living for all Canadians.

Senator Fournier: You mentioned productivity. In our Canadian product are we putting quality today? Would you give an opinion on that? You are all manufacturers. I refer to our car industry, which I am more familiar with than anything else.

Mr. MacPherson: I would love to answer this one because we have a most unique phenomenon in Canada today. According to the most recent figures I have seen, Canadian car production for the six or seven months of the model year is higher than the comparable level of the preceding year, despite the fact that the demand is down in both Canada and the United States. We have a most unusual phenomenon of demand being down in the United States, and the American plant bearing more of the burden than the Canadian plant. There are two factors to that. One is the character of the car. We make the smaller car, but certainly our quality of car is comparable to that coming out of the American factory.

Senator Fournier: I was not referring to the American factory. I was referring to the Italian, French and Japanese cars—the quality of these cars compared to the quality of the small cars we manufacture in Canada. I am not talking about the appearance and paint surface. I am talking about looking under the hood.

Mr. Carty: I do not think there is anyone here who is capable of answering on automobiles alone, but as an industrialist whose company has a company in Switzerland, one in Italy, three in the United States and a number in Canada, I think I can say that we are making as good quality in Canada as anywhere else. Our exports, quality-wise, are accepted, and so forth. This problem of what is termed the American car versus the foreign car is something I do not think I want to get into. There is no question that we can make an article of as good quality as anyone else.

Senator Pearson: I would like to ask a question. You say that productivity is the answer in this country. In Western Canada we have too much productivity. What happens to a manufacturer who gets in the same position. You may have productivity, but unless you get sales, you are out of luck.

Mr. Carty: I think there are differences between agricultural productivity and manufacturing productivity. Our impression would be that if we can get our manufacturing productivity up we would be able to compete with foreign people in Canada. If it is going to take us two hours to make something that somebody else makes in an hour and a half, then we are in trouble.

Senator Pearson: We have the same problem in agriculture. We have a surplus of productivity, and yet we have imports of agricultural products in this country.

Mr. McNally: Mr. Chairman, as an easterner, but perhaps as a member of the national association, I deal with some wariness this question of wheat marketing, but I think there is a valid comment that might be made. Our people are just back from the far east, as General Fleury said, and one question that came up was that in Australia they are spending about $25 million on marketing their agricultural products. New Zealand, with a population of 2.5 million, is spending about $12 million for professional marketing purposes. In the United States they are spending about half a billion dollars for their marketing service. This is both governmental and private spending. Canada is spending the magnificent sum of $1 million in trying to move our wheat. This, Senator Pearson, just does not make any sense to us. If any business were to spend that kind of money on a marketing program they would go down the drain so fast, it wouldn't even be funny.

The Chairman: Are you saying that in effect very much more could be done with the wheat if we did some better marketing?

Mr. McNally: I am coming back to the proposition, Mr. Chairman, that we are not opposed to sensible Government expenditures, but we like the Government expenditures to be efficient and placed in the right direction and we would think perhaps—and I can speak only personally—that the budget for marketing wheat is entirely too low.

Senator Pearson: That satisfies me.

Senator Inman: On the top of page 8 you say:

In more normal times, the people suffering from life-cycle or contingency poverty may be perfectly capable of meeting their own needs. In fact, during normal periods, some undoubtedly have enjoyed an above-average income. Their need is clearly for insurance.

Would you comment on that? What sort of insurance do you mean?

Mr. MacPherson: I will tell you what I was thinking about. I think I was thinking about such things as the unemployment insurance that was announced in this morning's paper. I am very interested in this disability feature. I think we can do a great deal in this area. I am also thinking of areas in which we have done a great deal, such as health insurance and medicare. Even as recently as a decade ago a middle-class or upper-middle-class person who had a heart attack or cancer ended up impoverished. We recognize this kind of poverty and we think it should be taken care of by insurance in one form or another; or, at least, this is what we were trying to say.

The Chairman: Senator Inman, in effect the sentence says, "Those normally unable to work, on the other hand, are candidates for social security."

I saw that and gathered something else from it which was very complimentary to you. I gathered that what you were saying was that, without question, the disadvantaged, the blind, crippled, maimed and others who are not in the labour force, are entitled to have a maintenance programme.

Mr. Fleury: No doubt.

The Chairman: That is what I thought you were saying.

Mr. Fleury: And this is not only contained in the brief, but this is also the policy of The Canadian Chamber and has been for many years in our annual submissions to Government. Indeed, we have touched on it in some of the quotations in our annual policy statement. We recognize, without question, that there are some people unable to work, and it is society's obligation to look after them.

The Chairman: We have approximately 4 million people below what the Economic Council said was the poverty line. Let us not argue about it for the moment. Among those disadvantaged I included the old, too, and another group, about 160,000 female heads of families, and 315,000 children, so there are half-a-million people there. It has always been our feeling here in the Committee that it is her choice whether she goes to work or stays at home with the children. It is not for us to tell her that she must go to work. We feel she is perhaps better off at home. Such situations account for 40 to 45 per cent—I may be out a little—of our poverty problem. I gather from you that you think it would be a good idea for the country to provide maintenance for them, and opportunities to earn money if they are capable of earning it.

Mr. Fleury: I heard a comment from afar that suggested I might be led into a trap.

The Chairman: No. I have another part to the problem to put to you. I am dividing the problem for you.

Mr. Fleury: You are talking of a group of people who are unable to work because of social conditions, physical disabilities, mental disabilities and so on. We say quite clearly that these are candidates for social security and that they must be looked after by the rest of us.

Mr. McNally: As they are now, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fleury: We are saying, also, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to underline this point, that our total social security programme amounts to $8.7 billion and that some of this money is now going to unproductive or unnecessary purposes. This brings us into the question of demograts.

The Chairman: We will come to that shortly. I do not know anyone in Parliament who thinks that the Canadian dream can come without taxation. We agree on that. It is not tax-free under any circumstances.

Mr. McNally: Excuse me, Mr. Chairman. Mr. MacPherson does not agree. Would you like to comment?

Mr. MacPherson: I want to present an abstract idea and I probably can only do it if you sympathize with me a little bit. I felt that Senator Pearson has not been answered very well.

Canada's income, real income, depends upon productivity, what we produce, and our productivity as a country is about 2 per cent per year. Now wheat has been much higher recently. This rate of productivity is the lowest of all industrial nations of the world. The United States is 3 plus. When you get into Germany you get 4. The U.K. possibly may be less than ours. Japan is 9. Holland, a small country, is 11. I am talking not precisely, but this is very close in real terms.

Now, if we could get productivity up to 4 per cent and we are going to have an increase in our labour force of 3 per cent, that means that this country would grow at 7 per cent per year in real terms. That means that the size of the country would double every decade. This makes such a fantastic change within a decade that it is hard to visualize.

Our thesis is certainly that we have to have Government expenditures, but we are advocating a balanced view. It would be almost economic suicide if today we allowed our sympathies to go beyond the point that would not provide employment for these 250-260,000 people who were entering the labour force every year. If we go too far beyond that—as much as we want to and, God knows, I am a Maritimer and know what poverty is—in the long run all we do is create a situation in which most of us are poor. If we keep this vision before us, as I think I mentioned in this report, if we could grow at 7 per cent, which is very modest in terms of our technology today, by the year 2000 we would have the same Gross National Product, in real terms, as the United States had in 1963.

If we cannot solve Senator Pearson's problem tomorrow, we can do an awful lot towards solving it during the next decade if we have a balanced programme, certainly looking after the needy today but making sure that we are expanding industry sufficiently so that those people coming into the labour force can be employed productively.

The Chairman: Mr. MacPherson, when you took the 2 per cent you took the all-time low.

Mr. MacPherson: This is the average for the decade in the sixties.

The Chairman: I thought it was 5 per cent. Our forecast for the immediate next five years is 5 per cent.

Mr. MacPherson: I am talking in real terms.

The Chairman: Are you talking of the others in real terms?

Mr. MacPherson: I am talking of the others in real terms.

The Chairman: When you talk about making provision for the poor, the old people who are receiving about $25 or $30 a week—that is what they are getting at the present time—is there any suggestion or justification for saying that they can get along on that sum of money?

Mr. MacPherson: Again, this is a question that, speaking as an economist, I am not qualified to answer. Other members have their opinion on this. What we are waiting for is a report of these very competent people in Ottawa who are working in this area.

The point I am stressing is that it has to be balanced; we have to get productivity in this country up; and we have to provide jobs for this expanding labour force. Right now, with the youngsters coming out of college and those seeking summer employment, there is almost a national crisis.

The Chairman: There are some very clever men working in this field in Ottawa who know a great deal about it, and we bow to them; but I can assure you that the people around this table know a little about it too. I do not have to go to a minister, deputy minister or anyone; I just have to go to you and say to you, you having lived in the Maritimes and other places, "What does $25 a week mean or $30" I think Mr. Benson said that you could live on $30 a week. He did not point out where. What can that possibly mean to old folks and other similarly disadvantaged?

Mr. McNally: Mr. Chairman, we think the Minister of Finance has been wrong in other directions too—his tax policies, for example.

The Chairman: I have heard you made a presentation.

Mr. McNally: I just want to put what the General Manager said. We went up to see the people, both in the Senate and in the House, and tried to suggest to them that if they would remove some of the shackles on the productive enterprise of Canada and introduce an incentive tax system, we would do the best we could to create 90 per cent of the jobs for those in Canada that are thrown out by private employers.

We also appreciate that 60 per cent of the people who are poor are working. Our submission, Mr. Chairman, is that we would try to take those 60 per cent who were working and were unskilled and, through the enterprise system, make them more skilled and hence give them better jobs. That would relieve a real problem without a large taxation system.

The Chairman: Mr. McNally, may I just indicate to you that the fastest-growing expenditure in the federal Government is that on education within our scope. We have done that for 5 years anyway. Have we got results?

Mr. McNally: They are beginning to come through.

The Chairman: I share your view. You think they are coming through. So do I, as I am sure do the members of this Committee. But if you saw the level of the discussion at Winnipeg last week, what were they aiming to cut down? You saw that one of the things they were aiming at was the education budget, and they said, "Stop its growth," or words to that effect.

Mr. McNally: Mr. Chairman, as I read it, there were some complaints about the efficiency with which the education budget is being administered. I am not privy to the reasons given by the people at that congress, but there may have been something in that.

The Chairman: Whenever you are short of an excuse you always raise the point that the administration is bad, that efficiency is failing and that sort of thing; but, life is real.

Mr. MacPherson: Mr. Chairman, there is a factor, regardless of education, that applies to retirement. Technology—and, of course, I see it from the viewpoint of the chemical industry and others see it from the viewpoint of other industries—is growing at such a rapid rate that it is making all of us obsolete. I only hope that I can last as an economist for a few more years.

Even for people with very extensive education, there is retraining from the top level right down. You want performance and you want certain standards, and these standards are, unfortunately for many people, going up all the time. This does constitute a real problem.

The Chairman: I identified, as best I could, the poverty stricken, and I indicated that about 40 per cent of them were in the disadvantaged group. I think you shared our view, that they had to be looked after. The question of amount was a matter, perhaps, for the Government to fix.

Mr. MacPherson: Our figures are different, but we would not argue figures.

The Chairman: So what we have is 55 per cent of the other group working fulltime, part-time, in and out, lacking skills—some having some skills and some not having skills. They are really the great poverty problem. There you perpetuate it, because these people want to work but they just cannot.

Now, you are as much an expert on that as anyone in the country—at least, I think you are, and I am sure the committee does. What is our approach there? I am going to make it a little tough for you. In my mind I wonder whether we are sort of "with it" or not, as a group. You and I are about the same age—I am probably a little older. I wonder whether we are "with it" or not. We have $1.65 per hour heralded as a great advance in the minimum wage; it is an improvement. What does that give a man? About $70 a week. With 3 or 4 children or no children, it does not make any difference. No one has suggested that this is adequate for him to live on today. We are thinking in terms of having an unemployment insurance scheme that will pay him $100 a week when he is not working.

Are you thinking in real terms, or are we thinking in real terms when this is likely to be the law of the land before the end of the year? Of course, from my point of view, I welcome it very much; but you may not. Aside from whether you welcome it or not, that thinking is in the air.

Mr. MacPherson: We look at things through different windows, but I suspect our end is the same, really. I can think of companies that have gone into rural areas. I think of one plant in Maitland that has changed the whole face of that land. It has not done much for the fathers, but is has provided really good careers for the youngsters.

When I think of this regional development I think of plants going into Quebec, into the Maritimes. I think it is a question for Ottawa as to how much money is going into welfare, as to how much money is going into Canada. This is the decision that is going to be made here.

Speaking as an economist, I think our submission this morning is to make sure that the capital requirements of this country are given some kind of a priority. Perhaps you give it a different priority than I would, but I am very anxious that it be given proper priority. For instance, in private enterprise we have to compete in doing the job. Our corporate tax rate is 53 per cent. We compete with Japan where the corporate tax rate is roughly 37 to 25 per cent, depending upon certain conditions, and they have unlimited depreciation. Now, looking at it through the eyes of management, despite their best intentions to locate a plant in Moncton, New Brunswick, they know that they have to compete with this. These are some of the very hard facts that we face.

The Chairman: Mr. MacPherson, I have been in this arena for 25 years, I have seen the Chamber come and make a presentation, and the argument is the same. We have done pretty well in this country, despite the fact that there was always the argument that we are pricing ourselves out of the market. We do on some occasions, and sometimes other people price themselves out of the market. We have done very well, have not we?

Mr. MacPherson: With all respect, sir, the manufacturing industry in Canada during the decade of the sixties grew at a slower rate than any other country in the world. If that had not been the case we might have had plants in Quebec and the Maritimes. This is a statistical fact, which probably bears out, at least partially, some of our too pessimistic warnings given from time to time.

It is only natural always to see one's future in the darkest terms, but events have unfortunately substantiated too many of the warnings of the Chamber. I have been on some of these delegations to the Cabinet, and our arguments have been dismissed. But you have to look at what has happened to the manufacturing industry in Canada and the rest of the world.

Mr. Carty: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the Chamber has always decried anything for the public good. Our position has always been to make sure that we put our priorities and our work where they will do the most. We will always have to make sure that from the industry standpoint we put forward the competitive situation. I do not mind raising my wages a dollar an hour if everybody else is going to raise them a dollar an hour. All that will happen is that we both raise our prices, so the fellow who is going to buy is in no different position.

What we are trying to say is, let us move along, let us help our people, but let us keep

Canada competitive. Let us not try to do more for ourselves than other people are getting, because if we do we will eventually go to the well and there will be nothing there for us.

The Chamber is not trying to say we should keep those people down and so forth. Nothing of that nature. We never have. We want to put before the Government, and others making these decisions, some of the problems affecting the industrialists, the workers, farmers and so forth throughout the country. If you put too much of the load on them, they cannot handle it. The load has to go along with the people you are competing with.

What we are trying to put across is that we have all the sympathy in the world; we want to help these 40 per cent of the people you are speaking about. About the others we have to be a little careful. We have to find a way because of the 40 per cent that we agree will not help productivity. With the 60 per cent we can get something out of it. They want to give it. We have to find a way to share the wealth of the country with them so that they provide some of it.

The Chairman: I agree with everything you say. That 45 or 50 per cent, whatever it is, that I speak of say, "Sure, I want to work. I want a job." That is the first requirement. I will discuss that with you in a minute. Suppose a job is not now available to a man in this country at the present time. What happens to him? Is it a Government responsibility to be the employer of last resort, or, in the alternative, to provide for him until such time as he is able to get a job? Is that a social responsibility of this country?

Mr. Carty: Yes. I do not think anyone in this country will let that person starve. That is the extreme. They will do their best to find him a job. I think what we have to ask ourselves is how much the rest of the country competitively can provide.

Mr. Fleury: Mr. Chairman, our general manager is just back from Taiwan, and I think he has a very good story to tell in terms of how to organize the economy to produce in a very short period of time and get away from American aid. If he would like to speak to this, I think it is pertinent and germane.

Before he does so, could I ask the committee a question? Poverty is a symptom. This is a committee on poverty, a committee on symptoms. Has there ever been in the Senate a committee on Growth?

The Chairman: The manpower study was a study on growth.

Mr. Fleury: Ten years ago?

The Chairman: Out of that came the Department of Manpower.

Mr. Fleury: I am speaking about what triggers the economic growth in a country. Should that not be examined by the Senate or the House?

The Chairman: I thought Mr. Pepin was doing that, and devoting himself entirely to that.

Mr. Scofield: Mr. Chairman, I think the comments Mr. McNally was making regarding Taiwan can be summed up very quickly. The people want to work, and it is in their own interests to work. There is no question of whether they can live as well on social benefits they get through government as they can if they have a job. Secondly, I think there is an attitude towards productivity by the Chinese people in Taiwan. This makes the difference. It is true that their wage rates are lower, but they have increased very substantially. Their standard of education has increased substantially. In 1969 it was down to what the Government said was 7 per cent illiteracy. A year later they say there is no illiteracy. Twenty-six per cent of the people are receiving education of some form or other.

In Taiwan the attitude of the people is a willingness and desire to work. They have a desire to produce, combined with increasing opportunities and an urge to be educated. These are the solutions and the reasons for their success. I think we must recognize that perhaps our attitude towards looking after ourselves is an attitude that we have lost. Many people have lost this in the past decade, and perhaps before.

I stood Tuesday morning outside the door at the University of Western Ontario just before breakfast. I saw six young Canadians supposed to be doing a job. Five of them were sitting on their fannies, and one was off by himself working. I came back in 15 minutes, and again a half hour later. The five had never got up. The one lad kept on working. True, these were young people, but it worries me, and it must worry all of us. The attitude of being able to work and care for yourself should be something we should approach with pride, and we should discourage, and find ways to discourage, the young people, and the older people too, who say, "Well, I don't have to work because I can be taken care of," or "I can get away with it". That is one of our problems.

This gets me back to the question of an interest, a concern and a willingness to participate in trying to produce. Not to be slaves, but to produce, and to recognize when we do this that we are all going to gain.

The Chairman: Mr. Scofield, it occurred to me while you were talking about those five people sitting there not doing much that it is really your fault, because that is bad management.

Senator Fournier: Maybe they were working for the Government.

Senator Fergusson: There is something I would like very much to pursue, which came up earlier in this discussion. It concerns older workers. I certainly liked the recommendations regarding older workers. Referring to older workers, it was said, "Retaining Bill Smith might be good for Bill Smith, but not for the business". Also, if young employees see older employees in senior positions they get discouraged, and you may lose young employees. I am sure the argument is good, and I agree with it.

Recently I read an article on Japan, and the reference to Mr. MacPherson being there brought it to my mind. The article said that one of the reasons they had such success in Japan was because the people in senior positions, who decided policy and that sort of thing, were all of the older generation. The article I read gave this as a very good reason for their success.

Did Mr. MacPherson notice there were older people or would he comment on that?

Mr. MacPherson: I can only comment as it is a very confused picture. Because of the relative lack of longevity of the Japanese, until recently it was "mandatory" and I put that word in quotes, for all to retire at age 55. That prevails today to a certain extent, but not in respect of the very capable. Some of the latter whom I saw in Japan were past age 65.

Positions are found in subsidiary companies or consulting capacities for those over the age of 55. This affords the better of both worlds, with the wisdom of the old and the energy of the new coming along.

I was very impressed with the manner in which the Japanese manage their employees.

There was a feeling that employees belonged to the company and consequently they were very well treated.

One of the most interesting things I saw was a strike in the plant I visited. The strike took the form of wearing red armbands. Being in management, I would rather like this. This was a confrontation with Government. This group was striking because although they were employed by an American subsidiary with high wages, security and promotion by merit, they wanted to return to the Japanese system of lower wages, bonuses in June and December and promotion by seniority.

I cannot comment on the wisdom of either. However, we in the Western world should perhaps take a more cognizance of what is going on in Japan as it may contain lessons for us.

Senator Fergusson: You quote Great Britain as an example of a country having extensive social security but experiencing economic difficulties. Sweden is a country with even larger social security expenditures but no difficulties, is it not?

Mr. MacPherson: Senator Fergusson, this varies. When I was in Sweden a couple of years ago it was around 40 which is fairly high. Sweden's statistics are confusing to this extent: when considering productivity in relation to population, they are very high. However, productivity per employee is surprisingly low in our terms. The explanation is that the working force is about 50 per cent female, which is very high. The fact that so many people work gives a false impression of high productivity. Productivity per worker is considerably less than that in Canada.

Mr. McNally: The bloom is off the rose, Mr. Chairman. Last night's Montreal Star reports that there are now real difficulties in Sweden for the first time in 35 years. They had a protracted strike for five months. Which is unheard of in Sweden. They are experiencing many problems in the nature of wage lag and other factors.

The Chairman: Mr. Mondoux made the interesting remark that Mr. McNally had spoken to him about the work ethic.

Mr. McNally: That was a privileged conversation.

The Chairman: We have been discussing it here. Would you take a minute and tell us your view of the work ethic?

Mr. Fleury: This has lately become very popular with behavioral scientists. As I am sure you all know, theory 'X' is the proposal that nobody wants to work; therefore they have to be forced to work. Theory 'Y' takes the opposite view, that everybody wants to work and therefore do not have to be forced to do so, work being its own reward.

With reference to Japan, we must be careful not to compare apples with oranges. We must also be aware that comparisons are invidious, an entirely different situation existing. Visiting Japan is similar to entering another world. I may not be giving information which is new to you. However, I lived in Japan for a year some 20 years ago, and revisited it recently.

The Japanese have the discipline of filial piety and devotion to family. For many centuries they have had to labour to excess just to earn enough rice and noodles to keep body and soul together. The whole country has been oriented for at least 1,500 years to the god emperor. The literacy rate in Japan is phenomenal, less than 1 per cent of the population being illiterate. Education has been given a very high priority over the years.

The need to work long hours for miserable wages has been ingrained into the people for generations and generations. Also, of course, they have no natural resources at all. The only resource the Japanese have is manpower, which they have used very cleverly and effectively. The point that Mr. MacPherson made, that when they strike they keep working, is indicative of their attitude to work. They tie a red arm band around their left arm as an indication that they are on strike but still work from 7 o'clock in the morning to 6 o'clock at night.

The economy is controlled largely by the Government and the Saibatsu, the huge conglomerates that have always been a great factor in Japanese export.

The situation is one of over-employment. For all practical purposes, the unemployment situation today in Japan is less than 2 per cent, probably 1.8 per cent. This is caused by a form of control or deliberate featherbedding. In hotels and restaurants five people do the work of four or three. They are all terribly busy and give you a wonderful feeling of being looked after in the last stronghold of gracious living. A five course meal is brought by five waitresses. This is a deliberate attempt on the part of the Government and the Saibatsu of returning to this feeling of belonging rather than that of isolation which persisted for centuries. They have the feeling that if they are to compete on world markets they have to work twice as hard as others.

We could use some of these things here, but we are not going to get them because the situation is entirely different. We have been brought up in a different ethic, moral or religious, call it what you will. We have been brought up under a different set of economic circumstances. There are 110 million people in an area that we would think overcrowded with one-tenth of that population.

When we look at some of their attitudes, habits and production figures, their taxes, strangely enough, at the corporation level, as Mr. MacPherson has pointed out, are lower than ours, but their general taxes on consumer goods are much higher than ours. For instance, every meal in Japan is taxed 10 per cent. It does not matter who eats it, in every hotel or restaurant the tax is 10 per cent. A bottle of good brandy is $40, an ordinary bottle of whiskey $25.

Mr. MacPherson: Mr. Chairman, at the risk of belabouring a point, if you drink Japanese whiskey it's only five and a half dollars.

Mr. Fleury: That is a very good point. You see how they are protecting home industry. It doesn't matter whether it is diesel oil or good whiskey. It is made at home.

Mr. MacPherson: It is very significant in terms of our problem. Government expenditure in Japan as a percentage of gross national product is 22 per cent versus our 36-37 per cent. Consumer expenditures are deplorably low. They are down to only 50 per cent of GNP, the remainder being invested. Of course, the high level of capital investment encourages the increase in productivity.

There have been statements recently to the effect that we are concentrating too much on growth rather than on distribution. There is much validity to this statement. If one is thinking in terms of Japan or Germany, I think the Japanese are certainly building up pressure there, but they are keeping consumer expenditures down to 50 per cent of gross national product. Meanwhile, as I said, investment is booming leading to greater exports and reinvestment, in Southeast Asia. How long the consumer will put up with this I don't know. There would be a much healthier situation in Japan if growth were to slow down and consumption were to increase. We hear people talking about too much emphasis on growth and not enough on redistribution. This may apply to Japan or Germany, but certainly not to Canada where we have this challenging problem of finding jobs for this 3 per cent of the labour force.

The Chairman: Do you consider, as an economist, that since 1952 we have had no significant redistribution in this country between the rich and the poor?

Mr. MacPherson: As I say, if you go back in 1958 or 1959—the latter part of the fifties—the consumer was getting closer to 66 per cent of the G.N.P., but he is now down to 60 per cent plus or minus a few percentage points. There has been a deterioration here. The difference has not gone to investment; it has gone to government.

The Chairman: I am not so sure.

Mr. MacPherson: Could I qualify that further. I haven't been able to measure this precisely. Some of this apparent deterioration in the position of the consumer has been offset by some benefits he received in the form of an expanded welfare programme. This 2 per cent or 3 per cent is not a reliable figure, but is as near as I can make it.

The Chairman: I do not think you are far out. But the only advances made in that period of time is what has come out of the social benefits?

Mr. McNally: Mr. Chairman, I am very ecumenical and I would like the record to show that you asked me about the work ethic and not the Protestant ethic!

Mr. Mondoux: That is what it is called in the books I read, anyway.

Senator Fournier: It was mentioned here some time ago, and it was significant to me, that 5 per cent of the people on welfare draw 75 per cent of the money. Where do these figures come from?

Mr. McNally: This figure comes from a submission by The Canadian Chamber of Commerce to the Royal Commission on Health Services. It is part of our paragraph on indigents in that submission. I do not have the document with me, but what I said was that 5 per cent of the people on welfare in a particular city—in this case London, Ontario—were consuming 75 per cent of the welfare budget of the welfare agency.

Senator Fournier: At that time you didn't pinpoint it.

The Chairman: Frankly, gentlemen, that could not be so. I find I cannot think of the Canadian poor and the poverty stricken or even the Canadian citizen in the same economic terms as the Japanese or Taiwanese. I have difficulty. I relate more to the American British, French and European countries.

There was something said here about the number of people who are abusing or taking advantage of the welfare system. These are people who can and should work but who do not and yet are receiving assistance. I think that is the substance of what was said.

You have been following the proceedings and you are pretty much aware of it. That statement has been made time and again in the United States and it is one that hurts.

Mr. McNally: It is not our statement. We have not said this.

The Chairman: Someone said it, because I made note of it at the time.

Mr. McNally: We have made some comments on the question of unemployment insurance Mr. Chairman, because we are very much in favour of and commend the Unemployment Insurance Commission for the excellent work that they are doing in trying to eliminate fraud. We think this is excellent. Is that the area you were discussing?

The Chairman: No. I was discussing it in terms of people on welfare who should be working but are not working, and who are drawing welfare.

Mr. Carty: I think, Senator Croll, in the course of the discussion I said that it seemed to us that there is or should be a difference in the approach to welfare for the 40 per cent of the welfare group who were, to use your term, disadvantaged as opposed to the approach to the 60 per cent who could and should be working. This was not meant to imply that these people were frauds. My point was, that if the guaranteed annual wage goes right across the board, there will be some problems because the help the 40 per cent need should be geared and handled differently from the help for those who can be employed, we hope, and made productive. Perhaps that is the point you were referring to.

The Chairman: I was delighted to have our agreement that the disadvantaged people have to be looked after as best we possibly can.

Mr. J. W. Moreland, Member, Health and Welfare Committee, Canadian Chamber of Commerce: I think there are two points, Senator Croll, to be clarified before the discussion ceases. You mentioned there was about 20 per cent or 4 million people in the disadvantaged group and of that some 10 per cent or 12 per cent were widows and orphans. These people are now, or will be very shortly, taken care of through the Canada Pension Plan under Disability and Widows' Benefits. That group will not increase and may reduce substantially.

The Chairman: I have some news for you. I was talking about female heads of families and 350,000 children. These are widows, deserted or separated wives, living apart with no chance at all of getting on. They are probably on allowances now. They are not in the labour force.

Mr. McNally: They are not eligible for the Canada Pension Plan.

The Chairman: Of course not.

Mr. Moreland: In the future widows will be taken care of.

The Chairman: But the divorced and deserted and the others, that is the great group I am talking about.

Mr. Moreland: The other point, sir, you made as I understand it, concerned the case of a man earning $1.65 an hour or $65 or $70 a week. There was mention that the new plan was to provide him with $100. I think in fact it will bring his income up to $100; it will not pay him $100 in addition to what he is earning.

The Chairman: Yes, two-thirds of the wage. Put it on any basis you like. He earns $65 or $70, and if he is on unemployment insurance he gets approximately the same amount of money.

Mr. Moreland: No. Two-thirds.

The Chairman: Yes, up to $100. You are quite right in correcting me on that.

Mr. MacPherson: Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt to give you a figure. You made the statement that the average person was not better off today than he was a decade ago except for government assistance. There is much truth in that, but I would like to elaborate just a little bit. As near as we could tell—we did this calculation last fall—the real income of the average Canadian had increased by only 2 per cent between something like '64 and '65 and '69. Of course, there were two culprits, price increases and taxation.

Government revenue today, which is largely taxation, represents 38 per cent of gross national product. At the wartime peak with wartime expenditures the comparable figure was only 28 per cent. Now, we just cannot go on adding to this. I think the consumer, the worker—with certain exceptions in certain trades—is in a difficult position. We appreciate this. A very considerable part of that is accounted for by the increase in taxes.

I don't think anybody in 1944 could have forecast that after 25 years of peace the taxation burden would be a third higher than it was in 1944. This is the situation we are facing.

The Chairman: The Government takes the position that they need the money for the development of the country. The provincial governments take a good slice, municipal governments take a good slice and there it is. When they sit down and start examining these departmental figures you would be surprised how little flexibility and how little room there is to get away from those fixed costs.

Mr. McNally: Parliament says it needs the money to develop the country, but is the country developing? The figures that Mr. MacPherson quoted show a 2 per cent real growth rate as compared to about 11 per cent for Holland, for example.

The Chairman: In our own way we are developing very well. We are not comparing ourselves with Japan...

Mr. McNally: Holland. 11 per cent.

The Chairman: You have to compare bananas with bananas. They have a different standard of living. They have a different approach in Holland.

Mr. McNally: Let's compare the level of social welfare benefits as between Canada and the United States. Here it is about 10 per cent. In the United States it is 7.2 per cent.

The Chairman: Yes. But there are other benefits in the United States that make up the difference and other costs that go far beyond what we are spending on social benefits.

Mr. McNally: When I was making the comparison you didn't like Holland, so I picked the United States.

The Chairman: As I indicated to you, taking the American comparison, we spend far less on a percentage basis than the Americans do.

Mr. Carly: I think Mr. MacPherson was saying that there is no question of the country developing. But perhaps he was questioning whether or not the distribution of gross national product was different and whether the country might develop more. I think this is the point he was making. I think he felt that money in investment, rather than something else, might develop the country more and so give all Canadians more.

Mr. MacPherson: Thank you.

The Chairman: He has been doing very well this morning in making his point.

Senator Pearson: Where is the Government putting the money? Not in production of new goods, etc. What they are doing is putting the money into airports and highways and such things. This is not production. It helps in a certain way, but it does not give everyone the right to say that this is production.

The Chairman: Well, of course, you need airports and highways.

Senator Pearson: But you need bread and butter and machinery first.

The Chairman: If you didn't have the airports these fellows would really complain.

May I just say, on behalf of the Committee, you are most welcome. You have had some hard questions thrown at you, but you are knowledgeable people. You are people who know the score. If we are going to probe, you are the people that we have to probe at. If it was a little harsh today, you understand why it should be so.

Your brief has been valuable and we have had a useful discussion. We appreciate the time and thought you took to put it together. We have profited by it. We thank you very much for coming here this morning.

The committee adjourned.

POVERTY

by

The Executive Council

THE CANADIAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

PREFACE

This submission is presented in the name of, and on behalf of, the Executive Council of The Canadian Chamber of Commerce which acts during the interim between the meetings of the National Board of Directors. The following views are based on, and derived from the Statement of Policy of the Chamber.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce is the national voluntary federation of over 800 autonomous Boards of Trade and Chambers of Commerce (the terms are synonymous) in communities throughout Canada.

These community Boards of Trade and Chambers of Commerce exist to promote civic, commercial, industrial and agricultural progress in the areas in which they operate and to promote good government at all levels. Seventy-five per cent of them serve communities of less than 5,000 population. In addition, the Chamber has some 2,700 corporation members comprising businesses of all sizes, all types of enterprise engaged in production, marketing and service, and in all parts of Canada as well as twenty-nine national business and professional association members.

The Chamber, therefore, is representative of the full range of business in Canada: small businesses, agricultural, large businesses, unincorporated businesses, sole proprietorships, partnerships and professionals in which the employees of these enterprises economic future depends upon the success or failure of these enterprises.

The Chamber yields to no group in its concern for the quality of life of all Canadians and in its determination to discharge its social responsibility in addition to performing its economic tasks. If this Brief seems to address itself largely to the practical and economic aspects of the poverty problem in Canada, rather than to the humanitarian values, let it be noted that we speak for business and make no apology for concentrating on features with which we are in daily contact and on which we should have experience and specialized knowledge and which we sincerely are prepared to place at the service of our disadvantaged fellow citizens. As our Policy Statement indicates, we believe that sustainable social betterment depends on healthy, competitive enterprise and economically strong Canadian enterprises.

INTRODUCTION

1. The social security programs of all Canadian governments have grown so rapidly in recent years, involving such a large percentage of taxation revenue, that the Chamber welcomes an in-depth objective appraisal of the whole range of policies now in effect. In any such re-examination, three broad criteria should be applied in judging the efficiency of any particular program. First, its impact on the growth and development of the Canadian economy. Second, its effectiveness in alleviating poverty and ultimately removing its causes. Third, any area of overlap with other programs.

2. Canada has the human, material and technological resources to provide a rising standard of living and a betterment of the quality of life for all Canadians. To achieve this, we should make the most effective use of such resources and distribute the resulting output in a manner that will strike that balance between the levels of consumption and investment needed to ensure the optimum rate of growth of the Canadian economy. From the social security point of view, this involves first the marshalling and effective use of all resources, including the efforts of the individual; second, in the words of the late Sir Winston Churchill, bringing the magic of averages to the benefit of many in the form of insurance; and thirdly, the granting, where necessary, of financial assistance as a supplement by government.

3. The Canadian economy is capable of meeting social needs and there need not be nor should there be privation or destitution in this country. Although it is now possible to reconcile economic potential and human needs, limits must be established against unrealistic demands which place a brake on economic growth. The potential of the economy cannot always keep pace with the growing and glowing promises of some who compete for political power.

4. Those who plan and develop social welfare programs should guard against short-term palliatory measures at the expense of long-term growth in the living standards of the entire population.

5. The Chamber has over a number of years articulated several policies in the field of Social Security and Employment of Special Categories of Workers. The following views represent the considered and adopted views of the business community as represented by the Canadian Chamber which is described in the Preface.

SOCIAL SECURITY

128. Canada's security philosophy, policies and programmes should recognize that most Canadians can, and wish to, provide for their own security. Those who cannot, through no fault of their own, should be treated with compassion and provided with selective and restorative remedies.

129. Canada's educational systems should inculcate self-reliance in order to deal with a complicated and complex world. It should also engender a care for the community and a capacity for independent thought, and an acquisition of skills for today's increasingly competitive world.

130. Owing to the fact that Canada has now an urban rather than a rural-based population, it may appear desirable on a pragmatic basis to develop contributory, state-administered schemes. In such an eventuality, care should be taken to provide a public advisory body with members drawn from representative bodies in the community. Care should also be taken for a statutory exhaustive review of public plans so that these are kept modern and purposeful.

131. Since social security is a matter of divided jurisdiction in Canada, federal-provincial liaison groups should continue to function and should resolutely prune over-lapping programmes to the end that the saved funds be put to better use elsewhere if they are needed, or to the relief of the already heavily-burdened Canadian taxpayer.

132. Finally, the Chamber realizes keenly that there is a poverty problem in Canada and agrees that the poverty cycle must be broken. The business community in Canada is one of the central instruments for dealing with this problem. It is already engaged in making its contribution firstly by way of providing employment, by way of training, retraining, industrial medicine, counselling, etc. It continues to pledge its resources and skills in a resolute and effective battle towards eliminating poverty in Canada.

EMPLOYMENT OF SPECIAL CATEGORIES OF WORKERS

98. The full utilisation of Canada's manpower resources is essential for our economic advance. Employers should be cognizant of the important contribution that special categories of workers, e.g. older or handicapped persons, can make to our nation's productive effort.

Employment of the Older Worker

99. Studies have indicated that the older worker, if properly placed, can compare favourably in performance with other workers and can make a considerable contribution to the production of the country. Furthermore, the older worker group represents a reservoir of skill and experience that the country can ill afford to waste. The addition of older workers to our labour force would enlarge our productive capacity.

100. Recommendation:

that Canadian employers recognize the skill, experience and reliability of older workers and give consideration to the suitable employment of this group to the fullest extent practicable.

Rehabilitation Program

101. Future financial assistance by the Federal Government should be directed only to the areas in which the individual is unable to help himself, to the indigent, the aged, the chronically ill and to those who suffer catastrophic medical expense. It is for the above groups, and for the physically, socially or mentally handicapped who, lacking services, are likely to fall into these groups, that rehabilitation is an investment in human welfare which should be adequately supported by Federal assistance.

102. The beginning of the rehabilitation of a patient is the adequate, proper, skilled medical and surgical care that the individual receives at, or soon after, the time of his primary illness or injury. These medical services, together with physical restoration, psychological, social and vocational services should be supplied as necessary, so that the ultimate goal of complete rehabilitation is achieved.

103. A co-ordinated rehabilitation program combining physical restoration, social, psychological and vocational services is a money-saving device, bringing satisfaction and independence to the severely handicapped.

104. The rehabilitation of all handicapped persons must be aided by work assessment, counselling, guidance and help in job-placement and retraining where necessary. In this respect, existing facilities in the community, such as technical institutes and business schools, should be used.

105. The rehabilitated individual will be an economic asset to employers, and rehabilitation methods should be based on sound knowledge and experience. By applying common sense, the procedures can be kept simple and inexpensive, and where possible should be carried out in the local community, using available public or private services. We commend the Government for its legislative action in this field and will continue our efforts to encourage our members to provide suitable employment opportunities for disabled persons in accordance with their abilities.

106. Recommendations:

1. That the Federal Government encourage and support the Provinces in every way possible to develop co-ordinated rehabilitation programs which will provide such facilities and services as are necessary to bring comprehensive rehabilitation to those individuals who can benefit.

2. That in developing such services, the fullest co-operation of employers, workers, government and voluntary agencies be encouraged.

Employment of the Handicapped

107. It is suggested that many jobs do not require the full capacities of an able-bodied person. If a handicapped person still has the required capabilities, he is not handicapped in that particular job.

108. Experience has proven that persons with various degrees of mental retardation can be satisfactorily employed in many jobs suited to their capabilities. Moreover, the importance of returning persons recovered from mental illness to productive employment without undue delay cannot be over-emphasized.

109. Many persons in our society are socially handicapped. These include the individual with a prison record, the indigent, the alcoholic, and those with inadequate education. With counselling, assessment, basic education, retraining and job placement, they can be productive and stable in employment.

110. Recommendations:

1. that employers continue to co-operate in the placing of those with physical, mental or social handicaps in suitable jobs wherever possible; and

2. that employers who have not already done so investigate the possibility of employing those with physical, mental, or social handicaps.

SEASONAL UNEMPLOYMENT

111. Unused capacity, lessened employment, and idle equipment is an economic waste that Canada can ill afford.

112. Seasonal unemployment in Canada is a problem meriting serious consideration and discussion because it involves a recurring annual waste of manpower and frequently of productive capacity. We recognize the solving of this problem is the responsibility of all groups in Canada. We pledge our co-operation in efforts to solve this national problem.

ECONOMIC CRITERIA FOR THE AMOUNT AND EXTENT OF HEALTH AND SOCIAL WELFARE

6. Before considering individual plans, it will be helpful to establish further criteria for evaluating the immediate direct and longer term indirect effects of decision in the social security field.

Need

7. Concepts of need have changed rapidly with the passage of time. The actual amounts required in Canada vary greatly with geographic regions, between urban and rural areas, and with family composition. Poverty is often looked upon as a relative condition. Furthermore, despite the claim of some that just as many people are poor today as twenty-five years ago, it is beyond doubt that cases of absolute need now constitute a much smaller proportion of the population than at any time in our history. The interpretation of statistics on poverty is further confused by the fact that the popular concept of poverty envisages a level of income much below that believed necessary by those with responsibilities for social security.

8. Any definition of poverty must therefore be inexact. Qualitatively, this is the state in which the individual is unable to command the necessities of life. Statistically and economically, it is an income level which does not provide a minimum living standard. Today the guideline accepted informally by the federal government and other groups places the so-called "poverty line" at $1,500 per annum for an individual and up to $4,000 for a family of five or more¹.

¹ The Economic Council in its Fifth Annual Review has endorsed a D.B.S. census monograph on low income families in 1961 (J. R. Podoluk, Incomes of Canada, D.B.S. Census Monograph, 1968) which contains two estimates of "total poverty". Under the first, low income families and individuals were defined as those using 70% or more of their income for food, clothing and shelter. In the second estimate, it is assumed that 60% or more is spent on the necessities indicated. Using these guidelines, poverty lines were defined as:

	Lower Estimate	Higher Estimate
Single persons	$1,500	$2,000
Families of two	2,500	3,500
Families of three	3,000	4,000
Families of four	3,500	4,000
Families of five or more	4,000	5,000

9. While these levels of income are below desirable levels for Canadians today, the standard of living which they represent is well above that enjoyed by all but those in the upper income levels of the last century. It should be noted too, that these poverty guidelines represent standards of living greater than that enjoyed by a large proportion of the population in most countries outside the North American continent today. They relate to a level of wages and salaries well above that found in most nations who compete with the output of Canadian workers in both foreign and domestic markets. As a matter of record, average income per person in Canada was about $2,250² (U.S. funds) for 1968. The comparable figure was about $1,700 per² year for Germany, the strongest economy in Western Europe and one from whom our own government has borrowed. The level for Great Britain was similar. The average income in Japan, by no means an underdeveloped country, was $1,100 per annum in 1968.²

10. It may help to clarify our thinking if we remind ourselves that poverty has many faces. The most permanently poor are those people who are normally incapable of earning a living, such as the disabled or the deserted mothers with children. Second, there is the life-cycle poverty which occurs at predictable periods when people cannot work because of youth or old age. Finally, there are those who are in temporary financial stringency because of illness or other catastrophic developments. In more normal times, the people suffering from life-cycle or contingency poverty may be perfectly capable of meeting their own needs. In fact, during normal periods, some undoubtedly have enjoyed an above-average income. Their need is clearly for insurance. Those normally unable to work, on the other hand, are candidates for social security.

11. A little reflection leads to the conclusion that Canada's social security program has gone a long way towards meeting minimum requirements. The much greater question which faces this country today is whether those with some income, but who are still poor, when measured by the standards set by the Economic Council, should receive governmental assistance. Before answering this question, it is necessary to assess Canada's ability to pay and other contextual questions.

Canada's Ability to Provide Social Security Payments

12. Because a plan may be financially feasible, given the government's borrowing and taxing authority, it does not necessarily follow that it is physically possible and economically beneficial. A crucial criterion in evaluating a social security program must be a nation's ability to provide the physical as well as the financial resources needed. At the federal level alone there are over 200¹ programs for human development, with an annual bill of $5.5 billion,² provincial governments are currently budgeting about $3.1 billion for health and welfare. And municipalities spend another $130 million³. Thus, the total welfare bill is more than $8.7 billion. These figures do not take into account the very substantial outlays for education made by the various Canadian governments. (Note Appendix 1). These figures are equivalent to more than four-hundred dollars for every person in this country. If the bill is related to the number of employed people in Canada—who generate the incomes which are taxed directly or indirectly to support social security—the burden on each worker already exceeds eleven-hundred dollars.

13. It does not seem reasonable for public authorities to encroach further upon incomes, thus endangering private initiative. This view rests on a solid statistical base. In 1969, for example, revenues of all governments in this country were equivalent to 37.8 per cent⁴ of the gross national product. This ratio far surpasses that of the United States, Japan and Australia, which possess strong and dynamic economies. 37.8 per cent compares with a figure of 28 per cent⁴ for 1944, a year in which the government's war outlays reached their peak.

14. There is evidence that we are caught in a vicious circle. We increase governmental expenditures for social security and other purposes, impose new taxes, increase prices and devalue earnings and savings thus pushing more people towards the poverty line, with a resulting demand for more governmental assistance.

15. This circle is demonstrated in Appendix II. When a nation is faced with unemployment, idle plant capacity and other unused productive resources, increased expenditures by consumers, industry and/or government all have beneficial effects and lead to an increase in economic activity. Thus, during such periods in the past, governments were able to make increased outlays for social security purposes with pronounced beneficial effects on both industry and the economy. It is now generally recognized that deficit financing can promote economic expansion as long as productive resources are not fully employed (left side of spiral).

16. However, once full employment has been reached, (right side) increased government expenditures do not produce more goods and services but only serve to upset the delicate balance between investment and consumption required to maintain the economy at full employment without inflation.

17. Unfortunately this dramatic change in cause and effect which occurs once resources become fully utilized is all too frequently ignored by governments. They point to the past benefits that have been achieved from higher social security outlays and demand more of the same. An increase in demand without any compensating expansion in the production of goods and services must inevitably lead to inflationary price increases, particularly when the accompanying loss of confidence and the inevitable higher taxes which occur under such conditions retard the volume of new investment required for the needed expansion in productive capabilities.

18. The Canadian economy is today in the steeply upward stages of this spiral. Rising prices, wages and taxes have been accompanied by lower profits and capital investment. Inflationary pressures continue to build up and, at the same time, government spending grows at close to thirteen per cent per annum. The restraint on private demand imposed by government to contain inflation is leading us back to a situation of high unemployment. Eventually the situation is compounded by the unfortunate combination of serious unemployment and inflation at the same time.

19. The task facing Canada in 1970 and beyond is to break this vicious spiral by restoring a measure of financial prudence in the conduct of government. Otherwise the continuation of this spiral will destroy the purchasing power of the savings of a larger proportion of people, and thus push more people, even those in the upper-middle income group, to the point where they too become candidates for welfare assistance.

Economic Effects of Increased Social Security Expenditure on Canada's Growth Potential

20. The effect of social security expenditures on the rate of growth and development of the overall Canadian economy merits the most critical examination. To expand social security plans or to add new ones, can greatly alter structural and environmental conditions which in turn exert a determining influence on the growth of the economy. The explanation is simple: economic growth and progress is heavily dependent upon productive capabilities, which in turn requires high investments to increase plant capacity and equally large capital outlays to achieve the improvements in productivity made possible by adopting the latest technological advances.

21. The full magnitude of these capital needs is illustrated by the figures in the following table. During 1968 (the most recent year for which figures are available), Canada had to turn to imported capital for $100 million of its capital needs. Even if only moderate economic growth is achieved, this shortfall will rise to $4.0 billion (see Table 1) by 1975. If Canada experiences a 5.5 per cent growth rate, which is considered barely adequate, the shortfall will be $5.0 billion. And if this country were to grow at its full potential of 7 per cent per year—which is well within our productive capabilities, given appropriate economic policies—then the need for imported capital rises to $8.6 billion by 1975. The figure is so much higher than that for median growth, because of the restructuring of the Canadian economy which would take place, i.e. the greater concentration on the high productivity industries and the gradual phasing out of the industrial enterprises with low income generating potentials.

Shortfall of Domestic Funds

22. Because Canada must compete for its investment funds in world markets where capital will be in short supply, profit opportunities in this country must compare favourably with other nations. For the great majority of manufactured goods at least, this is not the case at present. What is required therefore are costs and taxes at rates sufficiently low to enable Canadian manufacturers to remain competitive in world markets. These are the harsh realities of the times, and in devising social security programs these facts must be taken into account or living standards will fall regardless of even the most comprehensive of social security plans.

23. The nation might even fail in maintaining the priority in any social security program which, of course, is full employment. But preoccupation with economic difficulties should not be permitted to obscure the truly enormous improvement in living conditions that will be attained during the next generation if we use our resources wisely and effectively. Canada has the human and material resources necessary to achieve an increase of 7% per annum in gross national product. In fact, if this country's economy were to grow at a 7% rate for the rest of this century, Canadian G.N.P. by the year 2000 would be equal in size to that of the United States for 1963. This is a truly staggering potential.

24. If Canada can achieve this high and steadily rising level of economic activity, the benefits to every individual in Canada are truly amazing and truly beneficial in terms of human dignity and quality of life. These include more job opportunities, rising incomes, more funds available for needed social security and rising living standards for all. It is surely true that unless there is economic growth, there will soon be no increased income and no wealth redistribution.

Growth alone may not cure poverty, but poverty will most certainly not be cured without buoyant sustained growth. Distributed poverty may provide equality, but new wealth must be produced and distributed if poverty is to be eliminated.

Incentive

25. One of the most serious problems of extensive social security is the incentive or disincentive to work which it may create in the recipient. There are at least two schools of thought. One maintains that if you give a man enough money to subsist, we believe generally you will destroy his incentive to work. In fact, there are places which have come to accept handouts as a way of life. According to this viewpoint, not welfare, but retraining is the solution to poverty.

26. On the other hand, another school insists that if you assure a man enough money to buy the basic decencies of life, you motivate him to work for more money. To some extent, both of these propositions are largely untested in Canada, although work is being undertaken in other countries.

27. Before Canada commits itself to any new plan, such as, for example, the guaranteed annual income, far more intensive and skilled research and investigation must be undertaken by social scientists, economists, financial experts and governments. In addition, considerable experimentation with carefully designed pilot projects are needed. One of the most outstanding research projects in this field is the experiment with graduated work incentives undertaken in New Jersey and Pennsylvania in mid-1968. The recently-published preliminary results indicate that graduated income supplements may motivate people to work. Nevertheless, even the people in charge of the project are not yet convinced that such a program has uniformly favourable effects. Further experimentation on their evaluation is required in Canada.

28. However, this debate about incentive overlooks the real difficulty. And it is that if any group is assured substantial welfare assistance without working for it, a much larger proportion of the population whose efforts must support those on welfare out of their productive efforts will eventually lose their incentive to labour. This is a far more serious consideration in light of the fact that even now Canada's growth in real dollars is practically horizontal.

Universality

29. Many of this country's social security benefits have taken the form of demogrant or universal payments. This has resulted in funds which might otherwise have been available for welfare and benefit being diverted from areas of need to areas of non-need. For example, the annual old age security disbursements of the order of $1.7 billion¹ per year are not sufficient even with old age supplements to prevent claims of want and privation for at least half of the over 65 population, largely because of the proportion paid to those who don't need it. Family allowances which cost $600 million are at too low¹ a level to break the poverty cycle for some of the younger generation while $300 million of this amount is paid to those who don't really need this help. Even the Canada Pension Plan, which was supposed to relate contributions to benefits, heavily subsidizes those who need it least. For example, a person retiring 10 years after the plan started will receive a pension worth $15,000 more than the contributions part on his behalf even if he were a millionaire.

30. The present taxes raised for these purposes would have accomplished much more in the alleviation of real need had we relied on selectivity instead of universality in drafting our social welfare plans. This is the obvious solution in any extensions of existing plans or in the development of any new plans. It is to be hoped that the Prime Minister's statement that "What we need now is more selective programmes which will meet the needs of the dispossessed and the underprivileged" will be rigorously followed.

31. Every industrially advanced society has adopted the obligation to assist or provide for the less privileged. But we must not overlook the fact that most people in our society are capable of achieving such a standard by their own efforts. The main objective should therefore be to provide the opportunity to do so. Much can be said for the inherently therapeutic value of, and the strong need to, work.

32. Thus far, this belief in the obligation of the more privileged to assist the less privileged has developed criteria for evaluating welfare proposals, including need, ability to pay, effect on economic growth, incentive and opportunity. The point is made that universality should be re-examined and more effectively employed in meeting the needs of the poorer and lower income groups. This country should remind itself that the most important requisition for the well-being of all is a growing and prosperous economy with full employment and rising incomes. If this goal is achieved, moreover, there will be less need for some of the social security measures aimed at income redistribution, which had their basis in the depression psychology of the nineteen-thirties.

GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME (G.A.I.)

33. In the Guide for the Submission of Briefs to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, there is an indication under Poverty Programmes, that the Committee would be specifically interested in such matters as the Guaranteed Annual Income, Negative Income Tax, and Income Maintenance Policies. We respond to this request in a preliminary way, having in mind the fact that two White Papers on matters related to social security have still not been published. The first of these, of course, is, according to a press story, a White Paper from the Minister of Labour on Unemployment Insurance changes. The second is the White Paper on Social Security mentioned in a Speech from the Throne on October 23rd, 1969. Following publication of these White Papers the Chamber will naturally be in a better position to make further representation and would welcome the opportunity to do so.

34. The guaranteed annual income approach to social security is presently under consideration by the Canadian government. For this reason it will be examined in some depth in this brief.

Universal Payment

35. The proposals take two main forms. The first is that espoused by the American Robert Theobald, who would give to everyone with income below an established poverty line enough money to bring him to that poverty line.

36. A major criticism of this approach is that it would destroy the incentive to work of all those below the poverty line and, to some extent, a number of those above the line as well. Theobald's defence is that "Americans in all income classes have an almost pathological desire to toil". This assumption, however, is of doubtful validity, particularly when a guaranteed income is in such form that an extra dollar earned from work means a dollar less in welfare payments.

37. Related to this problem is the enormous cost of a guaranteed annual income. Rough estimates of the cost of such a program to Canada will be discussed in a later section of this brief.

Negative Income Tax

38. The second major type of G.A.I. currently under discussion is the negative income tax, whose strongest proponent is the economist Milton Friedman. According to his plan, a family with an income below an established poverty line would receive an income supplement which would be a percentage of the difference between the two. If, for example, the poverty line is $3,000, the family's income is $2,000 and the percentage of negative tax is 50 per cent, the supplement would be half of the difference or $500.

39. The advantage of this approach is that it retains the incentive to work, because an extra dollar of earned income reduces welfare benefits by only a proportion of that dollar. Its cost is naturally less than that of the full G.A.I.

40. Professor Friedman advocates the negative income tax as a replacement for, rather than a supplement to, all current welfare programs. While this would undoubtedly be more economical than if the G.A.I. were merely "stacked" on top of existing programs, sole reliance could not be placed on this approach. Such an income guarantee, for example, could not replace medical and hospital programs, counselling and related social services, retraining and rehabilitation programs and other similar personal service programs.

41. The offsets to the cost of a negative income tax plan, therefore, narrow down to:

(a) The cost of Canada Assistance Plan and related provincial and municipal benefits.

(b) The O.A.S., O.A.S. Supplement, Family Allowances, C.P.P. and Unemployment Insurance, Widows' Disability and similar benefits payable to those whose total income including these benefits falls below the base established for the payment of a guaranteed annual income.

SOME EXISTING SOCIAL SECURITY MEASURES

42. As mentioned previously, we understand that White Papers with attendant up-to-date information will be available. In the absence of such information, we would make some preliminary comments on certain social security measures. For such varying reasons as political realities and common sense, it appears to us that while some existing social security measures might be unwound, others might require more funds and indeed new bold functional programs might be required.

43. Our purpose in making the foregoing preliminary statement is to provide a cautionary note that it is by no means certain that a G.A.I. scheme will eliminate vast sums from our present social security programs and there is the distinct possibility of stacking a G.A.I. scheme on top of an already burdensome welfare bill which in Canada is increasing at a high rate.

Cost to Canada of a Guaranteed Annual Income

44. Estimates of the cost to Canada of a guaranteed annual income (G.A.I.) have been prepared, using as a definition of the poverty line the figures espoused by the Economic Council of Canada. In addition, a number of refinements have been made.

(a) The first estimate assumes that the poor are brought up to the "low" poverty lines espoused by the Economic Council.

(b) The second estimate raises these poverty lines by $500, to take account of inflation. It should be recalled that the Council's calculations were based upon 1961 income data, and that consumer prices have advanced by 30 per cent since then.

(c) The third estimate raises the poverty lines by an additional $500, to illustrate what might happen in these circumstances.

45. In addition to this range of refinements, we have made two assumptions with regard to the incentive effects of income guarantees, neither of which may be fully implemented. The less costly assumption is that everyone under the poverty line who currently works continuously to do so, and uses the G.A.I. as a supplement to earned income. The more costly assumption, on the other hand, is that everyone under the poverty line ceases to work and relies on the G.A.I. and other welfare benefits to make up the difference to the officially established minimum income. On the basis of the three assumptions regarding poverty lines and the two regarding the incentive to work, we have developed the following matrix of the additional cost to Canada of a guaranteed annual income.

GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME¹

²See page 7 of this Brief.

46. These figures are enormous. The most favourable assumptions would still result in additional costs of about one billion dollars, or in an increase of 11 per cent in the nation's present welfare bill. However, it is possible that some on low income would take advantage of such a scheme and cease to work. Even more costly is the possibility that the low-middle income groups immediately above the poverty line would lose their incentive to work as well. The cost of this latter possibility cannot, of course, be included in these calculations.

47. To place these cost figures in a proper perspective, we have related them to the income of taxpayers who must in the final analysis foot the bill for welfare schemes. For this purpose we have selected the minimum poverty lines, have made separate calculations and have made two assumptions; (a) that the recipients will continue to work, and (b) that the recipients will cease to work. The additional cost of the programme will be in the case of (a) $951 million, and in the case of (b) $2,151 million.

48. The cost appears even more burdensome when it is related to the present income tax bill of individuals. This is illustrated by the following table.

49. High though these figures may seem, it should be remembered that they represent the cost of income guarantees at the minimum poverty lines, with no allowance for cost of living increases or for the natural generosity of politicians. We do not claim that these figures are precise, given the imprecise parameters of the problem (work, no-work, varying poverty lines etc.), but given our assumptions they are better than ballpark figures. Because of the Chamber's interest in these matters, we conducted a seminar at our latest Annual Meeting (Halifax, October 1969 under the title "Welfare of Canadians and Canadian Welfare". We commissioned for that seminar a study by Prof. Otto Thér, then Chairman of the Department of Economics, University of Montreal, and now, as Honourable Senators know, Vice-Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada.

50. The study was a commentary on the Canadian Welfare Council's study "Social Policies for Canada—Part I". Prof. Thér's estimates for a G.A.I. programme range from, in round numbers, $500 million to $3 billion. The differences, of course, are accounted for in the tailoring of the G.A.I. plans. As a contribution to the Senate Committee's documentation, we are attaching to this Brief a copy of Prof. Thér's study.

Summary on Guaranteed Annual Income

51. Thus, it can be seen that the implementation of a guaranteed annual income can be extremely costly. Just as important, the specific effects of such a program on the poor, on wage earners and on the economy generally, have not yet been demonstrated. We have before us the example of Great Britain, with tremendous emphasis on welfare and cradle-to-grave benefits, and the condition of that country's economy in recent years is not one to emulate.

Some Views on Social Security for Canada

52. There will always be a need for protection against the hardship caused by unemployment, old age, sickness, death and other contingencies. Experience has shown that protection based on the insurance principle is effective, fair and economical. Canada in some welfare policies has adopted the principle. This must be supplemented with programs for counselling, training, education and adequate housing.

53. At this point, there arises the question of priorities. This submission has concentrated largely on the distribution of incomes between the poor, the low, middle and upper income groups. But there is a larger question of the distribution of gross national expenditures between the three that will promote the most rapid rate of advance in living standards without sacrificing the great opportunities for the advancements in material well-being that are so clearly discernible over a decade or more.

54. The changes that have taken place during the short period of the decade of the sixties are evident in the table below.

55. If government expenditures increase beyond the rate of growth in the economy concomitant changes must occur in the incomes of other sectors of the economy. In the case of Canada, the group that have suffered most severely have been consumers. Consumer expenditures as a percent of gross national product have declined from almost 65 per cent in 1959 to less than 60 per cent today. Under any drastic redistribution of funds in favour of the state it is most difficult to improve the lot of the poor.

56. From a longer term standpoint this diversion of funds from the private to the public sector would have an even more ominous effect. Studies (Table I) have shown the amount of capital outlays that must be made annually to achieve various rates of improvement in productivity in various levels of economic growth. The sums are truly enormous and it should be remembered that if there is one principle on which most economists agree, either on the left or the right, it is that the test of a viable and progressive economy is the amount of capital expenditures. The harsh fact is that based on our present productive capabilities the imposition of even a billion dollars to finance a guaranteed annual income on top of this upward trend of government expenditures would so adversely affect the level of savings that the amount of capital generated under such circumstances would be quite inadequate either to provide the additional plant capacity needed to absorb Canada's growing labour force or to permit the adoption of the technological changes required for improved productivity, higher incomes and rising living standards.

57. Any group objectively concerned with the healthy growth of the economy and the well-being of the people must ask themselves whether the present trend towards ever-increasingly larger government expenditures is fair and equitable. If government expenditures could be reduced substantially or if a standstill arrangement could be agreed upon, then the country has the resources to affect a short-term improvement for the lot of the poor and the lower income groups without jeopardizing the long-term advance and the material well-being of all Canadians.

58. The issue facing Canada is whether those in government who would materially improve the lot of the poor and at the same time authorize huge sums for conservation of natural resources are themselves willing to take the initiative to institute the necessary reforms in the management of government affairs. To attempt to obtain the funds needed by any other means must, in the long run, worsen the conditions of those whose well-being they wish to improve.

CONCRETE, CONSTRUCTIVE PROPOSALS

59. As noted in the foregoing policy on SOCIAL SECURITY, (Page 3) the Chamber realizes keenly that there is a poverty problem in Canada and that the poverty cycle must be broken. Considering the fact that over 90 per cent of the jobs in Canada are with private employers, and considering the fact that over 60 per cent of those at the poverty level are employed, the Canadian business community, in our view, is one of the central and effective groups for dealing with this problem. It is already engaged, as noted in our policy, in making its contribution by way of providing employment, by way of training, retraining, industrial medicine, counselling, etc. Our President, J. Allyn Taylor, in his Presidential Address to our latest Annual Meeting in Halifax, said:

"As the Chamber addresses itself to the problems and the opportunities of Canada in the 1970's, let us do it in such a way as to banish any idea that the Chamber's unwritten motto is 'what is good for business is good for Canada'. We must hold firm to another version that we can stand by with pride, 'What is good for Canada is good for business'. He also said, and this is our point: Business has no choice but to develop a total responsibility that addresses itself to the ultimate well-being of the country. That urges attach upon the desperate long-range needs of our people and our environment. Business must extend its standards of efficiency to social purpose, and The Canadian Chamber of Commerce should give the leadership that this involves". At the same Annual Meeting, the Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of the Bank of Montreal, G. Arnold Hart, spoke on the Social and Economic Responsibility of the Business Community, informing the Annual Meeting that the Bank of Montreal had been, over time, considering looking at the spectrum of society that is sometimes described as disadvantaged—not just economically, but physically, emotionally and socially. Specifically, what the Bank had in mind was to develop a rather small-scale pilot project in a major urban area of Canada. The objective would be to seek out young people who had never, either because of the lack of appropriate skills or because of an unsatisfactory environmental background, been able to establish a good employment record. Details of the programme would include a blend of remedial education, counselling and on-the-job training, with financial support during the process, and with the promise of a job at the end of the training period if they come up to the required standards.

60. The bank would share the results of its experience with any other employers who wished to embark on a programme with similar objectives. It has been made clear that this is not a recruiting programme for the Bank but rather a pilot project in a social programme area.

61. Another illustration of business expertise for social purposes is a project of Bell Canada to introduce current industrial training methods in the field of electricity and electronics, at the Collins Bay Penitentiary at Kingston, Ontario. The programme, of course, follows the Canadian Chamber's policy under the title "Rehabilitation". The project introduces electrical and electronics training based on the programme used in the Bell Toll Area Plant Training Centre. The course for the inmates is being made far more comprehensive to meet demands of a wide variety of potential employers. Support of all levels of the Penitentiary Services has been encouraging and effective and the penitentiary psychologist is assisting with evaluation of the program.

62. All of the foregoing, in our view, give validity to a quotation from John Kenneth Galbraith: "To the best of my knowledge there is no place in the world where a well-educated population is really poor".

63. Sensitive, thoughtful and skilled manpower training will go a long way towards taking Canadians off the welfare rolls and providing those that are working, but are poor, with upgraded, well-paying employment. We speak for our membership in offering to co-operate with government, labour, education, etc., in placing our expertise at the service of the poor.

CONCLUSION

64. In conclusion, it should be repeated that every individual in Canada should have an opportunity to attain a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and his family. And the best guarantee of high and rising incomes for all Canadians is a high and rising level of economic activity. To this end, government policies must create an economic environment which favours growth, in terms of proper monetary policy, reasonable fiscal policy and realistic commercial policy.

65. Such public policies together with a sensible, selective approach to Social Security will give Canada a strong, dynamic economy with high and rising productivity, and more than enough goods and services to go around.

66. One thing is certain—we will not achieve our economic goals if we saddle ourselves prematurely with programs unrealistically burdensome. We must never lose sight of the fact that the income we are seeking for is not money as such but the production of goods and services. And on this point, the words of the American economist and journalist Henry Hazlitt are very apt: "The only real cure for poverty is production. The way to maximize production is to maximize the incentives to production".

Clerk of the Committee.

ERRATA

Pursuant to a request made by Mr. I. A. McDougall, Director, Community Legal Aid Services Program, with regard to his opening remarks before this Committee, it has been ordered that the proceedings of this Committee dated Wednesday, March 11, 1970 (No. 27), afternoon session, Pages 27 and 28, containing the opening remarks of Mr. McDougall be deleted from the record and replaced by the text which follows.

Mr Chairman and Honourable Senators:

The precept of legal equality has been given so much lip-service that it has become an obscured platitude readily accepted by all. But, in reality, it remains a distant objective with forbidding concomitant dependancies in the social and economic spheres. Rural and urban poverty do much to impair installing equal recourse for all citizens. Perhaps nowhere is this assertion better illustrated than in recent criticism of legal aid programmes in the U.S., Great Britain and Canada. One such report, a working paper for the U.S. 1965 Conference on Law and Poverty, enumerated four factors impeding efforts to provide legal assistance of the poor. These are as follows:

1. failure of indigents to discern many of their problems as being legal in context;
2. low visibility of existing legal aid services;
3. social and spatial remoteness of the lawyer and his service;
4. fear of reprisal.

On the basis of these factors it is apparent that one of the pre-conditions to a viable legal aid scheme aimed at promoting legal equality to reality status, must be to actively convince indigents that remedies are often available. A U.K. report suggested five areas where the law can be of use in alleviating the plight of impoverishment: These were:

1. criminal representation;
2. family legal counselling and representation;
3. landlord-tenant relations, personal injury and damage actions in tort, consumer protection;
4. property law, including estate planning.

Within each category it is apparent that existing legal aid measures are, to varying degrees, deficient. For example, in the criminal area, refusal to grant bail for anything but financial security obviously disadvantages the indigent defendant. Unnecessary confinement may also have a toll upon his dependants as well (who may be forced into welfare reliance). Further, the Ontario Report of the Joint Committee on Legal Aid implied that such confinement may only serve to encourage uninformed pleas of guilty and thus undermine the effectiveness of the criminal process.

Regarding family legal assistance, some commentators have been tempted to assert that the preponderant aid problems facing the poor are matrimonial, and otherwise the ills of poverty are psychological, social, and economic, and are beyond the scope of the law. Such a conclusion is naive. It takes no account of the fact that here the legal ramifications of a matrimonial problem are hard to avoid for even the most unknowing, and the law has a corner on most viable solutions. The indigent is therefore forced into a legal confrontation despite possible distrust of the law. This is hardly the case in areas such as consumer law, landlord and tenant, and welfare administration. Legal recourse in such areas is a rare alternative to enduring the apparent power of the vendor-creditor, landlord, or welfare bureaucrat.

As respects consultative areas, the availability of legal expertise is unknown to most of our poor. Existing legal aid is biased in favour of the litigant. In this area the service is, in jurisdictions such as Ontario, impressive. Legal equality however embraces more than mere representation at the remedial level. Higher income groups seek out consultation on a preventative basis perhaps more often than with ultimate court action in view.

It is suggested on the basis of the foregoing that the mere fact of a legal aid scheme such as Ontario's being demonstrably statistically successful is no proof of it having satisfied the legal needs of provincial indigents. It is suggested that the jurisdiction of legal aid must be considerably extended if it is to service the objective of legal equality. Basically it must take on a more active characterization: put another way, it must begin to "generate jurisdiction". In this regard perhaps six recommendations might be made for an improved scheme;

1. the creation of community legal aid centres;
2. active efforts to probe the legal needs of the poor employing such devices as educational-advertisement campaigns as to legal rights in those areas discussed above;
3. a broad range of service offerings (e.g., consultation, administrative appeals, sundry claims, etc.)
4. integration with existing community services where possible;
5. evening service;
6. eventual adoption of statutory provisions defining a broad range of duty.

While there are a host of social and professional difficulties associated with the above suggestions (not least of which concerns professional management, finding the labour, funding, and wage effects), it would be absurd to delay acting upon an expanded scheme simply for the difficulties involved. Legal equality implies the democratization of justice which is probably fundamental to the survival of the system of law in the long run. In this context costs are perhaps no criteria for procrastination.

Ian McDougall

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON

POVERTY

EVIDENCE

St. John's Newfoundland.

Monday, July 6, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9:00 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Honourable Stephen A. Neary, Minister of Social Services and Rehabilitation, Province of Newfoundland: Mr. Chairman, members of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, and ladies and gentlemen, you did not come all the way from Ottawa to Newfoundland to listen to long speeches. I know you are anxious to get on with your business of the problems of poverty. On behalf of the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador, Canada's newest province, I welcome you, and hope that your visit will be most enjoyable.

The Chairman: Thank you for your words of welcome. We have come from Ottawa on behalf of the Government to give you a considered view of the problems of Newfoundland as they are, and to improve our understanding of them. I am sure that after we have completed the hearings here we shall have a far greater understanding of the problems.

I think I should say to the people who are here that we are the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. The committee is representative of every province, and there are two distinguished members from Newfoundland, Senator Carter and Senator Cook, both of whom have made valuable contributions and done creditably good work on the committee. We have already visited five provinces and have five provinces yet to visit, along with the Yukon.

The House of Commons and Senate adjourned on June 26, after a very long and tiring session, for the holidays. We on this committee decided that as there was no holiday for poverty there would be none for us. We are using our holiday time by enjoying the pleasure of meeting our fellow Canadians in their own backyard. One of the things that has come out of the committee and been most helpful is that people who have problems are beginning to participate and become quite active. We hope they will no longer be part of the problem but will be part of the solution. I think it well for you to know that the Senate Committee on Poverty was the first group to leave Ottawa and go out and ask people for complaints and what they had to say. In the early days we took our lumps but we had a purpose in mind.

You see the members of the committee. All are here today and have good reason for it, for most of us on the committee have known poverty, and some have known poverty, in the gentle sense, so we quite understand the problems which affect the people here in Newfoundland and in other parts of the country. We hope to conclude our hearings in October.

Every once in awhile you have people who make world-shattering proclamations, who think that they know poverty, but we are having difficulty finding a solution that is acceptable across the country. You know that poverty has many different faces—all ugly and all intolerable. The welfare system, as we know it now, is a mess and we must find some solution to it; but you must appreciate that the welfare system we know now was set up in the early thirties to meet a different problem in different circumstances. It was never intended to be an anti-poverty program. It does not help these people who have been immersed in poverty. We know that the great obsession of people in dire straits is for jobs. When those jobs are not available we have to look for alternatives, and the alternative that appeals to most people is an income for every Canadian. So we are charged with a great responsibility of presenting a report which will make one people out of a nation, which will be a challenge to people, and which will ask them questions: Do we want to end poverty? Do we have the means? Do we have the will? It may be that as a result of our report the Government will have to make commitments that are well ahead of some of the things in this country and they will have to be commitments for tomorrow.

To begin with, I want to put on record the interim report I made to the Senate on Tuesday, June 25.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Our first witness today is Mrs. Dorothy Wyatt, who is well known to you. She has a brief that she will be presenting, and I will ask her now to speak to you.

Mrs. Dorothy Wyatt, Councillor, St. John's City Council: I will talk about poverty and I think before I begin I will give you the definition of poverty which I intend to follow in this brief. Poverty can be defined as the absence of opportunity for the comprehensive development of the maximum potential of the individual. Now there are many ways of looking at poverty and I expect as this special committee goes across Canada it will meet many different forms of poverty. In terms of people who are poor it is food and shelter. The result of not having enough to eat is that you get deficiency diseases and I, as a nurse, have seen these deficiency diseases. Certainly your income dictates where you are going to live. Health workers show you the proper way to live. We even get very evangelical about what you are going to eat. We tell you how to modify your diet to show you what is right to eat. What happens in the schools? We are still learning the importance of the Reformation and World War 1, but nobody tells us anything about how to take care of a home, how to raise a baby, or how to prepare a diet.

Now there are areas in this city, ladies and gentlemen, where people receive their water supply by truck and they have a night cart to carry away the excreta. It is very difficult to talk about sanitation when you have this situation. Then we have our people who are living in overcrowded homes and these homes very often are rented from the affluent society, who rent them through rental agencies. You have to live there and this is why I say, when it comes right down to it, it is a matter of dollars and cents. Thus, I suggest that poverty should have an economic priority in its interpretation. That is, that cultural poverty, social and psychological poverty, are in direct proportion to the amount of money you have. First of all, you have to have food, clothing, and shelter. How can you pursue the cultural activities of the city without the admission fee?

Politics—that is my field. What I find in politics is that in the very areas where we have problems associated with poverty, they are not dealt with from an economic viewpoint. We came into Canada under the British North America Act, and this Act says there are certain priorities left to the provinces and this is where we have our problem. I say we cannot have a national approach to poverty, we must have a joint effort. You, ladies and gentlemen, did not create the poverty, I did not create it, but let us face it, it is there and while we are trying to sort out how people are to be helped, one government passes it on to another, and they to another, and so on. All the time, people are hungry and are going on being hungry. So, I think that this is the most important thing because I believe that by the time the recommendations of this committee are made, as worthy as it started out to be, there will be a lot more hungry people.

That was the cause of poverty as such, but how do we know how many people are poor? We have statistics on the number of people receiving social assistance and workmen's compensation but what about these statistics for the proud poor, and I suggest there are a lot. Many of these people speak to me; I am in touch with the community. They say that they have always been able to manage strictly through the good use of resources but now that they do not have any additional resources to meet the increased cost of living they cannot manage. They are too proud to ask.

It is no secret: people are moving to the city and: therefore we are going to have more poor people in the city, certainly in terms of people affected by automation. Unless there are facilities for the retraining of people, certainly you are going to get more poverty within that group.

What about women? As you know, I am carrying on a private war on behalf of the people of Newfoundland for equal pay for equal work and human rights legislation, and you have heard all the justification for that. I have challenged the Minister of Labour to debate but he has backed down. Surely the Minister of Labour is the man to start this. How can women prepare for their own retirement, in many cases on a reduced salary? So this I suggest will make more poverty among women.

How do you solve the poverty? I would like for you to spend a day with the public health nurses, social workers and clergymen and spend a day with the educators of our youth who could make you aware of the realism of poverty. There are many levels of poverty in this province but conditions have improved here since we became part of the Canadian nation. Certainly we share many of the good things, and we call the baby bonus, old age pensions, and medicare good things, because it has put money in the pockets of Newfoundlanders.

University is still a privilege for many people in Newfoundland. Poor people can send their children to university but I suggest there is a detriment there because they do not have an opportunity to get the proper education because they hit what I hit in university and that is, the university is more concerned with attaining its status from the number of published papers and the impressive lists of research projects pursued in the institution. The last fellow down on the level of education is faced with the first-year students. Let us get those highly educated professors back with the first-year students who need all the help they can get. I suggest this contributes to the drop-outs. First year students are left with the teachers with B.A.s while the teachers with higher education are not in touch with first-year students. Perhaps that is why we have foundation year at our university.

We dump fish in our harbours and wheat sits in the barn. You know, how realistic this is. You pay us not to grow wheat. I am not a farmer but I have been watching and reading and we are starving and at the same time we are storing up wheat. Why cannot this be sold at cost with positive subsidies? What we are doing now is a negative approach. I would suggest that far more competent men in economic circles should put their minds to this problem.

A cheque will not solve anything. I think some people should be sent a daily food order with a menu. They should not be condemned, but they do not know how to manage their money. It is up to us to help them. We should have social workers and nurses get down with these people and talk with them, show them how to prepare their food.

Where is the incentive to go to work? Salaries, are not as high as assistance.

DREE is a political gimmick—a vote-getting thing. We get a few votes here and there, but it wasn't carefully planned. We went through communications, now it is pollution. We have a system here where as long as we can get 100 jobs we will sell our souls. We do not see the long-range problems associated with industry. A hundred jobs now with the inherent cost of pollution should be viewed with long-term economic results. Across Canada they are meeting this problem in a much smarter way than we are. I understand in British Columbia no such thing is allowed, but we are still doing it at the subsequent cost of pollution. The St. John's Harbour is polluted and the cost of correction is beyond the ability of its citizens to pay. Then we read about the Bonaventure being refitted when she was slated for retirement. The war situation has not changed that much in a few years, and we think we could have used the money which was spent on the "Bonnie" to help some of our sewage problems. We could have spent it very wisely down here.

And what about housing? I made a statement I think was applicable. We are living in a generation where it is noble to give but shameful to receive. We tend to move the poor to a designated locality complete with label. We call it subsidized housing. Now I have seen a lot of people who do not own their own homes, but how can they if they are out looking for the down payment. Where are the 40-year mortgages contemplated ten years ago in economic circles? Let us start with what can be done and it seems to me that this could be done. Let us not make an exclusive street of shell housing. Across Canada people are having tenant associations. I suggest that if we did our thing we would not need tenant associations. We would be giving the leadership that people thought we would give when they elected us to office. In the downtown area of St. John's the semi-affluent are renting homes. These are firetraps, one bathroom for 21 people. And I know, and I can give you the address.

I do not think people can live any longer in terms of Workmen's Compensation and veterans' allowances and in terms of school construction. We have a large population, a growing population, in spite of the pill. The simple fact is that we cannot afford to meet the cost of educating an increasing population. Everyone looks to the church. Over the years it must not be forgotten that Newfoundland churches provided education. The churches are broke, and it is a fallacy to say the church can do it. I think we need help with the provision of school facilities.

I think there should be more man-to-man relationships by people who are rich with people who are poor. I have brought some people with me who have experienced the problems we talked about.

I have a man, his wife and eight children. This man is feeding his family on $27 a week. The man left school at Grade IV. He went to night school; he worked in the day and he went to school at night, and got Grade X. He went to the Trades College, and he told me that on opening day about $17,000 was spent on a ribbon-opening ceremony while the people who attended could not pay for their books. That man thought that that $17,000 could have paid for books. This man represents the problems that we as politicians make. He could not stay at this vocational school. He went back to work. Everyone he saw said, "Go to Wabush." So he went to Wabush. Out of his earnings he had to pay rent at Wabush and rent at St. John's. He could not afford to do this so he had to come home. He went to the Minister of Labour, he went to the Minister of Welfare. The Minister of Welfare told him that he looks after his own district, which is Bell Island. He had a small piece of land and when he tried to build on this land (75 foot frontage and 200 foot rearage) he was told he could not build on it. He cannot sell it because nobody else can build on it. He went to Bell Island last year and took a heavy duty mechanic's course. He went to Manpower. They said, "No, my son, you can't get a job, you don't have any experience." I ask, what is the incentive for a man who tries?

Then I have a lady here who has 13 children. She has children living away. She could go away and live with these children but she has a boy who is retarded. She needs to look after him because he needs additional help around the home. She is staying here on practically nothing. There are nine people in this unit where she lives. She is paying $85 a month for a couple of rooms which she furnishes herself and she has to stand in line with nine people in the morning to go to the bathroom. She is a widow. She is living in one of these places which is sealed up and looks pretty good on the outside, but the rats are inside the walls. She has no additional income. Her family have only enough to raise their own families. And, I would suggest this is where family life has changed and this is a type of problem which we have.

I have here also a young girl with two children and she said to me, "I don't see no sense in getting married because all I see around me is people splitting up." Her mother and father are separated. She is trying to feed her children on $15 a month. Her place, what is it like? It is leaky, they have overcrowding, and they have no place to put the babies out to play, and no place to dry clothes. They have been after the landlord and that is what happens, you get after the landlord and he is renting through a rental agency. I suggest serving on a committee. I have asked for such a committee to counsel these people and it has not been appointed. People who want to could form an association representing all the people on Welfare so that they can stand up to the bureaucracy they are meeting. They would be doing this out of dedication to their families because they do not want their families to starve. And that, ladies and gentlemen, is my submission.

The Chairman: Do any of the senators have any questions?

Senator Carter: I would like to start out Mr. Chairman. Mrs. Wyatt mentioned that we should be out with social workers and nurses, and I think we should make it known we have done this. We have gone out in Ottawa, Doctor McGrand and myself, several of us have gone out, gone with them, gone through their routine.

Mrs. Wyatt: I am delighted to hear that because that is getting down to the bare bones of it.

Senator Carter: Here in St. John's, as the Chairman pointed out, poverty means different things to different people. And, in different parts of Canada, rural poverty is different from urban poverty. Poverty of the Indians and Eskimos is different from the poverty of other groups. We are looking for solutions.

Nobody has a monopoly on poverty. The purpose of our coming here is to see if we can find any new angles—something we have not come across before. Now I would like to ask you here, does the City of St. John's have a welfare fund?

Mrs. Wyatt: No, it is all paid for by the provinces with assistance from the federal. We are not autonomous in the City of St. John's. Our City Act, if we want to have a law put in it, it must go through the provincial legislature, so it is a custodial kind of supervision we have in the City of St. John's. We have a big problem here which I would not elaborate on. People felt that rail and ferry service should be subsidized. Across Canada they have the same problem—their bus system cannot be supported by the people who live there. If we can put our money into rail and ferry I suggest this is a new area and rural to urban has replaced this system of coastal boats. I know we need our ferry but we must also get our people downtown and our bus service is so bad, mostly due to economics.

Senator Carter: As a councillor, in relation to this question of poverty in St. John's, you mentioned some things you are doing. This is fine, all part of the answer. Have you any more than that? What do you see as your role as councillor in City Council?

Mrs. Wyatt: I see my role as representing the people, whatever the need. I am doing my thing as a councillor using this avenue, or any avenue I can get, to bring this to a solution. I work with any group who seem to have a problem. I am involved in a recreation committee and this is part of the development of the individual and in terms of planning their city. I did city planning at university and I am attempting to use this information in an informed way. If you have a subdivision, you have to have playgrounds and you would be surprised at the number of people who think you do not. There is no set role as I see it. Then again, we are quite restricted because we lack autonomy in our City Act. Again, it is custodial.

Senator Carter: You talk about priorities. What is your idea of the priorities that should be pursued in Newfoundland? If you were the Minister of Welfare and had $400,000 to $500,000 to spend on welfare what would be your priorities?

Mrs. Wyatt: My priorities would be to have the people involved. I would like to have committees right across this province where the poor people, the rich people, and the government could work together. The government must come into the committee rather than override the committee because, as I said, there are some people flagging welfare and the Minister of Welfare is condemned if he does not do something about this. I suggest using the poor to help themselves and for us to get away from this missionary approach that used to be. Let us now feed the starving and then talk about saving their souls. With these groups working together let us ask them how to spend that money in that particular area.

Senator Carter: You would allocate on a per capita or district basis and have a committee to decide how the money was to be spent?

Mrs. Wyatt: Yes, I would. The picture changes—they are poor today, the man gets a job tomorrow. How do you get that kind of change into the papers? And I suggest the welfare officer or social assistance leader in a particular place be the leader. This is government leadership. I do not mean it has to be the minister because people have to have day to day communication. Under this you have voluntary groups. Here is an avenue where the churches can come in. They are very resourceful people, very enthusiastic.

Senator Fournier: I would like to ask a question to the gentleman supporting his family on $27 a week I understand you went to Wabush?

Mr. Augustus Whalen, Labourer, St. John's: That is right.

Senator Fournier: What was your salary?

Mr. Whalen: I was hired as a labourer at $1.75 an hour. Down there I had to pay $75 a month for rent plus send $64 a month home to our subsidized rental unit. Now this was based on your salary. If you received $325 a month your rate was 20 per cent. After you went out of $325 the rate jumped to 30 per cent. That could not last. I was not getting out of the hole. I couldn't provide for my family so I had to come home.

Senator Fournier: Then you took a trade?

Mr. Whalen: Yes, I tried once in 1963. There was no subsistence paid by Manpower. I was getting $27 a week. However, the government found around $17,000 for an official opening and another $3,000 or $4,000 for fire-works. If that was not stupidity, then it was injustice.

Senator Fournier: What courses did you take?

Mr. Whalen: A nine month course in heavy duty mechanics.

Senator Fournier: Had you any trade before that?

Mr. Whalen: No, I had very little to do with automotive mechanics.

Senator Fournier: How old are you?

Mr. Whalen: Thirty-seven. Last year the St. John's Transportation Commission had openings for drivers. Everything looked good. I had a good driving record. When it came to the question of age, everything halted. I was 37 and they didn't hire anyone over 35. Last week I saw an ad for Health Inspectors. Anyone 34 or over disqualified because the age limit was 33. Can you give me answers to this?

Senator Fournier: That is news to us.

The Chairman: We are learning something new.

Senator Inman: Have you any law covering equal pay for equal work?

Mrs. Wyatt: I have the statutes. In the department stores here, and just about every department store, women are getting less than men. For instance, if I am serving shoes in the female department, I will make less than a man serving shoes in the male department. I suggest there is no other factor than strength of people involved here. The percentage I do not know. It would be the number of people working because people are not paying equal pay.

Senator Inman: I asked a businessman about this and he said it takes time and money to train a person in a store. Women do not stay, whereas a man is liable to own that job because he has a home and family and thinks twice about his family.

Mrs. Wyatt: What did you answer?

Senator Inman: I had no business training. I said, "Well, I have seen that in my experience." He was a complete businessman.

Mrs. Wyatt: Well, they say women retain their jobs, stay in their jobs, longer than men. Men in this particular job are more mobile, and it is their comments which I am quoting. I think frankly it is a lame excuse. I brought my daughter with me this morning. We have been federated for two years. I feel that by the time that she is ready to go to work, we may get it.

The Chairman: You know we do have laws for equal pay for equal work.

Mrs. Wyatt: In Ontario.

The Chairman: In Ontario and in some other provinces. It is very useful.

Mrs. Wyatt: Well sir, I have been told that $1.75 came in yesterday at the federal level for men and for women.

The Chairman: In all fairness, that is a provincial matter, as you well know. It also has some municipal overtones. So you are making a charge this morning that we cannot do much about.

Mrs. Wyatt: My reason in bringing it here is to let the rest of Canada know what it is like in Newfoundland. We have an act sitting there waiting to be proclaimed.

Senator Quart: I wish to congratulate Mrs. Wyatt. Surely the women in the department stores which you mentioned could get together with the men who would support you and then you would see something happen.

Mrs. Wyatt: This is coming because labour groups are taking an interest in this. They have an election coming up. I am after people to do this.

Senator Quart: Please do not go out and say women are going to do it. Go out and get ten workers and I am sure you would get people to join you.

Senator McGrand: On page 2 you refer to "affluent society." Now this is not a new term to us. We hear this in every place we have gone. It is hard to estimate the number of houses in a city the size of Montreal or Vancouver but in a city the size of St. John's could you give us what percentage of homes are in this category—hundreds or thousands?

Mrs. Wyatt: Yes, we have thousands, and I would base my observations on anything that rents at $50 or less. The Welfare Department bases it on $50 and I have been in many of these, with their rats and leaky facets. On the bottom floor you have a grate, on the second floor you have oil, and on the third floor you have another grate with funneling going through. I don't know how it passes the fire inspection. When it gets too bad I ask the City Commissioner to check it. It is not easy to get the names of the people who own these houses. Many of them have left the city and left their names with rental agencies, and following it up there seems to be a problem.

Senator McGrand: You can follow it up?

Mrs. Wyatt: Yes, I have three books.

Senator Hastings: You mentioned $50 a month?

Mrs. Wyatt: This is what Welfare pays. I have been in homes where they are paying $60 or $65 but this would be for some other reason—large family or something. When a man goes to work, or someone in the family goes to work, the rent goes up so they are right back where they started.

Senator McGrand: You say on page 3, "In Newfoundland, we cannot pay the cost of our poor. DREE is commendable but will not solve the regional disparity." On page 7 you say, in the third paragraph, "Gentlemen, we know that a cheque will not solve all problems." Now, if this attempt to overcome a regional disparity by a federal Government is not the answer, and is a cheque which would be money, guaranteed annual income, if that is not the answer, what is the answer?

Mrs. Wyatt: I do not say it is a total answer, sir. I still think we will have those who cannot manage regardless of what their income is. I am saying I do not think it will be the answer. DREE is a political gimmick, a little here, a little there. This is my own impression, and I am only giving my own impression. The strings attached to DREE are quite restricted. You have to meet certain criteria and I believe it is providing services that are not 1970 services. It is bare bones minimum. We are giving them a road to get away with it. Across Canada and the United States there are wider roads. Certainly if a recommendation comes in that water and sewage be in the same drain, then I as a nurse have some questions if there is a breakage there.

Senator McGrand: I am very much aware of the situation. I come from New Brunswick and our problems are not too different. New Zealand, which is a small country with limited natural resources, and dependent largely on what it makes off the land, has very few slums, low unemployment, and very little poverty. The same thing applies to Iceland and to most of Scandinavia. This may be an unfair question, but I do not mean it to be. If you were to be given the responsibility of restructuring the economy of Newfoundland, in order to eliminate poverty, what steps would you take?

Mrs. Wyatt: Well, by resources I mean people, untapped resources, real help of federal Government for us to do our own explorations in terms of need. If you have so many in a family how much should they receive in terms of money? If they live in the city they cannot grow their own vegetables. What about our fish, it is not being used. As a matter of fact, the promotional program seems to be for the tourist. We are not taught in school the value of how to run our homes or how to care for a baby, and I do not think it can be done overnight.

Senator McGrand: I was thinking of your physical resources. I mentioned Iceland and Scandinavia. They have done it on the basis of their natural resources. How would you restructure the economy of Newfoundland?

The Chairman: Is that a fair question? After all, you are asking a pretty vital question.

Senator McGrand: I know it is a pretty vital question.

Mrs. Wyatt: On your question about Scandinavia, there they have public ownership of the land. They have very modern cities, you do not have to deal with this little fellow's boundary and that little fellow's boundary.

Senator McGrand: It was not what happened in cities, it was what happened across 24,000 square miles.

Mrs. Wyatt: Well, I should ask you how they elty they have done.

Senator Inman: On page 7 you say, "Some people need to be sent a daily food order with a menu. They should not be condemned but they need guidance with planning," and so on. Have you any idea as to how this should be done?

Mrs. Wyatt: This situation we find ourselves in is not new. People just cannot manage, they are filled up somewhere between Kentucky Fried Chicken and Chinese Food. I suggest we turn to our schools. History is important but I suggest the socio-psychological development of the individual is more important. If my mother could not help to show me how to cook, how could I learn?

Senator Inman: Do not the high schools now have a domestic science course?

Mrs. Wyatt: Yes, that is something you take if you are not good at football. I think men ought to have this too.

The Chairman: With the amount of money you see in Newfoundland for welfare, what can you teach them?

Mrs. Wyatt: You have made a big issue of this business of people needing a menu. This would be a small number of people. I would like to ask this lady how she feeds her family?

Mrs. Augustus Whalen, Housewife, St. John's: It is hard to say.

Mr. Whalen: She is starving to death, that is what is happening.

Mrs. Whalen: I can only feed my family fish, boiled beans. In regards to fresh meat, that is out.

Senator Inman: Do you get milk for the children?

Mrs. Whalen: Powdered milk, that is all.

Mr. Whalen: It is only through the good grace of our grocer that we have not suffered through malnutrition. Clothing is out of the question. Come September and fall, in order to provide school clothing for our children, we will have to go to the bank and get a loan. We have a debt of $1,500 and that is a big debt, and they have threatened to foreclose on our home.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mrs. Wyatt, for presenting matters of general importance. You can rest assured that these recommendations will have our consideration in due course. We are most grateful to you, and I express that on behalf of the whole committee.

We have a brief here from the Newfoundland Co-operative Services. On my immediate right is the president, Mr. Bill O'Driscoll. Next to him is Mr. W. E. Benedict, managing director. I will have Mr. O'Driscoll speak to you now.

Mr. W. O'Driscoll, president, Newfoundland Co-Operative Services, St. John's: Mr. Chairman, senators, ladies and gentlemen, I should say first of all, we are happy to present this brief to you because your terms of reference tie in very well with the aims and objectives of the Co-operative movement in Canada and in Newfoundland in particular. I could set it out in a broad statement. It is to improve the standard of living for all Newfoundland citizens through self-help programs.

You have all had time to read our brief. I do not intend to talk about that. I plan to talk about how our aim this morning is to show how a current poverty program could be improved to cope more effectively with the question of poverty. We feel better use could be made of the Co-operative movement in changing the systems that are now creating poverty, by helping people get better value for their dollars and get better training for poverty-stricken people through participation in co-operatives.

As most of you know, the Co-operative movement involves millions of people in Canada. In Newfoundland itself we have 20,000 people involved. This involves a direct savings in excess of a million dollars a year. Other benefits cannot be calculated. I feel that it is true to say that many of those thousands involved in co-operatives in this province have kept themselves above the poverty line through involvement in one type of co-operative or another.

One aim of the Co-operative movement is to involve people in credit unions. We have credit unions for teachers and for other groups in the province. Through this service financial aid is given at the proper time and through financial contributions many people have been helped through periods of financial difficulty and have been helped to save even though they could not save very much.

A second aim is to involve people in Consumer Co-operatives. There is one in St. John's and several across the island. Consumer Co-operatives could best serve the consumer poor. Their aim is to provide supplementary services and information at cost and because of this the cost is cut down to the consumer and, as you know, people spend a high amount of income on food.

A third aim is to involve people in co-operative housing. We have had co-operative housing groups in the province in the past and through co-operatives many low income groups have been able to own their own homes. Apart from the economic benefit, there is the advantage of ownership and participation.

In addition, perhaps the greatest contribution of co-operatives is that they provide for people a basis to study problems together and involves them in some things. We cannot overlook the importance of getting them involved. Another important aspect of co-operatives tying in with Government is that the Government can provide assistance much more efficiently. The Government can help a group much more than an individual here, there, or everywhere. Perhaps this is where the N.C.S. (Newfoundland Co-operative Services) fits in.

Newfoundland Co-operative Services is the co-ordinating body. We have two main objectives: The first main aim, in all communities across the province, is to promote and co-ordinate groups of all types and follow-up resources to help them to operate efficiently. The second is to set up services at local level that these co-operatives can draw on in times of need. This is a national thing as well in that Newfoundland Co-operative Services ties in with the national organizations, such as the Co-operative Union of Canada, Inter-Provincial Co-operatives and Co-operative Insurance Services, et cetera. I understand you have already received a brief from our parent organization in Ottawa, the Co-operative Union of Canada. In our brief we have presented to you we have made quite a comprehensive study of what the Co-operative movement is doing now and what we plan to do in the future. This brief was originally directed to the provincial government in the hope that they will carry it on to the federal Government.

We act through a ten man board. We have only one board member elected from St. John's and the rest are spread evenly over the province, for example, we have one member from each of the following places: St. John's, Comfort Cove, Eastport, Grand Falls, Corner Brook, Gander, Clarenville and Springdale, and two from Stephenville. Among these ten we have two farmers, a magistrate who is involved with consumer co-operatives, two teachers involved with credit co-operatives, two welfare workers who are involved with consumer co-operatives, one business manager, and two wage earners. This ten man governing body is elected yearly at the annual meeting of the Newfoundland Co-operative Services. Our managing director, here on my right, I brought along to answer any questions. He has fifteen years experience.

Just in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, could I say then it is the feeling of the Co-operative movement that any recommendations that you make, any program that you suggest, must keep in mind the principles which are spelled out on page 1 of our brief. On the bottom of page 1 these are essential principles we feel:

- (a) The need for people to participate actively in programs and decision making which affects their lives.
- (b) The dignity of the feeling of having earned aid or opportunity.
- (c) The need for programs to originate from the recognized needs of "grass roots" people.
- (d) The need to eliminate patronage and special favours (misuse and lack of objectivity).
- (e) The need to spend the dollars at the "need" level and not at the "agency" level.
- (f) The danger in "gifts" creating irresponsibility.

Mr. Chairman I understand some of the senators may have questions now.

The Chairman: Speaking about credit unions it would be of interest to you that legislation dealing with truth in lending has been passed I was active in giving support. The co-operatives were very appreciative and we were very receptive.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman, I must say I am very impressed with the brief. I have read it twice. I must say honestly and frankly that I think you people are moving in the right direction. What you have achieved in five years is marvelous. I have been involved with Co-operative movements for 32 years, and during that time we had our ups and downs and our failures. We almost went bankrupt. We changed management and reorganized and we are now doing a million dollar business. It has been very helpful. Two years ago we celebrated our first million dollars in the bank. This is used by people in need.

Reading through your brief I see you have done a tremendous amount of work in five years. I note the number of members you have. I like a lot of your statements. I think people who participated in co-operatives had their own training and expected too much personal benefit. You have to think of what you can do on your co-operative, not what your co-operative can do for you. It takes a lot of free time, a lot of effort, and it is certainly one way you can help many, the poor people and farmers. We have no poor fishermen in our province. Pulp wood is being replaced by chips, and we are facing a new problem now. I should like to find out where your market is, where you export all you produce?

Mr. W. E. Benedict, Managing Director, Newfoundland Co-Operative Services, St. John's: What product?

Senator Fournier: What comes out of your co-operative?

Mr. Benedict: There really is no export commodity. We are using all we have, except fish. The fish being exported is going through other agencies here in town. Our objectives along these lines are outlined in our brief.

Senator Fournier: Is your co-operative suffering from competition or opposition from people already organized in the fish business, the exporters?

Mr. Benedict: We are not perhaps big enough to feel the full impact. The answer is, quite definitely we are running into opposition. We are a different system and as soon as a system gets big enough to have an impact, opposition starts from banks, et cetera.

The Chairman: But your rates are below bank rates in most cases?

Mr. O'Driscoll: Yes.

The Chairman: Well what competition?

Mr. O'Driscoll: Competition in sense that a credit union needs help until a certain time.

The Chairman: Needs money from the bank?

Mr. O'Driscoll: Yes.

Mr. Benedict: I would like to cite Goose Bay where we put in a co-operative last year. Prices in the community are 15 per cent to 20 per cent lower because the co-operative is there. The whole community is benefiting because the co-operative is there.

Senator Quart: What is the membership fee for your co-operative?

Mr. Benedict: It depends on the type of Co-operative. It is quite nominal.

Mr. O'Driscoll: Perhaps we should explain "fee". A person who joins a co-operative must pay $5. That is not a fee, that is a share.

Senator McGrand: On page 20 you make some mention of co-operatives in Fogo and other places. I just followed your answer previously. What percentage of the fish production in Newfoundland would be handled through your co-operative?

Mr. Benedict: Just a guess, 5 to 10 per cent.

Senator Fournier: That has been the case in the past. It is a lot more successful, because of that change.

Senator McGrand: You made this comment on page 24:

Instead of an individual contracting for pulp wood and hiring local people to cut the pulp wood, these local people could organize and contract for pulp wood themselves.

Now, how much of the forest land? I do not know what you are referring to. I presume you mean the small holders of privately owned land.

Mr. Benedict: No, I think we are thinking more in terms of the wood cutter and the co-operative which would lease crown lands rather than the pulpmill owner.

Senator McGrand: What percentage of Newfoundland is forest country—85 per cent?

Senator Cook: Two-thirds of it is water.

Senator McGrand: Well, I want to know how much is forest. I understand that the large companies had leased most of what was originally Crown land. How much of Newfoundland would be forest area owned by small land owners?

Mr. Benedict: Practically none, I would say.

Senator McGrand: What does the average wood cutter earn, who is cutting wood for these large companies? He is paid by the cord, naturally.

Mr. Benedict: In the vicinity of $12 to $15 a day.

Senator McGrand: His earning power is $12 to $15 per day. With use of power saws and such things as that, the number of men engaged in wood work is getting smaller and that results in increased unemployment. Is that it?

Mr. Benedict: Wood cutting is more part-time or back-up work rather than a full-time job.

Mr. O'Driscoll: Our point in this brief is to show how a group could get a larger share of the profits.

Senator McGrand: You understand that my purpose is to find out more about poverty in Newfoundland.

Mr. O'Driscoll: We cannot help you on that.

Senator Inman: I enjoyed reading this brief. Incidentally, I am one up on Senator Fournier. I knew co-operatives quite intimately for 40 years in Prince Edward Island. How co-operatives branches do you consider Newfoundland could support?

Mr. Benedict: I think we are quite conscious of the fact that you cannot service all the little communities that we have. We are thinking of about 25 communities which will develop on a permanent basis with other communities feeding from them as branches.

Senator Inman: The reason I ask is that Prince Edward Island over extended itself and had to close out.

The Chairman: It is too small?

Senator Inman: Yes. This is not my first visit to Newfoundland. I love Newfoundland. I am wondering about the co-operative movement in small areas. Could it be arranged with two or three owning co-operatives and farming together? Would there be more income? Has this been tried?

Mr. Benedict: No, it has not been tried. It has good potential here. In this day and age of extensive use of expensive machinery there is a definite need. There are pockets of arable land in Newfoundland not being used on an agricultural basis because people in Newfoundland are fish-oriented and not farm-oriented. Not many people derive their income from farming at this point.

Senator Inman: I was wondering if your arable land could be utilized this way.

Mr. O'Driscoll: I think this is an excellent idea. Our central farmers are presently using this to some extent and also in purchasing fertilizer and raising crops and also in marketing.

Senator Inman: It could raise income of small farms?

Mr. O'Driscoll: Yes.

Senator Carter: You mention on page 23:

In the same area of co-operative farming there could well be some farms develop on the basis of joint (or government) ownership of land as well as machinery and equipment, this would offer a low investment opportunity to interested young farmers.

Do you mean an individual or a group? I would like you to explain this a little more fully. Would these groups have to be members of co-operatives?

Mr. O'Driscoll: You see, a poor person has to offer his work and what skill he has and very little else, so that he is not in a position, unless he co-operates, gets together with groups and pulls resources, to profit. He has his labour and his skills but he does not have what is leading to much more disparity in Newfoundland—control that comes with it. This is what I mean by this section. If through a pooling of resources he can build up a certain amount of capital, he is on a quasi basis at least with other higher income people.

Senator Carter: You say that members of a group become a little co-operative of their own. Then they work through you in the ordinary co-operative procedures.

Mr. O'Driscoll: Do not forget education. There is a lot of opportunity and education and the Co-operative movement go hand in hand. It is quite a lengthy process to get people ready for this.

The Chairman: Mr. Benedict, can you help? You heard the questions?

Mr. Benedict: I think the ordinary person says, what can I do? They look to someone else. The reality is they have their labour to offer but they definitely do not have an investment fund. Now all we are saying here is that there should be some way of making available an investment fund for poverty groups. Objective planning by the Government and ourselves can make possible this investment fund on an equitable basis, not gifts. That is all.

Senator Carter: Are you making this available to groups or to individuals? Supposing you have 20 people, one is a carpenter, another a plumber, and another a fisherman, and so on. They can all give labour, but how are you going to utilize it? I cannot see how your statement can meet that type of situation.

Mr. Benedict: The assumption is that you have people there but you need a longliner to get out there and get fish. You have a small group of farmers who have land but need capital to get going. We have some crop growers here now just operating. We have co-operative-owned vegetable plants operating but they don't have sufficient working capital to compete with Canada Packers. We are not suggesting giving them anything, but offering them equal opportunity with these other organizations.

The Chairman: Why are you not behind them?

Mr. Benedict: We are in the same situation. We have labour but no capital.

Mr. O'Driscoll: And knowledge.

Mr. Benedict: And we are talking about hopefully tentative things. We are talking about co-operatives being self-sufficient, and all that to get them to that point quicker.

Senator Carter: On page 3 you say, "Four sheries co-operatives handling in excess of 1,500,000 worth of fish and providing 150 jobs." Where are these located?

Mr. Benedict: Fogo Island, Brig Bay, Port au Port, Port aux Choix, Lawn, et cetera. Others are co-operatives acting as fish agents rather than co-operatives.

Senator Carter: In the next sentence you mention three farms that only provide 35 jobs as compared to 150 jobs in fisheries. How do you explain that?

Mr. Benedict: Fish processing takes more help than the processing of farm products.

Senator Carter: The farm co-operatives are not producers. They are processing. On page 2 of your main brief you say that vast areas of forest can be developed. Can you give the committee any idea where these forests can be?

Mr. Benedict: I think the central part of Newfoundland where there are no roads, or the central part of Labrador.

Senator Carter: You are thinking more of Labrador?

Mr. Benedict: That is where the major part of timber would be.

Senator Carter: Because most is taken up by larger paper mills?

Mr. Benedict: Most timber leases. It would depend on government policy as far as leases are concerned.

Mr. Carter: I would say the potential is in the Government.

Mr. Benedict: You will notice another reference in another part. Potential is there in relation to leasing such land in future.

Senator Carter: On page 18, number (10) you say that there is a little recognition by fishermen of the need to organize for self help. You are talking about the present situation in Newfoundland with respect to co-operatives, and you say: "Little recognition by fishermen of the need to organize for self help." And, on page 25, you say the same thing about farmers, "Farmers must understand the need for, and potential in, building ownership in their co-operative organizations if they are to control their destinies as farmers." Now, we have had the co-operative movement in Newfoundland for how long?

Mr. Benedict: For 35 years.

Senator Carter: And you have not succeeded in getting farmers to recognize the need for self help. If you have spent 35 years and not got it, how do you expect to overcome that?

Mr. Benedict: Well it has been an educational process. It has been treated as something that can get a government subsidy. They sort of treat it like a cow you can milk but don't feed.

Senator Carter: We have had educational programs for co-operatives for years. I remember when we had a whole department doing nothing more. Where have they fallen down?

Mr. Benedict: I think the most easily recognized benefit of co-operatives is a profit. We should not only talk about it but do it that way.

Senator Fournier: I think by experience.

Mr. O'Driscoll: We have succeeded to an unknown degree. I think perhaps where the co-operative movement has fallen down in the past is that it has drawn from a department rather than have people themselves see the need and see what they can do through establishment of a co-operative.

Senator Carter: These are your words not mine. They are in your brief.

Mr. O'Driscoll: The statement I was commenting on is one where you say, "We have done nothing for 35 years..." which is not in the brief.

The Chairman: No, he did not say that at all. He said you have not made as much progress as you anticipated you would make. Why haven't you made this progress?

Mr. Benedict: To motivate people to make changes is a long drawn-out process. The co-operative movement has been going for 130 to 140 years, and I think we co-operatives in Canada are being recognized more and more. I do not think you change the co-operative systems quickly. We are not going to change it this drastically in the next ten years, but I think we can go on making inroads into it.

Senator Hastings: I would like you to enlarge on what you say, page 1(d): "The need to eliminate patronage and special favors (misuse and lack of objectivity)." What were you thinking of?

Mr. Benedict: We are thinking in terms there of our all being aware of the inequalities of poor people. Someone knows this person, another one does not know him. Try to keep away from this type of thing and keep all people equal.

Mr. O'Driscoll: I think this is right—all people are equal. In a co-operative a man who has one share has the same vote as a man who has ten shares.

Senator Hastings: Does this not apply to people of Newfoundland?

Mr. O'Driscoll: That comes once every four years and does not affect them nearly as much as what we are talking about here.

Senator McGrand: On page 4 you say that the timber industry needs to be developed by the people of Newfoundland and not by investors. You made reference when you suggested that individuals should be able to lease or buy stop page on their own and cut. You mentioned that. Now, they would have to sell the wood that they cut, regardless of how they got it, to the mills, to the same people who now buy it, they worked in mills as employees. I think you have something quite good there. I wish you would develop it.

Mr. Benedict: It is only a personal opinion. It would not benefit so much an individual as it would an individual within the co-operative on such a scale that you should see some benefit to the woodcutter.

Senator Fournier: On page 4 you talk about employment and you say, "In many cases our raw product is being shipped out and the processed product returned." Give me an example of this. Are you talking about paper, cardboard boxes, et cetera?

Mr. Benedict: That could be. Fish is one example. Various types of fish are put out but not many are shipped apart from salt fish. Processing is all done away from the island.

Senator Fournier: You mention frozen fish.

Mr. Benedict: Yes, to some extent, but mainly pickled, smoked, et cetera.

Senator Fournier: How big is the main plant?

Mr. O'Driscoll: Not very big. There is only one co-operative freezing plant and that co-operative is basically a mink farmers' plant, and mink farmers are sort of disappearing from the scene generally. They are struggling right now.

Senator Inman: On page 4 you say; "The timber industry needs to be developed by the people of Newfoundland and not by investors." You mentioned earlier that there is forest land lying idle. Would you have the same problem with Crown lands? Why is this?

Mr. Benedict: When the chaps came back from the armed forces, land policy was such that they could get land fairly cheaply because they particularly wanted to farm. A number of farms in Newfoundland are not growing much. Better use could be made of this land.

The Chairman: Not only soldiers in Newfoundland. This happened all over, but the were not really farms.

Mr. Benedict: I think in agriculture we could be self-sufficient, but we are only growing 20 per cent of what we could grow.

Senator Carter: What vegetables are you growing? How are you processing them?

Mr. Benedict: It is straight grading for reselling, getting them ready for market. They are fresh vegetables.

Senator Carter: On page 8 you talk about getting $1 million interest free and not repaying until the sixth year. Now, is that in accordance with the co-operative principles?

Mr. Benedict: I think that equally as crazy things are being done in private enterprise.

Mrs. Mary Mercer, Housewife, Mundy Pond, St. John's: When you say "equally crazy," we have tuna wasting on beaches and yet I go to the supermarket and pay for tuna. Isn't that equally crazy for tourists who are throwing it away?

Mr. O'Driscoll: Mr. Bidgood tried to can some on an experimental basis last year, but most is left to waste on the beaches.

Mrs. Mercer: It is mainly a tourist industry.

Senator Carter: Have you presented this to the provincial government?

Mr. O'Driscoll: We have correspondence acknowledging receipt of our brief and we are awaiting a suitable meeting date.

Mrs. Mercer: One other point, most of the farming land in Newfoundland is on the west coast and is not being farmed at the moment. Most of it is owned by veterans who are unable to farm the land, so it just sits there. It is not like in Russia where the land is state owned.

The Chairman: If a veteran gets an allowance it is not so important that he can move.

Mrs. Mercer: He gets an allowance but he cannot farm the whole thing. The good farmland is tied up, you cannot use it.

The Chairman: The veteran you talk about is an individual, but that is a situation you talk about there. People have gotten away from subsistence farming. It is easier to go to the supermarket now and buy a sack of potatoes than to grow them.

Senator Inman: I think there are some 16 acres of bogland in Newfoundland now being opened up.

The Chairman: Well, gentlemen, you have presented your brief and you have been questioned. You appreciate from some of the questions that the members of the committee have been rubbing shoulders with co-operatives for many years and are very sympathetic with co-operatives. We have your views and know a great deal about your problem and encourage you in the work you are undertaking. On behalf of the committee, thank you for coming down.

Mr. O'Driscoll: Yes, I hope your reason for existing would be well tied in with co-operative movements. Our needs parallel the work of your committee. Any help you could give would be of help to us all.

Senator Fournier: Is anything being done by the tourist industry?

Mr. O'Driscoll: Quite a bit through the government industry.

The Chairman: Sitting on my right is Mr. Raymond Riche, Vice President of the Newfoundland Federation of Fishermen, and unofficial mayor of a section of St. John's known as Outer Battery.

Mr. Raymond Riche, Vice President, Newfoundland Federation of Fishermen, President of Local 9, St. John's Federation of Fishermen, Chairman of Battery Improvement Committee: Ladies and gentlemen, God has been good to me, no learning but a good voice, and I would like to have a little attention. You don't get this privilege too often to speak to a bunch of ladies and gentlemen, and I like to be very blunt. Gentlemen, I have not been one of those for the last 20 years. There is "yes" and "no" to everything. First, I would like to ask the ladies and gentlemen what capacity they are here in. They are, I understand, a Poverty Committee. I hate that word because I was never poverty stricken. For the past 20 years I have been working for people who didn't have a chance. I can't see how you can say a man is "poverty stricken" when he can't get a job, for if that man can get a job and bring home a fair wage then the poverty ceases.

I was fishing at 11 and 50 years going out of St. John's. You ask about pollution. God gave me good eyesight. I don't even have glasses. I see thousands of pounds of fish thrown out, and after that kind of experience I don't understand when you say a "hungry world". People talk about food shortages and yet you can see those things happening all around you.

Ladies and gentlemen, you speak of taking time off. I have no time to be here this morning if there cannot be something solid from this.

About eight years ago I took this matter of pollution up with the authorities and tried to solve it on a quiet basis. I am not going to put a birch log on the fire, it only makes the fire go higher; but I would like to ask these people if they have even been notified on such occasions. I saw one thing that if I brought it in the open it could have closed up Job's Fish Plant. I took it to the fish authorities. If I had brought it in the open they would have said, "What is Ray Riche talking about?" There was a problem about pollution which came up and which was on television here. We were trying to sell fish and there was the problem of pollution. I don't have to speak to Senator Cook and Senator Carter about that. I have been preaching about this to our city council but it died at City Hall.

I brought up the case that 10 longliners are fishing out of St. John's and fish was put on wharves and not washed off only when rains came down. I took this to the heads of the land, but what has Canada done? Surely, ladies and gentlemen, we should be able to solve these problems in quietness. There is an article of food and it should be kept that way in sanitary conditions. All the heads in St. John's know that issue, but what have they done? Not one thing in the world have they done about it, and I don't like to bring it in the open.

Look at Long Harbour. Last year that news was sent all over the island and down through the States. I got calls from all over and I had people say that they had fish and wouldn't eat it. It is like cancer. You go to the doctor and he says that if you had come to him 20 years ago he could have cured you. The Government gives us longliners and when we bring in fish we can't sell it. I can't see our Government doing anything to stop it. I can go on until 6 o'clock this evening giving facts.

We can only sell to a fish plant in a day an average of 120,000 pounds of fish. We could have had 20 more cod traps set this year in St. John's if our outlet had been favourable. Demand for fish is good, it is better than it has been for the past ten years. There is a good market. But, we can't sell it because the processing facilities are limited. We have a fish plant on the Southside. I don't know if you ladies and gentlemen are familiar with it. Because that was built, Job's Plant which operated there for 100 years or more and looked well after the fishermen of St. John's area, had to close down. Job's employed 100 to 150 people off Blackhead Road. They were making a good week's pay with the fish they brought in. Are we crazy or are we going crazy? The main thing for people is to find jobs. I am unlearned. I started fishing when I was 11. No man in Newfoundland gave me five cents. I worked day and night. I think there are thousands like Ray Riche. I have had a chance to make a decent living.

The fishermen have been selling fish out of wheelbarrows and have had no facilities at the waterfront with which to wash out these wheelbarrows. They do wash them out but they must go to private firms to get a bucket of water to do it with. Some of the Shriners saw this when they were here the other day. Our fishermen were very ashamed of the way they had to handle their fish in front of visiting guests. The councillors have known for the past 18 years that this situation exists.

Let us face facts. I'd spend 20 days here if those Government people could solve some of these problems. If there is a job let a man go to work. If he is sick, give him the best we can get, but don't accuse a man of not working if there is no job for him.

Senator Inman: We are here looking for a solution to help the low-income people and we need help to find the answer. We are here to see if you people have any solution you can give us. We don't have a solution, we are looking for one.

Mr. Riche: Well, my lady friend, perhaps we are going too fast. We have a fish plant here which, if it were operating at the right capacity, would take upwards of 400 people to run it annually. To run it fully, you would need about half a dozen draggers and they would employ in the vicinity of 100 men. So the overall number to run the plant-labourers and engineers and what have you, would be about 400 people. There is also a meal plant attached to this fish plant which could engage at least another 20 people.

The Chairman: Why isn't it being done?

Mr. Riche: I don't know if the politicians are Liberals. Are you people Liberal senators or are ye all mixed up?

Senator Quart: Senator Fournier and I are Conservatives.

Mr. Riche: I am glad of that, because we are speaking to a cross-section of senators, so the Opposition won't be able to say, "I never heard this."

The Chairman: You tell us there is a possibility of having 400 people employed and the prospect has been there for some time. I am asking you why this has not happened. What are the reasons given?

Mr. Riche: Well, sir, one is left in the dark, especially in the ignorant class as I am. Let me put it this way. Why, I just don't know, but during my interview with the premier he said, "Ray, the problem is with the Ross Steers Plant. These people are paying their commitments and while they are doing that the Government can't interfere." Now, when the Government has your money and my money, I won't take that hogwash. That is it. He is the man who holds the ropes. That is the position. Now, what authority does Ray Riche have to open a plant?

Senator McGrand: Who owned the plant?

Mr. Riche: Ross Steers. The company came here with six draggers. They would go fishing at 6 o'clock in the morning and get back at 6 o'clock in the evening with no fish, only trouble, trouble, trouble. The way I understand it, the crew had a guaranteed $100 a week fishing allowance and the captains of these draggers were getting a very good salary and were lodging in the Welcome Hotel, when the ship was in port. I know for a fact that one fisherman on a dragger for two weeks, upon hearing she was sailing in the morning, got off and the captain had to leave the ship and drive over to the Welcome Hotel. Now, downstairs at the Welcome Hotel is a bar and if I had the question put to me that instead of going to the Grand Banks, would I rather be down to the bar having a quiet drink, I'd leave it for you to answer. This is the system that was created.

Senator McGrand: Where is the company now?

Mr. Riche: It is closed down.

Senator McGrand: They lost money in their development here?

Mr. Riche: Well, I did not expect them to do anything else, personally.

Senator Carter: How many people are fishing in St. John's now?

Mr. Riche: It is considerably reduced since last year. I will give an example. At the Battery here were four crews last year who are not fishing this year because we have no facilities or selling fish. There were an extra three crews also from the Southside fishing last year who are not fishing this year.

Senator Carter: Trap crews?

Mr. Riche: Yes, that is seven crews or an average of 14 traps. As you know, Ches, the average cost of a cod trap would be $1,500 to 2,000. These people have gone into carpentry and other work. I know one man with three traps down there now. Anyone could have them.

Senator Carter: Altogether there are how many?

Mr. Riche: Altogether in St. John's 10 crews have gone out to the fisheries.

Senator Fournier: How many in a crew?

Mr. Riche: Four to six.

Senator Carter: Are there 60 people from the Battery?

Mr. Riche: From St. John's.

Senator Carter: What would it be in the good days?

Mr. Riche: Well, we went to 170 men in the good days.

Senator Carter: Well, it would be the average of fishermen out of St. John's.

Mr. Riche: I can remember one crew, 6 men, who got 1,200,000 pounds in two months of fishing. Out of that they sold 900,000 pounds of round, that is cod as it is with insides and all in it. The other 300,000 pounds were sold dressed, that is with the insides removed. This fish was sold to Job's. The sharmen made $1,800 a man for two months of fishing.

The Chairman: Senator Carter asked about the "average."

Mr. Riche: He will have to average it himself when I come to it. I recall a few years ago when the whole crew did not make $100 for one month, with no fish at all.

Senator Carter: You fish hook and line too?

Mr. Riche: Yes, but mostly gill nets.

Senator Carter: I am thinking of the whole season, what would be the average share of one man?

Mr. Riche: We had a man last year who fished traps and gill nets. He had four cod traps. He made a statement to the press that he turned over $15,000. His expenses were $6,000, and three men cleared $3,000 a man each for a full 12 months work.

Senator Carter: Would you call that an average?

Mr. Riche: Yes, I would call that an average.

Senator Carter: Did these three fishermen average $3,000 a year?

Mr. Riche: I would say our 10 gillnetters fishing out of St. John's would make an average of $3,000 per man, which includes about 25 men. Now the extra 100 or 105 men, I would say, go from $1,500 to $3,000.

Senator Carter: How many of the 130 would average $1,500?

Mr. Riche: Probably one-quarter.

Senator Carter: In other words, three-quarters of them would be around $3,000?

Mr. Riche: Probably around $3,000. There are a lot prosecuting the fisheries for 12 months, but a lot do not fish for 12 months. They catch by handline or some other way.

Senator Carter: Then you have the co-operative telling you what could be done. Have you ever had a co-operative?

Mr. Riche: Well, I don't like to kick anyone too hard but I am not a believer in co-operatives. This lady you heard was in co-operatives for 40 years and might convince me. We have a new store started here, where you can serve yourself. It employs a small number of people, probably 20, and we have the larger supermarkets probably employing 50. If your daughter or son is employed at one of these larger supermarkets and you are buying from the smaller supermarket to save five percent, sales will drop off at the larger supermarkets and your son or daughter could be out of work and dependent on you. So you may have saved five percent on your groceries but you are still out of pocket because of having now to provide additional money for your unemployed son or daughter.

The Chairman: He said he did not believe in co-operatives.

Senator Carter: I am not trying to convince him. What I am trying to find out is if they ever tried the co-op approach.

Mr. Riche: Why should we have to try this when a plant was built on the Southside to process fish and when I can see a lot of fish being thrown away, and when I can look over and am sometimes blinded by Russian, Norwegian, and Swedish ships—the most modern kind of ship—coming in our doorstep and making a klondike? Why don't we help the producer? You give me a good boat to go fishing but, in the name of everything that is fair, bring in some to market and there is no one to sell them to. A government that takes the government money and gives it to these people what do we elect them for?

Senator Carter: We were down to Quidi Vidi yesterday. They have three plants down there. Do they buy from St. John's fishermen?

Mr. Riche: A very small amount. Mr. Bursey could probably look after two traps. They are limited, very small.

Senator Carter: Can't they expand?

Mr. Riche: They have had problems getting water in the past. They are doing the best they can with the facilities they have.

Senator Carter: You have a plant on the Southside which is no good to you and you cannot open it yourself. You have a plant in Quidi Vidi. If somebody in Quidi Vidi buys the fish it is just as good as someone on the Southside. What I am trying to say is that if this plant closed down what about the one next door in Quidi Vidi?

Mr. Riche: Well sir, Mr. Bursey has been a public issue for the past six months. He was going to improve his facilities and they wouldn't allow him. We have fishermen out here with six cod traps, there are others not fishing. We have three small buyers who are doing their best with their limited facilities. When you are splitting fish you can't catch. If you get 10,000 pounds of fish you have to stand at a table and split.

Senator Fournier: I understand that in order for a fish processing plant to succeed you must process so much fish per year. How much fish must go on the market per year to make it pay?

Mr. Riche: One problem is that you need deep sea draggers.

Senator Fournier: How much fish?

Mr. Riche: Anywhere from 12 to 15 million pounds of fish, according to the records at Job's plant.

Senator Fournier: Where do they go to market?

Mr. Riche: Mostly to the States.

Senator Fournier: They did not do that well.

Mr. Riche: Oh, yes, I knew Job's did 15 million.

Senator Carter: Maybe 15 million?

Mr. Riche: Oh, yes, more than that. And the new plant Ross Steers built was a more modern plant than Job's.

Senator Inman: Any lobsters?

Mr. Riche: I am not qualified to speak of lobster. We are right on the east coast and several people tried to come here from nearby settlements. It is a big thing in Newfoundland, but it does not pay in St. John's. In Holyrood and these places up the bay there is profit.

The Chairman: This has been a very interesting presentation, down to earth and a lot of common sense.

Mr. Riche: Sir, with that I hope you will do something about it.

Mrs. Caroline Barfitt, housewife, St. John's: It is about my son. Now, his name is Johnstone—I was married twice. He was born 35 years ago. I reared him until he was 23. Now, he didn't ask me, but I am going to do it. I never got a cheque for that child. I have another child with a withered hand and she is in the States now and I never got anything for her. He is in hospital, just about dead. All his records are gone to Montreal. When I saw him in that bed it made my heart bleed and I think—

The Chairman: He is in hospital now?

Mrs. Barfitt: —he is dying, as far as I know. He is a good worker, working since he was 23. When I get the report from the doctor—all these records gone to Montreal—if we get it back, we have to get government assistance. I want him looked after.

The Chairman: I suppose the reason his records were sent to Montreal was that it was a neurological examination. I think you indicated that he is slightly retarded?

Mrs. Barfitt: Yes, but I am not using names because he did not ask me to do that.

The Chairman: When you get these reports you should take them to the Department of Welfare.

Mrs. Barfitt: I am getting on, and he cannot manage his needs.

The Chairman: Take them to Mr. Neary's department.

Mrs. Barfitt: I am having nothing to do with Mr. Neary, I am sorry to say.

Mrs. Mercer: Why is it the fishermen of Newfoundland are not subsidized as the prairie farmers are? When a farmer across Canada sells his farm he is remunerated. Why does this not apply to fishermen? They should be subsidized or the fish should be paid for. This should be brought out.

The Chairman: Mr. Ray Upshall from the Householders Association of Mundy Pond has a presentation to make.

Mr. Ray Upshall (Householders Association, Mundy Pond): Mr. Chairman, senators of the Senate, my remarks will be very brief. I note the comment Mr. Riche made, "are we going to get anything from this?" This is a doubt that we have in our minds, and I say this in connection with our brief. And from the brief that we are presenting you will see why I said this.

I would like to refer, if I may, to the last sentence in that brief:

There should be one department or branch of one of the levels of Government that should assume responsibility regardless of whose responsibility it really is.

This, of course, is referring to the contents of this brief. If it were possible, I think the place we should have been looking was the Department of External Affairs to get some satisfaction for what we are doing.

I will give a brief history of Mundy Pond. Fifty years ago it was a park. It was a park area in the sense that there were few houses. Up to 20 years ago we had people come in from St. John's East and so on, and have picnics in the Mundy Pond area. Since that time the area has become very congested, since 1949, since Confederation. As a result of this congestion, the area has become very polluted.

Our brief may be different from most here. Our aim is to prevent poverty. We like to prevent it before it happens and with the development of the Mundy Pond area, the government will be developing poverty. I would like to say that the Mundy Pond area, for the benefit of people here who may not know, is located almost within the heart of the City of St. John's. It is not on the outskirts. The Blackhead Road area you refer to is on the outskirts. Mundy Pond, to describe it, is the shape of a horseshoe—the base being east. On the north we have the city limits running four miles past the Mundy Pond area itself. On the south, the same thing. We have this vacuum right in the center, like I say, right in the community itself, St. John's, not an outside community.

Senator Fournier: Where are the oil tanks?

Mr. Upshall: The oil tanks were installed by the oil company. This is a residential area. There was nothing in the area apart from oil tanks, so the oil tanks went in the residential area.

Senator Fournier: Any property expropriated?

Mr. Upshall: Not for oil storage tanks, not to my knowledge.

The Chairman: From your own brief, it appears you have made a great deal of progress already and have had a great deal of success.

Mr. Upshall: Personally I have been holding public meetings in the Mundy Pond area for approximately seven years. We had all kinds of promises. For seven years we got promises. And the problem is we have made no success in our efforts, because of the politics involved and we depended on the Government to do something for us. It is unfortunate that we had to deal with the politics of the provincial government and the city council. If it were possible I would have dealt with foreign aid and may have got something done. Our area is a no man's land completely forgotten by members of government.

Senator Fournier: What is the name of your group?

Mr. Upshall: Civic Improvement Committee of Mundy Pond. We have approached the Government dozens upon dozens of times, and I came to the conclusion a couple of months ago that we were beating our head against a stone wall. People on Blackhead Road had a good idea when they started that union, and I copied it, went along the same principles. So I called a meeting and adopted a constitution, so we are now an organization with an executive committee, and so on.

Senator Fournier: What is the population?

Mr. Upshall: About 3,000 people.

Senator Carter: Your thinking in your brief puzzles me. What you are asking for is an ordinary water and sewer system to be installed in Mundy Pond, and in another part of your brief you express fear that houses will be confiscated. You will not get a good price for them. Why is that?

Mr. Upshall: We are referring back here to legislation of 1954 under the Expropriation Act—when a home was expropriated you could get a home for a home.

Senator Carter: With all projects listed here and progress made why are you afraid now they will denude the area and take the houses out?

Mr. Upshall: One thing we are ignorant of the plan. We have never been able to see the plan or been given any information on it. The only information we have is what was released to the news media. There will be new streets and arterial roads put in the area. We were a year waiting for the first plan, 1965-66. The planner was supposed to be sick. In actual fact the planner did not agree with the government or the council, so he resigned, so we were detained a year on that. On that plan so many houses were to be taken down.

Senator Carter: There have been houses taken down?

Mr. Upshall: No. There were two plans, one was scrapped. The other one is for $72,000, which they are now spending ($100,000 revised downward). We are thinking about the first plan, demolition of houses. If this is tied in with the second plan we don't know. If it is we certainly don't have true plan.

Senator Carter: Is there any way to get this?

Mr. Upshall: It is impossible to get any information. We have gone to the premier, to the municipal council and also talked to officials of Central Mortgage. Impossible!

Senator Carter: Can your councillor not get information?

Mr. Upshall: The council will not give us any information.

Mrs. Mercer: This is a problem with all the federal programs we have started. The CMHC planner can't say, and the federal Government can't say until the provincial government co-ordinates it. You need someone to go to. There must be someone to whom I could go. It is passing the buck. It is tied up in red tape; it is passing the buck. The only thing we get is a bill from the council. I can go down tomorrow and pay my bill and come home and my well will be dry. How can I appreciate a ribbon cutting ceremony when I come back and look in my well and it is dry.

The Chairman: Yes. As I understand it, the money for this project comes from the federal Government.

Mr. James Shea, Mundy Pond, St. John's: Maybe we are missing the whole gist of it when Senator Carter asks why people are concerned. Why? Because they are losing property and probably won't get any money for it. I have not seen this proved but I presume it is an established fact. Let us assume you live in the area. You have modern conveniences and a modern home and you are afraid to open your door. It is a throwback to the Industrial Revolution. With a water tank you get only sufficient water so that you can attend to ordinary needs. No wonder people are concerned. Some progress has been made over the last few years. After seven or eight years we get this from the great Canadian Government. They decided that they would freeze urban renewal. The people in the area had property frozen, they were not permitted to install any sanitary systems on their own. The Canadian Government came out and said the project will cost $7 million. Sometimes legal expediency dictates several things. Out of that it was wheedled down to $3 1/2 million and no one seems to know what is going to happen to them or what they are going to do about it. When they froze the urban renewal they had $25 million, which meant they had $5 million each year for urban renewal. Is there any other reason needed why people might be scared that they might not receive money for their homes and property?

The Chairman: We have your brief.

Mr. Upshall: To me this is a waste of time, if we have only five minutes. You have not heard the witness.

The Chairman: He emphasized what you had to say.

Mr. Upshall: This committee is here on poverty. When you have a woman who has to store water in her home or have a night cart come around and collect the excreta, this is the worst kind of poverty.

Mrs. Mercer: Does anyone have any suggestions as to where we can get any solutions?

The Chairman: It was suggested to Mr. Andras. It will be brought to his attention.

Mrs. Mercer: Who will get Mr. Andras' answer?

The Chairman: When the answer comes we will pass it on. It will come to us and we will pass it on.

Mrs. Mercer: To the "Senate Poverty Committee"?

The Chairman: It will come to us and we will pass it on.

I have a request from a Mr. John Locklyn.

Mr. John Locklyn, 20 Bond Street, St. John's: About six weeks ago I opened a small confectionery store at 1 Long Street. My father-in-law backed me for $350 and my wife's brother-in-law for $200. Welfare got hold of it. They cut off my $75 a month. Well, that is fine if anyone can live on $75 a month. I would like to see them try.

The Chairman: What were you receiving?

Mr. Locklyn: I was receiving $210 a month for my wife and myself.

The Chairman: Total assistance for your family?

Mr. Locklyn: Yes.

The Chairman: Is it just the two of you, no children?

Mr. Locklyn: Right. My wife has a heart condition and is not allowed to work. I got out to try to pay this back. I have new machinery in my shop. I had to get all this on payments from Coca-Cola and Great Eastern Oil.

The Chairman: They cut you down from $210 to?

Mr. Locklyn: To $75 a month. I am renting the store.

The Chairman: So they cut off $135?

Mr. Locklyn: Right.

The Chairman: Did you take it up with the Department of Welfare?

Mr. Locklyn: I took it up with Steve Neary, Ank Murphy, and the Department of Welfare, Harvey Road. No satisfaction. I got a letter Friday afternoon, brought to me personally stating that they would not give me any assistance whatever. The Department of Welfare gave me last month's cheque as a favour.

Senator Cook: How long were you getting $210?

Mr. Locklyn: Not quite a year. I have been employed. I worked part time with the C.N.I.B. when there was anything available. I sold door to door for six months in the winter, in all kinds of storms, and couldn't get ahead with that. So no matter how you try to get up there is always someone to pull you down.

The Chairman: Under the law, the province is permitted to pay you the money despite the fact you are in a small business of your own. The federal Government provides half and the provincial government the other half, and the reason is not an unreasonable one in that they cannot afford it. There are other provinces that cannot afford it. It is not your fault and should not be taken out on you. One thing we are interested in is the working poor people who cannot make enough to support themselves.

Mr. Locklyn: Well, I am leaving for Ottawa Friday morning.

The Chairman: What for?

Mr. Locklyn: Well, I am going to fight it.

The Chairman: You are going to see somebody in the Department of Health and Welfare and they will tell you the same thing that I am telling you here.

Mr. Locklyn: Well I am going to kick up a stink.

The Chairman: You can kick up a stink here. My advice to you is not to go to Ottawa because you would be wasting money. The government here has money to do this, and your particular case will be brought to the attention of the government before we leave here.

Mr. Locklyn: They will give you the same answer they gave me.

The Chairman: No, I don't think they will give the same answer. You can go to Ottawa but you would be wasting money.

Mr. Locklyn: Well, I am hitchhiking.

The Chairman: It will still cost you money.

Mr. Locklyn: I have lots of friends along the Nova Scotia line.

The Chairman: You can do what you want but this will be brought to the attention of the government.

Mr. Locklyn: I have gone to see Steve Neary and Ank Murphy.

The Chairman: This will be brought to Steve Neary's attention today.

On my immediate right is Mrs. D. H. Rendell and next to her is Mrs. M. G. Rochester, representing the St. John's Club, Canadian Federation of University Women.

Mrs. D. H. Rendell, St. John's Club, Canadian Federation of University Women, St. John's: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, we were prompted to submit a brief to the Senate Committee on Poverty by a particular problem which has arisen in the last two weeks. We have, therefore, submitted this brief under pressure of time. It is limited to the particular project in which we have been involved. I believe we have become involved in problems of wider significance. We became involved in the past five years in a project in the Blackhead Road community where we sponsored a Saturday morning nursery school for four year old children. This was a pilot project. We are now searching for means to carry out a regular five day week project and are looking for funds to do this, looking for a much broader significance than our own particular one.

We became interested in this project through the awareness our own children received while attending nursery school and in recognition of that fact that such experience is not available for all children and that the need for pre-school children to have this experience is as great, if not greater, for parents who cannot afford to send their children to nursery school. So the focus of our project is on the whole child and not just the child in school. We are interested in the child as a member of the family, a product of the environment, and a member of the community. We are interested in his health and stage of development. These are reflected in our staffing. We have nursery school teachers, two social workers and medical personnel.

The needs of the poor are human needs. We feel a program like this can help you develop these. Human needs do not come in neat little packages, neither do the needs of the poor, yet our society is only structured along certain areas particularly where the Government is concerned. The problems of the poor are often clandestine, such as education and even medical services. There exists a cultural barrier since these are set up on middle class standards. Our social institutions is another example of the same system. These problems, if not now, will later undermine the basis of the whole community. Perhaps if we can break out of these in groups of individuals rather than as they appear in departmentalized units, we can hope to develop human resources. The need for co-ordination of all services provided through welfare with others in medicine and education is imperative, not only in a program such as ours, but in day care generally. We cannot play a respected role in society with total assistance which involves education which must remain under provincial jurisdiction. We feel this conclusion must be re-examined involving education as one component specially where the education component does not coincide with the educational system as administered by the provincial Department of Education and I think this is particularly the case in Newfoundland where we are so dependent on federal sources for financial support. We would, therefore, like to make three recommendations:

1. that channels for obtaining federal funds to finance comprehensive projects particularly those involving co-ordination of services in certain aspects of education with welfare, be sought;

2. as in the United States, so in Canada consideration be given to federal financing of Head Start type projects, which is the type of project we have been involved in on Blackhead Road, and it must be on a nationwide basis, and I believe this is undertaken by individual provinces;

3. that a directory of funding agencies be compiled and made readily available, clearly stating the areas of service or research which may be financed through each government department or private institute—e.g. Vanier Institute of the Family—so that organizations such as ours wishing to sponsor or operate a project do not have to expend energies in search of funds which would better be used in the project, and Senator Croll has just drawn our attention to the fact that Head Start projects are being financed by a Canadian plan on a 50/50 basis but administered under the Federal jurisdiction. This points up the need for some sort of directory or some place where we could go to find out what is the best avenue for finding funds to support any particular project.

We also wish to make a general comment and I would ask Mrs. Rochester if she would do that.

Mrs. M. G. Rochester, St. John's Club, Canadian Federation of University Women, St. John's: Basic to all work with the poor is the attitude which motivates our efforts. A true attitude of respect involves the anticipation of give and take. With "disadvantaged people" this tends to break down with the expectation of the giving being all on one side and the taking all on the other. It seems to me that in any relationship with human beings we anticipate learning from them and they learn from us. Such assumptions lead us to respond to individuals who, while poor, share the middle class orientation and whom we therefore see as being able to help their people learn what we know they need to learn or acquire what we know they need to acquire. Such people may in fact not share at all in the aspirations of the community they are expected to "lead."

The current rebellion of black peoples against the negro leadership accepted by white society is a clear expression of this type of problem.

It seems to me that one thing that this committee has gone along with is the willingness to listen to the poor. This should be expanded. The rich and the poor have a lot to learn from each other, and the people in the middle too. People's feet are set on certain paths and part chosen on different paths, and they develop certain strengths on each one. We have a lot to give to one another and I think this attitude that the poor have something to teach us and we have something to give, would go a long way to break down the resistance of the ministry of the poor.

Senator Inman: I thought this was a very interesting brief these ladies had prepared over the months and I read it again. What, in your opinion, is the greater immediate need of the unprivileged low-income family? Increased welfare payments are not the answer so what are your thoughts on this?

Mrs. Rendell: Our whole attitude, way of approaching this, has been based not so much on the immediate need as on the long-term aspect because our experience here has been in a program which is designed to enable these children to benefit more fully from the traditional educational system. So it is a long-range goal and not an immediate one.

Senator Inman: I think your program is excellent but there is a need for people who are really needy. Now what can we do about these people?

Mrs. Rendell: I am afraid we have not come to grips with that. Our experience has only been over a short period.

Mrs. Rochester: Surely one of the problems of a family is watching your children grow up and repeat the same problems, see your children drop out of school and become unemployable through lack of education or lack of opportunity, and so on. The educational system does not seem to meet their needs. What they learn does not help their children.

Senator Inman: Who fails?

Mrs. Rochester: The people who are poor in Newfoundland. We have two or three generations.

The Chairman: In educating for life?

Mrs. Rochester: Yes, this is one way of learning from the poor. We do feel that education has brought goals that must be reached, but must reach people where they are and bring people out of this vicious circle of poverty.

Senator Inman: You speak of retraining. You do not feel it has been very successful? You speak about retraining being hard to get.

Mrs. Rendell: I don't recall.

Senator Inman: On page 10. Why do you speak of hospitals—page 10, last paragraph?

The Chairman: No, there is nothing on page 10.

Mrs. Rochester: We did mention at the opening in stating problems even in medical fields, and this is very obvious in the communication barrier between the poor and the medical personnel—language problems and expectation on the part of medical personnel that poor people will ask questions as the middle class do, and of course they do not. They tend to wait until the doctor or nurses tell them and then they often get very terse information and feel these people do not care whether we live or die. This is a very broad problem and medical personnel may improve their services to a much broader respect for humanity.

The Chairman: Medical men have agreed that there are ways to improve service, quantitative not qualitative. We have not had a complaint about quality. The out-patient department is the same as it was 50 years ago, doctors are lacking in certain areas—the medical schools are not turning them out, but we have never had a complaint that quality was not good.

Mrs. Rochester: This is just an antidote. I questioned one medical doctor locally about this feeling that the doctors do not care about the people on the Hill, and he came back and said, "Can I wait?" And he said, "No, I have six people waiting and they are supposed to come at 9 o'clock in the morning and then they don't come." I know from the work I do on the Hill that a woman cannot come at 9 o'clock. There is no transportation—no buses, and cars don't go up that Hill, and yet they expect that woman will say, "I can't come at 9 o'clock." Now, they don't say, "Can you come at 9 a.m.?" but, "Come at 9 a.m.," and they expect her to say, "No, I can't come then." This is normal communication among middle-class people but it is not normal communication of the people of Blackhead Road.

The Chairman: One thing doctors have agreed on is the need for reaching out to a community on a store-front basis, such as shopping centers and community centers. The doctors who are following them have approved of what they are doing, and Doctor Sullivan and Doctor McCracken have approved of what the boys were doing. There is the problem of 50 to 75 cents to go up and down the Hill?

Mrs. Rendell: Five dollars.

The Chairman: No buses?

Mrs. Rendell: No.

Mrs. Rochester: And they call and say that your child must be at the hospital at 9 o'clock and he does not show up.

Senator Inman: How are you finding the New Start?

The Chairman: Head Start.

Senator Inman: Well we call it New Start.

The Chairman: Same thing.

Mrs. Rochester: We read what had been done in the States under Head Start and we started a pilot program of this nature on Blackhead Road, and from our limited experience we find it has tremendous potential.

Senator Inman: Yes, it is very good. It is a five year program on Prince Edward Island and they are finding it very good. I spoke of retraining, that is one part.

The Chairman: Their problem here is different. They made an application to the federal Government for a grant for Nova Scotia. The federal Government said because it involves education they could not touch it. That is quite right from their point of view. That is their position. At the same time they did not say that there is one in Prince Edward Island, a couple in Ontario, one in Manitoba, one in Saskatchewan, and one in Nova Scotia. There are those projects—we were discussing them at noon. Now, she did not know about them and they did not inform her, so it is not her fault. Now they come to us and say, "We want to get on with the project. How do we get on with it?" Tell them it's a training project.

Mrs. Rendell: No, that is our problem. Services linked together under one project is pretty general because education is a component of day care which comes under welfare. It should be a component of attempts to work under welfare. Unless we attempt to, by bringing together all the services we need to bring together, and if we have to go to this department for money for this and that department for money for that, it will take a considerable amount of energy to do this and we are trying to tie it all together in one parcel.

The Chairman: Yes, each department does its own funding, but I thought you were turned down by the federal Government and now you wanted to know how to get on with the project.

Mrs. Rendell: Yes. That is an example.

The Chairman: And what you are saying is that there may be a different method at this time.

Mrs. Rendell: Well, we think this is important to the whole problem of poverty—a co-ordinated approach.

The Chairman: There is a co-ordinated approach. The federal Government makes arrangements for projects as in other provinces under the program. That is how it is done in other provinces.

Senator Carter: Under the Canadian Assistance Act all other provinces do it; how is it you cannot?

Mrs. Rendell: Ontario is one.

Senator Carter: The act is there.

Mrs. Rendell: The federal Government must become involved.

The Chairman: If there is any way, the provincial Government of Ontario will get money from the federal Government. If they pay 50 per cent, they get it. Each one of these programs runs under federal Government. The provincial government pays 50 per cent and the federal Government pays 50 per cent.

Mrs. Rendell: Well, I think there is a case here for them.

The Chairman: The federal Government involving itself with education is one of the most ticklish situations, and it could not possibly touch it in the foreseeable future.

Senator Carter: Do you not think that before so long the Head Start program will be part of the educational system?

Mrs. Rendell: I hope not.

Senator Carter: Do you not think it has got to come?

Mrs. Rendell: I hope not.

Senator McGrand: Why?

Mrs. Rendell: Because it is one of the major roles we could play, to operate as a bridge between the community and the school, when our schools have social workers to go out into the community. How many schools have social workers to go out into the homes of the students who sit in these schools every day? This is the whole problem of the child as he is at home, at school, and in the playground.

The Chairman: It will be a long time before you get the federal Government to step into the educational field and give money.

Mrs. Rendell: It will be a long time before we will have social workers and allied services linked into the school system like this, and moreover, this department not being under the Department of Education.

Senator Carter: Your program is for an underprivileged group and the handicapped which they have belonging to this group. Looking at the development of education in the future and the knowledge a child must absorb in a short period of time, he will have to start much earlier; and we have expert evidence that we are wasting a lot of a child's learning capacity. A child can learn most of what he needs to learn in the first five years, and we could utilize these years at a much earlier age, do you not think so?

Mrs. Rochester: I think we should begin the educational process of children earlier than we do. I think there is another Head Start needed—an organization which could help to deal with the school system itself. It is a characteristic of prejudice that you do not learn from people from whom you receive prejudice. You just do not learn. And, I think schools have prejudices that they do pass on, and I think there is a certain amount of learning needed. Head Start has a responsibility to start this, and it is more crucial. If people are in the medical class they are told to learn from the medical class. On the Hill we have teachers resentful of children coming to school dirty. Children go through the mud and get to school very dirty, and they have found it very difficult to learn from the school. It is humiliating and alienating and it is a problem that the school system does not have a better way to deal with it.

Senator Carter: You are both teachers?

Mrs. Rendell: Mrs. Rochester is a Social Worker.

Senator Carter: You are a teacher?

Mrs. Rendell: No, I have taught at University but that is hardly applicable.

Senator Carter: Will a child learn quicker from you or from another child?

Mrs. Rendell: It depends on what he is learning. He may learn faster from another child.

Mrs. Rochester: I think this is something that should be cultivated that children learn from parents and not from other children.

Senator Carter: I have done some teaching myself and I find a child can learn a lot faster from another child than from a teacher.

Senator McGrand: You say this reorientation toward life starts in pre-school and is tied up in the school and the home and you want to know how this can be put into a program. I think you must start with orientation of the teacher. Any teacher who works there, knows children have to come to school dirty. You cannot tie up the pre-school child in school and the pre-school child at home unless that understanding is there. Is that what you mean?

Mrs. Rochester: Yes.

Reverend Raymond D. Tucker, Minister of Cochrane Street United Church, St. John's: I am the Minister of Cochrane Street United Church in the city and do not want this group to think there is only one Head Start program. Three years ago we started a Head Start school at our church. I believe there are very definite community resources available for this type of thing if we can only tap them. I appreciate Mrs. Rendell's point and would like for the Government to help, but I think we reach out to the Government for many things we ought to do ourselves. I believe there are churches waiting to get involved when we can show them it is workable and feasible. In our church we have allotted $1,500 a year for Head Start. We pay a woman to run it. We have volunteer workers picking up children in the morning all over the city and bringing them home in the afternoon. We have a retired deaconess who visits the homes and points out the needs of the homes of children we could be helping. It is not on a denominational basis.

The Chairman: What are their ages?

Reverend Tucker: Four years.

The Chairman: From four to what?

Reverend Tucker: Just four—pre-school.

The Chairman: Pre-kindergarten?

Reverend Tucker: Yes. I believe we have churches and resources in our city we need to tap before waiting for the Government. And Miss Burry reminds me that we have another Head Start school in the west end and Mr. Fraser, Director of Emmanuel House, has initiated one at the Y.W.C.A. from local resources.

Senator Inman: Your churches do it?

Reverend Tucker: Yes, Miss Burry can tell you more about that.

Senator Fournier: How many in the group?

Reverend Tucker: Fifteen. The same 15 all through the year. Next year we will take another 15. I know it is a small number but it was an experiment started 3 years ago.

The Chairman: Three years ago you took 15 and the other churches took 15.

Reverend Tucker: No.

The Chairman: Dealing with yourselves alone, you took four-year olds. They had two years in kindergarten. Tell us how they find it?

Miss Stella Burry, retired deaconess and social worker, United Church of Canada, St. John's: One of the sources to which we turn to seek some appreciation of the help given to the child in preschool is the school. We went to the teachers, we went to the schools, and the schools assured us that these children were much more ready for school than the average child and we would keep in touch with the mothers. Sometimes they were not able to explain just how the child had been helped. This is an area in which we have not gotten much help. I, as a deaconess and social worker, have done some work, and it seems that people who were inhibited, frightened, and withdrawn in the first approach, gradually opened up and started talking with visitors, me for instance, and others visiting the home. The children were much more brighter and interested in things.

Senator Carter: Are these from low-income families?

Miss Burry: Yes, mainly from low-income groups where the culture of the home is not as rich in some ways as you would find in some homes. In these homes you rarely find a book of nursery rhymes and play things are plastic things. This is something he gets in Head Start of course.

Mr. John McCarthy, Social Assistance Recipient. St. John's: I am one of the poor discussed across the country. The university ladies skirted around and didn't delve too deeply into what people need, to my mind. In this country there are only two levels of government, federal and provincial, and in some parts municipal. I have read a lot of reports put out and there are people responsible for the administration of these programs. Here they call it social services and rehabilitation, but rehabilitation is only a joke. There is no way to rehabilitate.

The Chairman: That is the point both these ladies made here.

Mr. McCarthy: I hope they have gone into it strongly. We have too many social workers who do not know what they are doing in that they cannot communicate with people. I am on social assistance because of medical problems. I have been three years on it, and after my operation last year was the only time I saw social workers to give me help, because I am still handicapped. When my wife went to work, he was working four days when the social worker came in. Like the turkey, soon as he ops his head up we try to keep him down, as soon as initiative is shown this is the end of rehabilitation. I am sorry I could not be here this morning when Mr. Neary was here, the minister. That is one question I would like to know—where is the rehabilitation? The poor don't want everything passed over to them but they want to be dealt with clearly and an honest effort made to rehabilitate the family. You can rehabilitate children all your life but the dignity of the home is not there, just because social workers are unexperienced, they cannot deal with people.

Senator Quart: You mentioned day care centers. Now, I believe, we do not hear too well, but I believe your brief mentioned that the university women would like to be subsidized some way for day care centers.

Mrs. Rendell: No, what we were looking for specifically was for Head Start, this would be a special case of day care.

Senator Quart: In other words, you would be subsidized in one way or another?

Mrs. Rendell: No, this is our problem. We want to convert to five days a week and we can't find volunteer people who will give up five days a week.

Senator Quart: Day care centers as you operate now, how many are you operating in Newfoundland?

Mrs. Rendell: Our organization is only operating one project on Blackhead Road which at present only operates on Saturday mornings.

Senator Quart: In your day care centers, if you expand their services, would it be for needy mothers, the underprivileged, or would you allow working mothers to use these day care centers when the working woman would have sufficient salary to use it? I knew of a day care center and it was for women who cannot pay for the services of someone to look after their children when they were working. They would operate in this way, the underprivileged poor woman would be able to use that care center for free but the woman who could contribute something would have to pay. Have you ever thought of that?

Mrs. Rendell: Well at present there are four or five day care centers in St. John's but they are not concerned with our operation. They are privately owned centers. They charge a flat rate, and to my knowledge, there is no existing service in St. John's where you could have a child looked after without paying a standard fee. They are only available to people who can afford them.

Senator Quart: There is nothing for a woman who cannot?

Mrs. Rendell: No, nothing.

Senator Quart: My personal opinion is that those day care centers where volunteers do such a tremendous job, should not be available to persons who could pay but should be available to the poor people.

Mrs. Rendell: There is a very great need for that.

Senator Carter: Your problem is financing. You need more money and you have not gotten much encouragement from the federal government and you have not explored the possibilities under the Canadian Assistance Plan of the provincial government.

Mrs. Rendell: No, we felt this was so great that it would be unlikely that they would undertake an additional area.

Senator Carter: Have you gone outside to organizations like the Kiwanis, Lions, or the Legion?

Mrs. Rendell: Yes, and the indication is that this would not be successful, but we will have to go now and explore these other areas.

Senator Carter: Well you know how the School for Retarded Children got started.

Mrs. Rendell: Yes, when this is an established need then the government will have to take it on, but I don't think they would now while it is in the experimental stage.

The Chairman: The money for education comes from the federal government and despite what you ladies are saying about the educational aspects, the biggest amount for education which the federal government can give is 50 percent and this should be enough for them to come in and accept this project even though the educational situation is relatively tight.

Mrs. Rendell: This is something in which they are not already involved. I think this type of thing appears in the context of the federal treasury as a "frill". We are and have to wait until we can afford this. We will have to go to the provincial government and say we can do this now and we cannot.

The Chairman: It is inevitable that the provincial government will have to undertake programs from time to time which they have not yet undertaken and they will be programs with society. I am no expert on the finances of the provincial government but I will tell you one thing, the finances of the Government of Prince Edward Island are very tight and if they found it you can find it.

On behalf of the committee I do thank you for what you are doing and for the information you have given us here today. The work of people like yourselves will not go unrewarded. Just stay in the fight.

Mr. Anthony Ryall, Thorburn Road, St. John's: At one time in history poverty was something of an incentive, it drove some men to achieve great goals, it made them open up new frontiers, and build empires beyond their seas. A lot of great discoveries were made, and a lot of necessities were gained, because some of our forefathers were without. But today conditions are not the same, and the psychological effects of poverty is very much different.

Poverty in this province must be halted, and quick, or reduced immediately, because in its present brutal state it's breeding thieves, prostitutes, wineos, and the slyest of con men. Our youth who cannot, and are unable, to make it to the mainland, are degenerating into all the worst things young people can degenerate into.

It must be evident to this committee if they have read the Social Assistance Acts, and compared it with the high cost of living in this province, that it's impossible to even think anyone can subsist on such a meager dole. Families are being broke up every day. Jealousy amongst neighbours is at times so intense that fights break out and end in lifetime feuds with children carrying unconscious hates for ever in their hearts.

And the wide disparity between the income of those who administer and operate the welfare system, and the miserable pittance doled out to the recipients, makes respectable people shudder. Starvation is no joke in this province but a grim reality. Reverend Roland Wells of Brigus, Conception Bay, has time and time again said that he is sick and revolted against burying people of his parish with "Death by Starvation" on the death certificate.

Friday, March 29, 1968, was a very dark day for the poor of Newfoundland because on this day Dr. James McGrath brought down the most cruel budget ever to be presented and passed in Newfoundland. It contained the fact that welfare payments were to be cut from 1 to 29 percent. It said:

Heads of families who formerly received $35 per month will be reduced to $25 per month, the next adult in the family, usually the wife, will receive $25 per month instead of $30 and each child has its share cut from $20 to $15 per month.

And to further quote his words:

A saving of about $600,000 is to be achieved in the Department of Welfare by reducing the rates presently paid to needy, sick persons, temporarily incapacitated and to persons whose applications for long term assistance are pending. For the past these persons have been paid at the long term assistance rates. In future, they will be paid at the regular short term assistance rates.

Their excuse was that they made it less competitive with work rates. That meant that there were people working here getting not much more than they were getting on welfare. That was their reason for doing it, and maybe they hoped to discourage some from applying for relief.

In order to implement and enforce such an act of primitive brutality, they then hired on 30 to 40 social workers. With the support of the Justice Department, they forced acceptance. Some heads of households refused to accept this miserable pittance at first. They arrested them and charged them with "refusing to provide the necessities of life for wife and children," and in order to subdue them they were thrown in prison. Such acts of bravery were never commended.

A child on welfare today in Newfoundland. In Canada, one of the very richest countries in all the world, where they have to slow down production in order to prevent surplus, where waste is staggering massive and revolting, this little Newfoundland child, usually of British stock of good honest hard-working parents, was ordered on March of 1968 to get by if it could on $3.76 per week.

Are we Canadians, or are we just another ethnic group to be joked and laughed about all over Canada. They have Oxfam marches and funds to stop genocide in remote corners of the world when all the time in Newfoundland, Canada, that beautiful Christmas Tree Province, genocide by starvation has been in practice for quite a while with much success.

After making a thorough investigation into all aspects of poverty (not to be led astray by the Minister of Welfare), I suggest that you take off right away to see the Prime Minister, who in his just wisdom and mercy, will, I'm sure, form a royal commission to look into the brutal actions of this cruel dictatorship who hides behind the protective cloak of liberalism.

On March 29, 1968, by cutting welfare they saved $2,001,000, and in the following year Mr. Val Earle made a further cut of $600,000. In doing so he stated (I quote from the "Bulletin" of May, 1969):

We have decided that at all and any costs we will balance the Budget. We will keep Newfoundland's name good in the financial markets of the world; we will maintain Newfoundland's credit; we will prove to all concerned that Newfoundland has the courage and the skill to balance its budget.

How noble of Mr. Vale Earle!

For a starter as a remedy to our poverty, if our government, or the federal Government, would appoint a representative of the fish trade to go to the province of Ontario to capture the fresh fish market there (there millions of pounds of fish is consumed in Ontario every night by the young people), if they once got the taste of fresh Newfoundland cod, instead of the stuff that's being imported from Japan and Portugal, we would have one of the greatest markets and enough to keep Newfoundlanders employed all year round. Just think, they cannot get Canadian fish in Canada and import fish from far-off Japan. I guess the Japanese salesman was always on the spot and conned them into making some kind of a trade deal.

One day Canada may wake up. Let's hope it won't be too late.

Reverend Allison Fraser, United Church Minister, Director of Emmanuel House Community Centre, St. John's: Mr. Chairman, might there be a supplementary statement about long and short term. The short term rates are $25 per month for head of family, $25 for the second adult and $15 per child, so that a husband and wife and one child receives $65 per month.

This is the amount they receive from welfare. The long term assistance rates are somewhat better and they were the ones that were quoted.

Senator Hastings: What are the long term rates?

Reverend Fraser: They are $35. I could not give them quite so simply. There is an allowance for household expenses and for clothing. In short term there is no allowance for either one. Short term does not mean short term, it may go on for five years. It is what the ordinary person calls "able bodied relief." The man is capable for work if there is a job. I think it should be understood in Newfoundland at the moment we have officially 15 percent unemployment, it is accelerating and might be recognized as 22 percent, and the group among whom I work 85 percent and occasionally 90 percent. Part of the reason is lack of education and lack of training. We spoke about retraining, quite a few had no training in the first place. It is a difficult problem and there are just no solutions at the present time for many of the untrained.

The Chairman: I think there is one thing the senators will be happy about. We knew it existed but would like to get our hands on it—an issue from the department put out in full. All other departments are keeping them under the desk. We have been urging that this be done. It is very interesting. When Mr. Neary was before our committee on May 7 we talked about minimum wages, and in this context the following dialogue is reported on page 25 of the proceedings of that date:

The Chairman: There is another problem I thought I would discuss with you. You said that a family of four on welfare would receive about $230 a month.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Long-term.

The Chairman: To meet the needs.

Hon. Mr. Neary: It is much less for short term.

The Chairman: Put the head of a family of four to work for eight hours a day at $1.10 an hour, which is your minimum. That comes to $44, a week, does it not?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

The Chairman: Multiply that by four and we get $176.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: So we are $54 short?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Right.

The Chairman: He can get $54 more on welfare.

Hon. Mr. Neary: On long-term assistance.

The Chairman: Yes. Short-term is only emergency?

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right.

Reverend Fraser: You can only get long term if the husband or wage-earner is incapacitated, mentally or physically, or if the woman is head of the family.

The Chairman: Female head of family and doctor's certificate?

Reverend Fraser: Yes, but it is a misnomer. I know people who have been getting long-term assistance, for man and woman and two children, income $80 a month. The government would pay this nominal minimum amount of $50 a month and give a minimum allowance for fuel. No clothing allowance and no food allowance.

The Chairman: What is the difference where a man is incapacitated or where the woman is head of the household? Here they say about short term assistance: Senator Fournier says, "A 20-year emergency," and the Chairman says, "No. He stretched it a bit."

I do think it is progress to have this book so that you are able to discuss this freely and that it is available.

Mr. Donald Snowden, Director, Extension Service, Memorial University of Newfoundland, St. John's: Honourable Senator Croll, honourable senators, I must apologize that you have only this minute received my brief. We are few in number in the Extension Service and have not yet learned to say no to the many requests made of us. I would, however, like to thank my staff who worked so hard on this brief in the past few days.

Because you have not had the opportunity to examine this brief, I should be grateful if you would accept the following suggestion:

1. That I be allowed to read the introduction, which describes some of the factors we consider relevant to an examination of poverty primarily in Newfoundland and Labrador.

2. That I summarize other parts of the contents and read our recommendations.

3. That I intersperse selected film and video-tape during the presentation because they will bring to you some of the people who are not represented here in this room some of the deprived people of rural Newfoundland.

Is that agreeable to you, sir?

The Chairman: Certainly. Go ahead.

Mr. Snowden: In submitting our brief from the Extension Service in St. John's, we do so with a certain amount of trepidation. In large part, this is because we are the core of part of an institution which extends throughout Newfoundland and Labrador, and it is our extension representatives based in small communities in this province who have the direct and day-to-day exposure to the deprived and the disadvantaged. We do not have that directly in St. John's. Yet because of the intimate knowledge of outport life which exists among some of our staff here, and because of our extensive use of an important communication process which was developed in this province, we believe we are in a position to be aware of some of the realities and dimensions of poverty here. Some of us have worked at the village level with the poorest of the rural poor in Canada, in Newfoundland, and elsewhere. All of us are aware, as adult educators, of the absolute necessity for the limited educational resources of this province to be used as efficiently and as widely as possible across the face of Newfoundland and Labrador.

If we have a bias in emphasis in our work, it is towards those who genuinely need our services most, the uninformed, the voiceless, the unorganized, and the isolated. We are not a research organization, but an activist educational one. Our brief may reflect a lack of statistical data. We do not believe it will err in the description of the rural condition here.

This afternoon we have taken the liberty of asking that you meet on film some of the people about whom you must be concerned. They are rural people. They are not our only concern, but those who live in places like Blackhead Road, or the Battery, or Mundy Pond, have their own powerful resources to call on in appearing before you, as well as outside and sympathetic help. We are, therefore, concentrating on taking you to rural communities through film, and it is quite probable that you may meet with some of the people in your travels through Newfoundland who appear on the films and videotapes you see this afternoon, as these films and tapes have been taken in areas to which you are going. It is possible that when you do meet them they will not speak so easily to you as they do on the film material that you are seeing. These films have been made in an atmosphere of complete trust by the staff of the Extension Service who live, travel, and work with the people you will see on film. It seems to me that with the deprived, conversation sometimes comes easier with a man they know. We have had to extract the film material for you from the total of more than 100 films made here. They were not made as support or illustrated materials for briefs to your committee but as part of a process in improving communications in Newfoundland and Labrador. The first and last films you will see represent complete statements by the people on film. The others are extracts.

Now I would like to read my introduction Senator Croll:

The material in this brief is made on the basis of first-hand observations by members of the staff of the Extension Service of Memorial University of Newfoundland. It reflects experience in dealing with the rural deprived, not only here but in other parts of North America. It is acknowledged that our brief fails to touch on some of the more easily identifiable and measurable dimensions of poverty; nor does it attempt to describe the conditions which have caused Newfoundland people throughout the period of European settlement to live under constant hardship and frequent deprivation. Statistical data exists which illustrates vividly the difficulties which today face Newfoundland and its people in many ways. Such data has been included in other briefs which have already been presented to your committee, and that data will not be repeated here.

It is this data which serves as the basis for continuing attempts by governments to develop remedial programs. We know that in many ways governments are attempting to combat diverse manifestations of social and economic malaise. We are aware, also, of the difficulties in determining needs, balancing priorities, conceiving, introducing, and administering development programs and of evaluating the results. We believe most emphatically that a root and basic cause of poverty is an economic one. We are not convinced it is the only one, or that enough attention is being paid to the myriad and complex evidences of poverty which are not directly economic ones, but which are equally vicious and debilitating causes. We are concerned that cost-benefit analysis has become the only standard of measurement for far too many bureaucrats concerned with elimination of poverty, or regional disparity, or rural redevelopment. As long as they fail to be aware that poverty involves human beings who have dignity, values, aspirations and rights and that the elimination of poverty is dependent on full acknowledgement of those qualities, Canada cannot be successful in whatever attempt she makes to eliminate deprivation. For the poor will always wonder—Who are the Deprived?

It is the dimensions of the traditions, cultures, and values so evident in the total fabric of this nation which may stand in the way of early solution to poverty in Canada, for poverty is different things to different people who do not, in this country, yet know one another well. The measurement of poverty to the Economic Council of Canada may well be applicable in the urban centres of this country, in the centres of power and population. Yet these same standards which are applied nationally often have little validity in a Newfoundland outpost even in straight economic terms. Many rural Newfoundlanders falling on the economic borderline of poverty as defined by the Economic Council of Canada would be offended by being described as poor, and do not believe that they are. Most own their own homes, pay no local taxes, supply some of their own foodstuffs, and some of their own fuel, and have the benefits of excellent subsidized programs of higher education for their children. They, like the people of rural Quebec, have lengthy traditions and solidly rooted values which provide a richness to life not usually associated with poverty.

Yet in some vital respects they are poor, for their local experience and knowledge have not been sought as a matter of practice in the development of remedial government programs for rural Newfoundland. They have not been encouraged to understand power through organization, they have suffered from the debilitating effects of a primary and secondary education program with substantial defects built into it, and they are frequently without adequate information on which to make basic decisions about the direction their lives can take. There has been, and is today, a strong feeling in much of rural Newfoundland that there has been far too little knowledge in Ottawa of the realities of the problems of rural areas of this province, or of the factors which influence the ways rural people think and act here.

All these are manifestations of poverty—but a reflection of the poverty of whom? Certainly it is a direct reflection on the ability or the desire of the nation to overcome poverty, when in one Newfoundland community, within a recent winter, three people died when no medical help could be obtained because the community had no form of telecommunications with the outside world. It is the poverty of the nation when communities in Newfoundland have no teachers for years or when citizens who cannot even receive state-financed radio are aware that the public broadcasting corporation finances colour television. It is a poverty of the nation when one large piece of the territory of this province is never shaded in on federal maps indicating rural areas for development under federal programs, perhaps in the hope that those areas and their inhabitants will continue to bury themselves under the silence of their poverty until they disappear. It is poverty for the whole nation if children in this province go to schools which have no programs of art, music, or organized sports. It is poverty for Canada if the fishermen of Newfoundland and this region are so unorganized that they do not have a single telephone in Ottawa through which to participate with the federal Department of Fisheries in developing rational programs of fisheries expansion. It is poverty for Canada if the majority of Canadians do not understand that most of the poor here want employment and strongly resist the loss of sense of purpose that comes with the acceptance of welfare.

Canada is a poor nation if it provides funding only for technical or vocational education for its poorer adult citizens and fails to support social education to equip these citizens to be more effective with a sense of involvement in the society in which they live.

We believe that Canada has it well within her power to eliminate poverty in all its dimensions and that it could be concerned with doing so. We also think that lack of awareness by Canadians of the reality of poverty, or national indecisiveness in dealing with it, will leave a heritage of anger, frustration and hostility which is already much in evidence elsewhere. The remedies later will be far more costly, far less certain of effecting cure.

I would like now to show you a film which was made on the coast of Labrador by our film unit in the summer of 1969. This is a film with a man named Ray Ward, who is a fisherman, and he lives in a community on the southern coastal Labrador called Snug Harbour. Like many of the fishermen of coastal Labrador, he has two homes, a summer home for the fishing camp and a winter home where they live less exposed to the conditions right on the coast. Ray Ward discusses communications, schooling, and resettlement.

As I said earlier, the film was not made for the purpose of screening to your committee, sir, but I believe that you will be interested in what Mr. Ward has to say. I would ask you to listen carefully now because Mr. Ward has an accent from that part of the coast of Labrador and some of us who do not live there, who live in Newfoundland, have some difficulty at the start hearing it ourselves, but I do not think you will have too much trouble. We would like to show you that film.

(FILM SHOWN)

The man who is doing the interviewing there is the man who is working with your people in organizing your trip to the coast of Labrador and he, of course, is not here. He lives in Cartwright, on the coast. I will try as best as I can to answer questions myself about Ray Ward or about the conditions on the Labrador Coast and if you wish to pose questions now about that, I would like your permission to call in the man who was the cameraman, during the whole of last summer, along the coast.

Senator McGrand: Is there much difference in conditions economically on the mainland as compared with that northern peninsula of Newfoundland, up to St. Anthony?

Mr. Snowden: I would say that the northern St. Barbe Coast, the northern peninsula, is not the most depressed area of Newfoundland. I would say that the coast of Labrador most certainly is, for a number of reasons. And, if I were to express my own views, which in fact I am doing here today, I would say that one of them is the fact that these people have been far more isolated. I worked for 10 years in the Canadian Arctic and when I left there in 1964 there was no man living in the Northwest Territories whom I believe is as isolated as some of the people on the Labrador Coast, certainly in terms of attention that is being paid to them by people outside. I would much sooner be an Eskimo in the Northwest Territories today, in terms of support and help that I could expect, than to be a man living on parts of the coast of Labrador.

You were asking about the economic conditions. I think that, in part, describes the reason for it being so low. Fish prices on the coast of Labrador, as you will hear in one of the other segments of film, are far, far lower for the same fish than they are anywhere else in Newfoundland.

Senator Fournier: Has transportation anything to do with it?

Mr. Snowden: Transportation certainly has something to do with it, the fact that there is a good coastal boat service there in the summertime, but in the wintertime these communities are entirely cut off, except for ski-dos. Incidentally, although it is not in our submission, it's an oversight on my part, it is one of the smaller recommendations that one would wish to make; but I have heard all across Arctic Canada, and all along the coast of Labrador, the same plea, that ski-dos are to the people—to the trappers of the country—the same as farm equipment is to the prairie farmer, and they beg for some assistance in subsidizing gasoline prices for them. A ski-doo to a man on the coast of Labrador, or in the Northwest Territories, is what he depends on for his livelihood in the wintertime.

Senator Fournier: What would the price of gasoline be up there?

Mr. Snowden: I am sorry, sir, I could not answer that in terms of winter prices. There is a variation between winter and summer prices.

Mr. Harvey Best, Head of Film Unit, Extension Memorial University of Newfoundland, St. John's: Last winter it was 85 cents a gallon.

Senator Fournier: And in summer?

Mr. Best: It would be the same.

Mr. Snowden: In some places. Somebody mentions on one of the films that it was a dollar.

Mr. Best: They add the oil and it comes to a dollar.

Senator Carter: This Ray Ward he kept talking about Fishery Products, The Room, was that a little pelleting plant there, or was it a cleaning plant? What was Fishery Products doing there?

Mr. Snowden: I will ask Harvey Best, but first of all, Senator Carter, there are no fish processing plants of any kind on the coast of Labrador.

Mr. Best: They are strictly supply stores.

Senator Fournier: They collect what?

Mr. Best: They collect fish.

Senator Fournier: Sir, could you point out on the map of Newfoundland whereabouts we saw that?

Mr. Snowden: We are talking about this area in here (indicating on map).

Senator Fournier: Oh, Labrador.

Mr. Snowden: The Labrador Coast, this area in here (indicating on map).

Senator Hastings: Why did he keep referring to Charlottetown, did I get it right?

Mr. Snowden: You are correct. There is a community on the coast called Charlottetown. It in no way resembles the other Charlottetown, except that it also is a growth centre, and what Mr. Ward was describing was his inability to justify to himself going in to a designated growth centre, going to a resettlement centralization point, where there is no hope that he can earn any money at all. He would much rather, as he said, stay where he is and at least have the dignity of not being dependent on us.

Senator Carter: Well, why is this a growth centre, what is making it a growth centre?

Mr. Snowden: There are certain facilities in Charlottetown which don't exist in some of the... Charlottetown is not a large community, but it is...

Senator Carter: But I mean, it is going to grow, it is a growth centre?

Mr. Snowden: That is right.

Senator Carter: What is expected to make it grow?

Mr. Snowden: It has a school for example, which they do not have in Snug Harbour or Norman's Harbour.

Senator Carter: Well, certainly they do not describe that as a growth centre because you have a school there.

Mr. Snowden: I am not in any way, Senator Carter, equipped to describe the rationale for resettlement in Newfoundland at all.

The Chairman: No, but what he said is that it is big enough as it is. He thinks that those things frighten him, and he shys away from them.

Mr. Snowden: I would submit, Senator Croll, that what he is shying away from is a dependence on the taxpayers of Canada above all else.

Mr. Best: He is saying that it cannot support any more people in this area, not that he is shying away from it.

The Chairman: Fishing would be the only industry there?

Mr. Best: They do not fish there, sir.

Mr. Snowden: Fishing and trapping.

Senator Carter: But somebody designated that as a growth centre and are trying to persuade these fellows to move down there. Is that correct?

Mr. Snowden: Yes, although the degree of persuasion is parallel to the degree of involvement in all other ways along the coast of Labrador.

Senator Carter: How many, I did not quite get, how many families were there in this?

Mr. Snowden: Four crowds, sir.

Senator Carter: Yes, that was four families in that Snug Harbour.

Mr. Snowden: Although I could not say, without knowing the community, what kind of extended kinship group he is talking about there, whether in fact he is talking about four families or whether he is talking about. . .

Mr. Best: It is four families, sir.

Senator Quart: Before these ski-dogs did the people use dog sleds to travel?

Mr. Snowden: Yes, some still do, but not many now.

Senator McGrand: May I ask this question: are the economic conditions along that Labrador coast nearly as good as conditions along the Greenland coast as carried on by Denmark?

Mr. Snowden: Certainly since the Greenlanders and the Danes have found Atlantic salmon they are not, where Greenland fishermen can earn $12,000 in three months. There is nothing like that earned on the coast of Labrador by very many people. To illustrate the difference, I was talking in March with a man in Cartwright who had taken 1,700 drafts of fish. A draft is a unit of measurement of a quantity of fish. He had taken 1,700 drafts of fish last year for which he received $8,500. Had he been on Fogo Island, which I hope to discuss with you later, he would have got at least $17,000. At the very least $17,000.

The Chairman: Why the difference?

Mr. Snowden: Because they do not have any other information that tells them how they can market their fish, or the prices. They have no awareness of market conditions at all in the fishery; they get no information on fish prices whatsoever.

Senator Cook: Will the new Marketing Board help that?

Mr. Snowden: Theoretically, it will. Theoretically it will be in two ways. First of all the Fish Marketing Board will provide immediate, or relatively immediate, cash upon delivery of fish. This is something no man on the coast of Labrador has ever had for his fish. He settles up at the end of the season and he never knows what price he is getting for it. The second advantage, and, Harvey, you could add to this. Mr. Best is the head of our film unit here, but in addition to that, he is the producer and host of a weekly program for fishermen on television, called "Decks Awash" and is much more of an authority on the fishery here than I am. But I would suggest that the second advantage that may accrue to fishermen on the Labrador coast is that they will get a guaranteed price which they will know during the season, rather than having to wait until they are settled up at the end of the year.

Senator McGrand: Do you attribute the success of Fogo Island to the fact that they have organized a co-operative on Fogo Island?

Mr. Snowden: Hardly that, sir if I could leave your question for a little while, I intend to discuss that later on.

Senator Cook: That guaranteed price for fish would approximate the proper market value. would it not?

Mr. Snowden: Yes, it would. It would be lower than the eventual settlement, probably. One would hope so, that is the basis on which it is being established.

Senator Carter: How would Ray Ward dispose of his fish now? He is getting supplies from Fishery Products, from The Room, and is he taking his fish there for Fishery Products to pay for the settlement?

Mr. Snowden: Yes, sir, he is.

Senator Carter: And Fishery Products?

Mr. Snowden: Are putting it on the books, you see, and it balances out at the end of the year.

Senator Carter: Without any price at all until it is marketed?

Mr. Snowden: Until it is gone. The fish is gone before it is balanced out.

Senator Carter: He does not know whether he is getting gypped or not?

Mr. Snowden: No, sir. This is exactly the same as the Northwest Territories of Canada was until 15 years ago.

Senator Cook: Well, when you sell on open account like that, the law demands that you get the full price, does it not? I understand that it does.

Mr. Snowden: It may demand it, sir, but it is certainly not the practice.

Mr. Best: The Labrador prices are generally very much lower than those in Newfoundland and they are down, as you said, 50 per cent. Now under the Salt Fish Marketing Board the agents will receive a fixed fee, so in theory, the people on the coast should get the full market value, but it depends on what the agents can persuade the Marketing Board that they should receive in between, and the organization that they are in.

Senator Carter: Yes, I know but under the Salt Fish Corporation, the new one, the Marketing Board, do they not have a set fee for everybody? The fellow in Snug Harbour who goes to Fishery Products will he not get any bigger fee than somebody down in Fogo or somewhere else?

Mr. Best: That has not been worked out yet, sir, and the fishermen are a little wary about it.

Senator Carter: The Salt Fish Corporation is said to guarantee a price to the fishermen, and all fishermen, and they have not got one price for a fisherman in Labrador and another one for a . . .

Mr. Best: The agent will argue that he has to go up there and therefore he deserves a greater price.

Mr. Snowden: Yes, the collection costs are higher on the Labrador coast, for example.

Senator Hastings: The agent of whom?

Mr. Best: Fishery Products will be the agent.

Senator Hastings: Who are Fishery Products?

Senator Carter: Well, this agency is a transitional setup. Theoretically they will disappear in time.

Senator Cook: Anyway it is a step in the right direction.

Senator McGrand: If the Northern Peninsula is not the poorest part of Newfoundland, what part is?

Mr. Snowden: When you are talking about the Northern Peninsula, sir, you are talking about this area (indicates on map). The area I believe is the poorest area in Newfoundland is this whole coastal area (indicates on map). I do not regard the St. Barbe Coast by any means as being the poorest part.

Senator McGrand: What part of Newfoundland do most of the men going to the seal hunt come from?

Mr. Snowden: They come from all over the province, all over the eastern part of Newfoundland. These men here are landmen—they hunt seals themselves.

Before we screen any more film material, I would like to discuss two things which I think are manifestations of poverty and submit to you two recommendations concerning them. The first concerns communications and the second concerns organization. You will see in our brief that we support some of the things which were said in the Report of the Task Force on Government Information about getting to people and receiving from people information, people who are not normally heard or reached. We have some observations generally on what happens to the poor in terms of information and I would like to read just a page, I think, of my submission:

We submit that the poor receive less information of real importance to them than any other group of citizens. Their opinions are sought less than any other segment of society. People are poor, we submit, if they are not well informed about matters of vital and personal concern to them; they are poor if a blind and uncaring bureaucracy planning for the manipulation of their lives, ignores them, and gets away with it.

In most of Canada the devices for exchanging or obtaining information are easily accessible to most of us—telephones, broadcast television, government offices, frequent and until recently, regular mail deliveries, public libraries, broadcast radio, daily newspapers, magazine racks and book stores. This accessibility to information allows citizens to make real choices about the directions they will take in their lives and provides opportunities for all of us to expand and diversify our interests and goals. But these sophisticated services and facilities, which are taken so much for granted by most of us, are a myth to many people such as there are on the coast of Labrador. I believe the people there have been ignored in terms of information in as callous and miserable a fashion as even the most isolated resident of the Canadian Arctic.

We go into the business of public broadcasting and you may think honourable senators that we should not be appearing before this committee but before another one. We would submit seriously that information to the poor and from the poor is a cause of serious concern to us—a lack of it. We wonder if it has not sometimes struck the rural poor as funny that they do not receive adequate broadcasting and this applies to many parts of mid-Canada, the Canadian North, and parts of Newfoundland and Labrador, that they do not receive adequate broadcasting and television service when broadcasting money goes for coverage of the Olympic Games in Mexico, or to provide better competition to American stations beaming into our heaviest populated areas.

We believe it is a cause for shame in Canada that scores of thousands of the poor are without any public television service. Why should the poor of the Labrador Coast feel grateful to this country that only recently were they able to hear publicly-owned radio? Should an employee of General Motors feel grateful for the bonus of a mule at Christmas when his fellow workers all receive a Cadillac? We are aware of plans for satellite television which would enable remote Canadians to receive general broadcast television, but we do not believe that in itself it will meet the special immediate and regional information requirements of citizens in more isolated areas. And almost by definition, these are the poor Canadians.

We discuss an experiment in communications which has been developed in this province and which is now being carried out on the coast of Labrador using video-tape equipment. This provides an opportunity for people on the Labrador Coast to receive a television program by mail, and late certainly, but recently we have been able to work with the CBC Regional Office in Newfoundland in providing some programs to the Labrador Coast. In these smaller communities people have some meeting place usually, a television set there, with the program on from broadcast television, which has been put on tape and mailed to them, is guaranteed to turn out the whole community. Just think of the incredible informational resource we have there. This is an inexpensive device. We are not talking about the cost of broadcast television we are talking about a machine like this—a recorder which will take an half-inch television tape for a total cost of what, Harvey, roughly?

Mr. Best: $2,000.

Mr. Snowden: For $2,000 you can put into the most remote communities in Labrador an opportunity for the residents there to receive information and educational experiences which are totally denied to them today because we believe that broadcast television is the only way that you can get television to people.

Senator Carter: Does $2,000 include the power?

Mr. Snowden: No, it would not include the power, but in most of the communities we are dealing with there is power. We do have small generators—a Japanese generator which we buy also for this. A cost of what—$500?

Mr. Best: $500 or less.

Senator Fournier: It will be at least $3,000 before you were finished.

Mr. Snowden: Right. What we are discussing in this brief in terms of this experiment has wide application. I spent four months this past winter working in Alaska as co-ordinator of something called the Rural Alaska Development Group and it was comprised of a number of agencies in Alaska, the Alaska Federation of Natives, of which you heard recently. They have a bill before the Congress of the United States now for $500 million for land claim settlement. That group, and other groups in Alaska, decided that they wanted a share of the oil royalties and oil lease money of the State of Alaska and they, along with other groups in Alaska, submitted legislation to the Alaska State legislature. One of the recommendations in that group's submission was that every village in coastal Alaska have this kind of equipment, plus a small and inexpensive video-tape camera. Our recommendation in fact is in some way a duplicate of that—I do not feel as if I have been pirating because I was responsible for the recommendation in Alaska as well—but 200 villages in Alaska claim they have a right to share in the bounty of the oil resource development, which the legislators of Alaska are going to find hard not to support, I think. They believe that with 200 villages in Alaska they can supply, for half a million dollars, all the television equipment like this—the recorders, and $200,000 worth of tapes, which will do three things, and these are in our recommendation. I will read our recommendation first:

The federal Government, through the Department of Communications, should provide funds to needy communities in mid-Canada and Northern Canada which do not receive broadcast television. The funds would be used to provide a 1/2 video-tape camera, deck, monitors and tapes to each such community for three purposes: Our first purpose, we believe all citizens of Canada are entitled to receive VTR's of select CBC television programs to be played in community facilities, community halls; secondly, to provide a means for the types of adult education so desperately needed in the more isolated communities in Canada. We intend here for example, now that we have this begun on the coast of Labrador, to begin a regular service of programs in adult education—all kinds of adult education—for people along the coast; and thirdly, and this is incredibly important I believe, to provide an important means of inter-community communications.

I do not want to go into that particular one now because we are going to hear on videotape very soon what a man on the coast of Labrador says about his difficulty as a director of a regional development association—his difficulty in getting in touch with other directors who live in other communities.

I would like to go on now to the section which deals with organization unless you would like to question me on the...

The Chairman: Please, go ahead.

Mr. Snowden: As I mentioned at the start, we have a fair exposure, and quite regular contact with rural people, not just in Newfoundland but in other parts of Canada, and indeed throughout North America. The Canadian Council for Rural Development has repeatedly pointed out that there is an all-prevailing sense of injustice in rural Canadian life, based on the impossibility of rural people making any meaningful decisions about their future in rural Canada. We believe this is equally true for many of the people of rural Newfoundland. It is governments which are providing the greatest impetus to rural change—they are providing new subsidies or withdrawing old ones from primary producers; they are implementing plans for resettlement and centralization; they are making decisions about who should do what and where and how. At the same time rural people here have not been aware that governments find it difficult to solicit advice from them as unorganized masses of citizens. We have not had a great deal of rural organization in Newfoundland until quite recently and we talk in our brief about the kind of rural organization that is developing here which involves the poor. To a very great extent these organizations have several characteristics in common.

First of all, they are citizen supported in their areas. Secondly, admittance is almost nothing. The poorest fisherman on the St. Barbe Coast can be a member of the Northern Regional Development Association, which is the first organized group of people speaking on behalf of development in that area. Now I am isolating that, there are 1800 other regional development associations in Newfoundland. That is one with which we have been working very closely. The leaders of these groups are men of intense dedication, occupying their positions of responsibility, often at devastating personal sacrifice. I do not know of a rich man who is on the board of directors of one of these regional development associations. What you are soon going to see is an extremely poor man doing this.

These associations cover large geographical areas of the province, the Northern Regional Development Association goes up to the tip here (indicates on map) and down to Deer Lake—and indeed takes in a little part of the coast of Labrador. You can imagine the organizational problems that a group such as that have when they have no money. They have the pittance that they can raise in terms of membership fees. To raise membership fees would be to restrict membership only to those who could afford it.

The achievements of these regional development associations, although they are only basically about four years old in this province, I think have been quite remarkable. Some of them have come to the point where, after some initial difficulties in dealing with governments, for example, their opinions are now respected and occasionally sought. This I think was a major achievement for anybody who is deprived or living in rural Canada.

I hear the same complaint made all across Canada—that all the programs the Federal Government programs, ARDA, now DREE, the FRED program, have all been instituted without real consultation with the people for whom they were designed. And I do not think that it is any different here in Newfoundland. But, as I said, these regional development associations can be effective only if they include a good representative section, a cross-section, of the whole area. And in places like the St. Barbe Coast, where we do have what you would call, poverty, these associations perform a valuable service to the unorganized, previously unorganized, people of that coast. They have very serious problems in staying alive, because the finances, and their problems now are heightened because within the past year they have formed a Provincial Council of Rural Development, comprising these 19 regional development associations. Now most of the men who are in positions of responsibility in these organizations have incredible demands made on their time, and on their pocket books. There is a man in Fogo Island, whom you will meet, who has gone broke this year, he is in debt—he has no source of income, because he has devoted his time for the past four years of his life to the voluntary organization on Fogo Island that is making Fogo Island work the way it is today, and he would not, as a matter of principle, accept any money from that organization.

These are the kind of men we have in these regional development associations but they cannot meet. How do they meet? How do they get the money to travel? Where do they get the research assistance they need? Governments are not going to give it to them. They do not have the resources themselves. How are they going to pay for a man to run, as an executive director should run, an organization like a Provincial Council of Regional Development Associations which are real people's organizations. They receive no help for their travel. No help for expenses, and most of them do not receive any direct or indirect funding of any kind, from any government agency.

Yet, I would submit that the removal of this new voice from Newfoundland, would be a catastrophe, because it is the first time that governments in this province and I think in Ottawa have had an opportunity of working with, working in partnership with, groups of citizens. I was a civil servant for 15 years. I know the difficulties in trying to work with a group of people who are not organized. Where do you go? Who is the spokesman? Where do you get your information? Who is reliable? How do you make your decisions? These regional development associations in this Provincial Council offer a really first class opportunity for governments of both senior levels to have an effective partnership with the rural people of this province and so we recommend strongly to you that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion increase its grant to the Canadian Council on Rural Development, and that the Canadian Council on Rural Development provide funds to Provincial Rural Development Council for the purposes of hiring executive directors and research staff.

Now you may very well have questioned: why the Canadian Council on Rural Development? Because after all its orientation up to now has been primarily agricultural and it has not performed anything but a council function. My argument would be that, in this province anyway, there is a reluctance, on the part of rural people, to be financed directly through a single department of government. They believe, whether rightly or wrongly, that such financing can be cut off at any point and that their organization is destroyed. You will meet when you are on the St. Barbe Coast the man who until recently was the President of the Northern Regional Development Association and the President of the Newfoundland Council on Rural Development, and I am sure that when you hear the brief submitted there that they will be talking to you about this sort of thing. We are not suggesting incidentally as you will see in our recommendation that such provincial voluntary organizations get off scott free financially. We do not do that in our own work here, we do not believe in it. If we hold a conference with fishermen on the coast of Labrador, as we do at their request, every man pays a dollar to get in there, because it costs money, and we think that one of the first steps in understanding organization and responsibility in organization is to understand that they cost. So we are not suggesting that the federal Government should finance all the cost of a Provincial Rural Development Council. We are suggesting that they finance the executive director's job and the research assistant's job but that the clerical staff and travel money should come from sources other than DREE.

I would like now to run four sections of video-tape. The first one is made with Ray Rumbolt who lives in the same part of the coast as Ray Ward. He does not look like a poor man. In fact, some years he is not. Last year there was failure along the whole coast of Labrador in the fishery and Ray Rumbolt had no income. In addition to being a fisherman, however, he is a director of the Coastal Labrador Regional Development Association, which is the only citizens' organization along that part of Newfoundland and Labrador. He discusses the problems that he has as a director in an organization with communications the way they are along that coast. I think we will stop briefly between each of these segments—very briefly—so I can introduce the next person who is coming on. The first one then is Ray Rumbolt, fisherman and Director of Coastal Labrador, and he lives at a place called Mary's Harbour.

(FILM)

In the next segment Ray Rumbolt tells how they help fishermen.

(FILM)

We move now from the Labrador Coast to the St. Barbe Coast and we meet here Father Desmond McGrath, Parish Priest. He has since become very active in organizing a union there. He speaks in this segment about communication and the effect of organization of people on that coast—an organization that already existed when he went there.

We have a section in our brief which deals with residential centres but we will not deal with that since we are running beyond time. That does include a recommendation. There are other documents which support this, written in Newfoundland, which say we totally subscribe to the efforts made by the government to upgrade the deprived especially in basic and upgrading adult educational centres. We have an excellent College of Fisheries in St. John's which is providing a kind of trades education which is very desperately needed.

We wonder what a nation is doing in training its people to be competent tradesmen if it is not at least concerned in some way with training them as responsible and involved citizens and this is what the section of our report deals with here. I think it was Senator Carter, although I am not sure, who asked the question related to resettlement to growth centre. Yes, it was. We feel a bit remiss in not dealing in our presentation with resettlement as such. We have neglected to do so for two reasons. One is that it is an incredibly complex and difficult problem for those who live in rural Newfoundland and for those who are attempting to deal with some of the deprivation that exists there. We do not feel that in St. John's on our staff here we have the expertise to deal with that problem. Had you not been going, as you are—and I must congratulate you for doing so, if you will not think me presumptuous—if you were not going to places like Fogo Island and the St. Barbe Coast, the Port au Port Peninsula, and the Labrador Coast, I think we would have tried to make the presentation regarding resettlement but we are not going to do so. We have fairly strong views on some aspects of resettlement and without discussing the merits of the program at all we are convinced that some of the serious problems that are occurring in resettlement in Newfoundland are occurring because of inadequate communication—that people who are being resettled are not well enough informed as to what resettlement really means and neither are the people in communities to which they are being resettled and the results that we observe in Newfoundland are results of frustration and difficulty because of basic communications not being developed prior to resettlement.

We would like to show you however two very brief segments of video-tape. One is with Andrew Swimm, from Port aux Choix, where Father McGrath was from. At that time he was a merchant and he owned a fairly large supermarket there. He is now the manager of the fish plant at Port aux Choix and he talks in his film about the deprivation that comes to people who try to move into a resettlement area and work. We are not suggesting that this as general application, rather we are showing to you as some kind of background for your own visit to that area.

The last segment of the film is with Ray Umbolt, on the coast of Labrador. He talks about resettlement, the expectations of the coastal Labrador regional development associations, and finally he talks about what confederation has meant to him. I believe, honourable gentlemen, it is close to the time we have to leave. There is an appendix in our brief called "Five Per Cent Helped Turn the trick." If you do have time please read the appendix about Fogo Island because it presents an observation about what we believe is a remarkable and unique development in rural contemporary Canada and it has come about because of a whole series of circumstances and conditions. By far, the most important of which have been the determination of the people themselves and in spite of indifference and hostility and the lack of concern by those who had no right not to be concerned.

The burden of dealing with poverty must, we realize, be an onerous and difficult one for such distinguished and concerned Canadians as sit on this committee. We are certain that you accept our brief in the conviction of our sincerity; we would like you to know that we are aware of the awesome and important task you have taken upon yourselves. You hear much of unhappiness, and an awareness of acute and real problems is your daily concern.

We thought we would be doing less than injustice to Newfoundland, and a disservice to you, if we ended our presentation without a small note of optimism. We should like to spend some time with you discussing Fogo Island which, in the space of the last three years has given solid and important evidence of what an aroused, concerned, and determined group of citizens, can do to fight against what seemed to them like impossible odds. We think that Fogo Island offers a message of hope for others who live outside the mainstream of Canadian life.

We are going to screen for you now two extracts from one of a whole series of films which was made on Fogo Island. I know that you already know something of Fogo Island and for that reason our film screenings are going to be very brief. We would ask you, however, to remember that these films were made in 1967. At that time, as you will hear on the first part of this film, the fishermen of Fogo Island had no form of organization. To put the island in its right perspective. At that time there was an incredible fear on the island that the people there were going to be pressured into moving off, that governments had no confidence in the economic viability of Fogo Island and that they did not believe that they were justified in spending money there. I have always found that in small communities there is an incredible system of rumor and gossip, and Fogo Island is no different from most small communities I have been in. Rumors were very, very strong in the 10 communities in Fogo Island in 1967, in that people were going to be moved away. There was a sense of complete fear and hopelessness there. I am not going to say anything more at the moment, we are going to run the first extract of film. Once again, I caution that there may be some difficulty in understanding the accent for those who are not from Newfoundland. The first part of the film is with two men and they talk about the lack of organization and what that really means to them on Fogo Island, in 1967. The second segment is going to deal with education and I do not propose to talk about that at this point, but I would like to tell you what I believe has happened on Fogo Island in terms of spirit and in terms of organization since that time.

(FILM)

One of the things that happened shortly after that film was made there, was a meeting of fishermen on Fogo Island to discuss some kind of organization. Prior to that, however, they asked for help in bringing resource people to Fogo Island. They wanted information, they did not have information, and so some people were brought there who had experience in fishermen's organizations. And while they gave a great deal of help, and unquestionably they did give a great deal of help, to Fogo Island, the people on Fogo rejected finally the possibility of uniting with this other group. They were people from the Maritimes. They decided if they were going to have any effective organization at all, they would have to do two things. It would have to first of all convince the people in power off the island, who made decisions about the island, that they were very serious about what they were going to be doing. And the second thing that they decided was that they would have to build their own facilities if they were ever going to have any viable industry on the island—they were going to have to save the money themselves. So they began a co-operative organization, and right from the first day of operation they put 5 per cent right off the top of their catch, every man in it put 5 per cent off the top of his catch, every time he got paid, into a reserve fund for his co-operative. This year that fund is going to be substantial enough that they are probably going to qualify on Fogo Island, not under any special condition for poor people, but they are going to qualify under the Industrial Incentives Act, for the same kind of grant that is available for any established co-operation in Canada.

You heard the man say that the labour is going off the island for processing the fish. After the co-operative was formed the provincial government, primarily through two departments, began to give considerable help to Fogo Island. I do not believe that that help was given without a certain amount of reluctance at the start, because in this province there has been a great deal of history of people saying they are going to do something then not performing, so I can understand the reluctance which the government might have had in becoming enthusiastic about Fogo Island right from the beginning of this change in 1967. However, two departments of the provincial government, the provincial Department of Fisheries which has rented, has leased to the co-operative on Fogo Island, the two government-owned fish facilities there which had previously been leased to private companies and the provincial Department of Community and Social Development, which helped to fund a co-operative shipbuilding yard on Fogo Island, and which gave some money to a community worker there—these two departments—have been the outside support, primarily, that Fogo Island has received through government. One small amount of money which was given by the federal Department of Citizenship and Immigration at that time, was an important grant because it allowed fishermen from Fogo Island to travel to Tignish, Prince Edward Island, to see how the fishermen there in a co-operative organization, function, and in turn the fishermen of Tignish came back to Fogo Island and this has had, I think, a very profound effect on the conviction of the fishermen of Fogo Island that they can do something themselves, the fishermen can do something, and I would commend the department for investing that kind of money in travel. I think the Youth Travel Program has been marvelous for Newfoundlanders, as it has been for other young Canadians, but this kind of subsidized travel for people who are either poor or on the borderline of poverty, but who have some way out of it, I think it is a national investment which has a great deal of merit to it.

The co-operative really started to function in 1968 using the government-owned plant itself and in that year it put $40,000 in labour in Fogo Island. Now that is fish plant labour that is not the amount of cash that came to the fishermen from fish which was many, many times that. By 1969 that plant was producing $125,000 worth of labour. For the first time in its history after 10 years of being there, it was opened during the winter time, and this year they have expanded into the second plant. They are going into the fresh fish business for the first time, they have larger and better boats which they have built in their co-operative on the island and I have reason to believe that the welfare bill—60 per cent of the people on Fogo Island were on welfare in 1967—has been substantially reduced. The co-operative now has 760 members most of whom are fishermen, some of whom are fish plant workers and some of whom are just interested citizens. That represents by far the bulk of fishermen on Fogo Island and yet, three years ago, the ten communities there had showed no sign of any ability or desire to link up with one another. They had traditional rivalries sometimes based on religious grounds because religion is a very strong force among the people on Fogo Island and sometimes through custom and tradition. There was no sense of unity on Fogo Island at all three years ago when these films were made.

I think you will observe that that is quite different today. I would suggest one thing to you, however, before we show the next bit of film. We have documented in this brief why we believe these changes have occurred and I will not go into detail on it primarily because of the conviction on the part of the people of Fogo Island that they were going to stay there in spite of what anybody tried to do to move them off. Secondly, they have had an incredible input from very, very dedicated citizens on Fogo Island who are determined that that operation is going to work. Thirdly, they have put their own money in, they have put their money where their mouth is, and they have convinced people now. For example, the banks in Newfoundland regard Fogo Island as a good source for borrowing. They will loan money to the Fogo Island Co-operative and they will loan substantial amounts of money to it also. They have had unquestionably as fine a management in that producer co-operative as there is anywhere in Canada and I would include the Prince Rupert Fisherman's Co-operative in British Columbia.

When you go to Fogo Island, however, it is quite possible that people will not talk to you in as optimistic terms as I would talk of out here. First of all, they have lived every day with the changes that have been taking place. We have observed them from outside. We have observed them sporadically, not infrequently, but sporadically. We see the changes in people here which they do not observe in themselves, their sense of confidence, their ability to deal with the government departments in an adequate and respectable and responsible way. Their ability to negotiate with fish companies. These are changes which have occurred in the people on Fogo Island which they are not likely to discuss with you when you are there because perhaps they are not aware of them themselves. Secondly, I would suggest that they are not likely to be very optimistic because what has happened there is very, very few. They are reluctant, perhaps, some of them, to believe that it really has happened. They are suspicious of the possibility of that being withdrawn from them somehow by somebody off the island. So I just add that as a possibility.

We are moving now to something which on Fogo Island in 1967 was a real cause of concern and that was the problem of education.

FILM

We are through our presentation. We have a recommendation included in the appendix to our brief:

That the Department of Regional and Economic Expansion fund a research grant for the purposes of examining the developments on Fogo Island during the past three years, and for determining the causes for that development, in the expectation that such research would provide a possible guide to rural re-development elsewhere in the Atlantic Provinces. The findings should be made public and distributed widely.

Senator McGrand: Did the Department of Regional Development have anything to do with Fogo Island?

Mr. Snowden: As far as I know, sir, it made no contribution whatsoever. You see this is the problem we have now under the DREE Program, I believe. I think we are ignoring the possibilities for intermediate development in Canada. This has happened in the United States under federal Government programs. Already in the Southern United States there is now a return agriculturally to the small to intermediate size local industry, and I think that we have made the mistake in Canada, in our direction in terms of economic expansion of rural areas, in considering only the large-scale possibilities. This is why I think Fogo Island is so very important because I think there are ways in this country, in rural Canada, still to bring people who are borderline poor, or poor people, into a viable economic and social position in this country.

Senator McGrand: I wondered how they looked on that Fogo Island development. It is small and it is not originally the idea. I just wonder how much support they got.

Mr. Snowden: I do not know, but I do know that recently DREE has sent some of its senior people in the Atlantic Provinces there, which I think is a very good sign. I understand also that they were very, very favorably impressed with what they saw there and one would hope that this would have an effect on their policy.

The Chairman: Mr. Snowden, for the brief which is submitted under your direction as Director of Extension Services, we extend to you our thanks. It is an excellent brief. It is down to earth and well done and there are many things in here that are comparatively new to us. We are looking for something that we have not seen or heard of before, and there are some very good thoughts there. The staff tells me that without your help it would have been impossible to organize the Newfoundland program, particularly the visits to Fogo Island, Corner Brook, and Labrador, and those visits really, as you point out, will make our visit one of consequence. We thank you for your personal help and that of the members of the staff who have been helpful with you: Anthony Williamson, Ernest Strickland, Frederick Earle, and Martin Lowe. We shall see that the curriculum vite is placed on the record so that all may see who did it, particularly yours which is the most distinguished. We are delighted that you found your way back to Canada and back here amongst us. It has been a very useful and interesting presentation. On behalf of the committee, thank you.

Senator Carter: Mr. Snowden, you spoke about ARDA and FRED and ADA and these other agencies that were set up for regional development, and they went ahead more or less ignoring the local people or getting their ideas, and they all ended up in failure. And now do I get the impression that DREE is likely to make the same mistake?

Mr. Snowden: Senator Carter, I would like to correct one thing. I did not say that all ARDA programs or all FRED programs ended in failure. I believe implicitly that until we are able to find the devices for involving the citizens for whom we are developing programs, to involve them not just at the point where we have prepared the plans, but at the point where we conceive of the need to prepare plans, then we are going to have to face always the kind of disaster that we have faced with these major programs in the past. If DREE operates in the same way, if it operates without any direct and continuous and sincere involvement with the people whom it is attempting to serve, then it is going to be a disaster.

Senator Carter: I am voicing my own opinion now, I am not talking for the committee, but I have been following these various efforts down through the years, and I knew beforehand what was going to happen, for the very reason you have stated, because the plans are made; the communication is between the federal Government and the provincial government, and it is between bureaucrats in the provincial government and bureaucrats in the federal Government, who think they know best, who work out their programs, and then eventually they will impose them on the people who are supposed to benefit. I could very well see the same thing happening with DREE because you are still following the same procedures. The channel of communication between the federal Government and provincial government, between federal bureaucrats and provincial bureaucrats, and how can you inject, that is what I wanted to get at, what is the machinery for injecting into that system, the local agencies, the local development association. Have they got to fight their way in or is there any provision?

Mr. Snowden: I think they have to fight their way in. On the basis of my own 15 years of experience as a bureaucrat in a fairly senior position in Ottawa, I now turn, you know, in the other direction and concede that although I was working in the part of the country in the North where there was very little basic Canadian interest, Southern Canadian interest, I still tended to think that all the expertise was in my own shop.

The Chairman: At what stage do they fight their way in?

Mr. Snowden: I would suggest, sir, that in Newfoundland we are already in a position where they cannot. The point is that here you have a cadre of dedicated and competent citizens all over this island who are saying we want a piece of the action. We want a piece of the decision making. We are capable, intelligent human beings, and you must provide us, as a people who are doing the planning and collecting and spending the money, with the device for working, not against you, because this is what is going to happen if the kind of development you are suggesting does not occur, not against government but working in true partnership with government. As I said in my recommendation concerning this, I think that one way of doing it is for some agency to be able to provide very minimal funding to ensure that these organizations have the kind of technical expertise themselves because they do not have it now and they are always at a disadvantage. Who are the experts? Where are your experts? The expert is the man who has the local knowledge and the local experience which no planner in my building or in the Confederation Building or in Ottawa has got.

The Chairman: Yes, but Mr. Snowden, the American experience in that respect has not been at all satisfactory. They went around and they took groups, organized here and organized there, and in the end they found they were much worse off than when they started. What they did was build Joe Smith here, who then made a hero of himself, and ran away with the show; the result was he was not doing the work for the others.

Now, how are we going to get away from that very business of carry-on. For instance, the Government is doing some of the things that you are suggesting now. You know they gave some money to the Halifax Youth Group; they have given some money to Toronto groups and other groups to try and activate them, but yet we, in our travels across the country, cannot find these activated groups.

Mr. Snowden: Well, sir, you have come to the place where they exist. I think your point is well taken. I am familiar on a first-hand basis with some parts of the rural CAP Program in the United States, in California particularly. What I think happened there was that government monies developed organizations. Everybody knew they were on the pork barrel; they used the funds; the strongest man got the most funds, and got himself into a position of power. But what we are talking about here are organizations which have functioned on their own in some cases for four years without any assistance whatsoever. If they have not already proven their commitment, if they have not already proven the kind of impersonal stake and investment they are prepared to make in Newfoundland, I do not know how they could ever do it.

The Chairman: Well now, forget Fogo. I read up what I could about Fogo, and what you said to me today is of course a new world completely. I never heard of this before and I am very much interested in going there and taking a look. I have never been there before. But that is not an example. There was a determined group of individualists who said, "No one is going to push me around. I'm prepared to eat on a lower basis but I'm going to do it my own way." There are not too many of those people in this world today, but you have got the proof here. Forget that for the moment. I think they are a success and I believe everything you say. Let us go to other groups. There is in Newfoundland a great deal of privation and poverty. You saw the notice in the press about our meetings. Where were the poor people? We are a very sympathetic group, we are well motivated, we have no axes to grind and we want to help. Where are the poor people?

Mr. Snowden: I suggest, sir, that perhaps a lot of them are saving it up for tonight. I think you're going to find them tonight.

The Chairman: Yes, but tonight we will be dealing with a particular area that has always been in rather difficult circumstances. But where are the people from St. John's? Where were the people who spoke up for them? That is why I ask you at what point do you motivate them; at what point do you move them in?

Mr. Snowden: It is difficult to do. If you have had no reason in the past to trust authority of the kind we are talking about, I think it is very difficult to expect that the people are going to come out and talk to what we are, we are symbols of authority and symbols of power, and with all the good will we have in the world. I think that the reason that we are able to function as well as we can, and I am not saying we function very well, is because we have people like Tony Williamson, who lives on the coast of Labrador, who will travel with any man on the coast of Labrador by ski-doo anytime in the winter along that coast, who lives in exactly the same way as people who live there and lived there for generations. The same is true of our other Extension workers to a greater or lesser extent and I think that the fact that we have access to these people is only for that reason.

The Chairman: But you have their confidence, and that confidence is not won overnight. You got it because of the result of the things that you have been doing—the things that you describe. The other people who are your former bureaucratic friends have not got that confidence and you know it as well as I do. It is not easy to get.

Mr. Snowden: Well maybe they are still in the right business and maybe I am.

The Chairman: Well I do not know, I think you are in the right business.

Mr. Walter Chmiel, Assistant Professor, Department of Social Work Memorial University of Newfoundland, St. John's: I wonder if the method by which you attempt to involve the poor people in your discussions and deliberations and searching for answers has something to do with it. I was not here when the announcements went into the press, but I would guess they were no different from any other announcement that is given by any department of government and that usually does not bring poor people or deprived people into communication. I wonder, as Mr. Snowden says, the basic premise on which there has been any success with his work and the department's work has been a reaching-out process and I wonder how much this committee has really reached out.

The Chairman: What do you mean by that, sir?

Mr. Chmiel: Reached out and gone into the areas and talked specifically with poor people, unorganized, organized, whatever they are.

The Chairman: How much of that can you do in any one community?

Mr. Chmiel: True, except, Senator Croll, you are spending the time here and you are spending the time downtown to hear formal briefs all the time. Now I wonder if just as much time were spent in going out, whether different results would be made.

The Chairman: We have gone out in other places and we have seen the people. We have talked to them in many communities—Ottawa, Winnipeg, other places. The story does not change.

Mr. Chmiel: Except it seems to me that when you probably tally the time that you spend with the so-called experts as opposed to the time that you spend with the so-called poor, I would wonder where the balance sheet would go.

The Chairman: Well, we hear as many poor as come before us and if you had been at the meeting today you would have noticed that there were four or five people who just rose out of the audience and wanted to talk. They were poor and they talked. That is the best we can do.

* * * *

The Chairman: I will call the meeting of the Senate Committee on Poverty to order on the premises provided by the Householders' Union of the Blackhead Road Community.

Mr. Augustus Breen, Acting President, The Blackhead Road Householders' Union, St. John's: I would like to present this brief which was prepared by the Householders' Union on behalf of the people of Blackhead Road, people who have lived there every day of their lives, with the hope that some action will be taken on their brief when you fellows do get back to Ottawa.

The Chairman: On behalf of the committee, I want to thank you and indicate to you that we have seen the brief. It is a credit to the organization.

I will start out by introducing to you the Senate Committee on Poverty: Senator Fournier, the Deputy Chairman, is from Quebec; Senator Inman from Prince Edward Island; Senator Quart from Quebec; Senator Carter whom you know, and Senator Cook whom you know; Senator McGrand from New Brunswick; and Senator Hastings from a place called Alberta. I am Croll and I am from Toronto.

I am going to have Mr. Gus Breen talk about the brief for a little while and give us an outline. If any of you people are inclined to join the Dialogue, give us your name.

Mr. Breen: On behalf of the Householders' Union, senators, I would like to welcome you here and hope your stay is a pleasant one. What I am to say now may sound like a rhyme or a poem but I do not want it to sound that way. What I am presenting is in three stages. The first is the history of Blackhead Road, the second deals with the problems of the present, and the third, with hopes of the future.

It is important that you know the history of The Brow. It started in the '20s or '30s—I am not sure of the exact date. People in St. John's wanted to get away from the city; they wanted to have a home of their own; they wanted to try a new way of life. I imagine they thought it was here on the Hill otherwise they would not have moved out. It did not work out for some; for some it succeeded, for others it did not. While others tried a little harder to succeed, in a small way they did. Some had to beg, borrow and steal to improve their way of life. While people were trying to do this, conditions grew worse, through lack of jobs, poor sewage conditions, etc. My father worked on the roads. They were paid on the dole, not with money. When on the dole, you get bread and butter for your table and nothing else. There was no way to improve their means whatever.

Now we will look at the urban improvements which are being made. People were told this would mean water and sewage and homes at no cost to us. We were told at the beginning this would give us a home for a home. They were not told it would cost them their homes to make these improvements. They were not told it would cost them their homes to make these improvements. They were not told that if they were landholders in the '50s and '60s that they would be in public housing in the '70s. There were feelings of mistrust. This was lack of honesty on the part of government officials to people of this community. If answers are sought to some of our problems, sometimes they are given, but they are given in such a way that it creates utter confusion among the people here. Let us hope this will change. Let the people on the Hill know where they are going to bring up their children—on the Hill in the future, or are they going to have to find another Brow somewhere else.

For the benefit of people who come up here to live, this can be the beauty spot of the whole province. People can come up here and live in harmony, but to achieve this they need schools. To do this they need homes to bring their children up in, that is, homes which do not cause us the worry of debt. We should not go in debt to find homes to bring our families up in. We need peace of mind and contentment. I would say we would need help from all levels of government to assist us make this community work. We have to be assisted in every way possible to overcome our everyday trials—mortgages, rents, high cost of building materials, furniture for our homes, and water and sewage for our homes, and any other way we can be assisted.

What I am stating is fact. I am saying more what I feel than what I am reading. I am going to say what I witnessed. I know a man, he is dead now, he raised a family on this Hill. He worked on a coal boat. When he was finished his job working on a coal boat digging coal with a pick and shovel to get it out—he would finish his job and work on his home. Now a person who would go through that trouble to get something for themselves, they really need it. They work for it in every way possible. There are people here today going in debt as far as they can go. This is a good school but we need more space, we need a playground for safety for our children and this one school here alone is not large enough if the population increases. We need room to take them up to Grade X11. When other denominations move in they will need it to. We hope this community will be 4,000 or 5,000 in 10 years time. So, I say help us—help us all you can.

The Chairman: Mr. Breen, that is an excellent presentation. It represents something very valuable in the life of a democratic country where you can take your cause to a public forum for the purpose of discussing it. You are prepared to share that responsibility, and because you do it in that way it makes it easier for us and others to be helpful to you. It is the type of approach that gets results and be helpful to other people.

Senator Fournier: What is your population here, roughly?

Mr. James Barry, Member of the Executive, the Blackhead Road Householders' Union, St. John's: Roughly I would say, sir, around 2,500 to 3,000.

The Chairman: How many families?

Mr. Barry: About 273.

Senator Fournier: All people living in homes, are they owners of these homes?

Mr. Barry: I would say 90 percent of the people here are homeowners; they bought them and are living in them.

Senator Fournier: Have you any idea of the number of homes mortgaged or fully paid for?

Mr. Barry: I would say again the same figure would be fully owned. Sir, what we are complaining about is in one to two years time none will be owned.

Senator Fournier: Who is doing this big project?

Mr. Barry: It is a joint federal and provincial government venture.

Senator Fournier: They are going to put in water and sewage and pave the streets at the same time?

Mr. Barry: No, they are going to put sewage in the street but that is wrong, it is in the houses that people want it. Otherwise they will have to bring the night bucket as they have.

Senator Fournier: The town is going to put sewage in the street and you will pay to have it hooked up from your home to the street?

Mr. Barry: This is right.

Senator Fournier: Do you know the value of this project?

Mr. James Vinnicombe, Resident, Blackhead Road, St. John's: $4.5 million.

Senator Fournier: When was it started?

Mr. Vinnicombe: July, 1968.

Senator Fournier: When do you expect it to be completed?

Mr. Barry: Completion date they do not know.

The Chairman: Why so long? Federal and provincial governments have funds. Has it taken a longer time than it should, and, it so, why?

Mr. Barry: Parts of the project have taken a little longer than it should but the cause is that if something pops up that the contractors have to do, the people are not told in advance. The people on this Hill are kept completely in the dark. This is my view and the view of everyone I know. It is only since the Householders' Union has been formed that we are getting information really. Before that we were in the dark. You could ask one person a question and they would refer you to someone else and you would find yourself back of the fence looking through a knothole trying to find your way around.

Senator Carter: Some people must have the blueprint, otherwise they would not know where to go. Have you been able to see that blueprint?

Mr. Barry: I have seen a copy of what is proposed for roads and building lots. I know where the road is supposed to go and where the building lots will be.

Senator Carter: How many people have lost their houses to date?

Mr. Barry: Every resident of the Hill has his home expropriated.

The Chairman: For what purpose?

Mr. Barry: For this scheme. We received notice of expropriation for the scheme.

Senator Hastings: Could you deal with this from the start and lead us through it?

Mr. Barry: This is the problem. I doubt if there is anyone in the room who could go back to the start for the simple fact we have no information.

The Chairman: Doctor, could you put us in the picture as to what was going on? Do you know anything about it?

Doctor Biswarup Bhattacharya, President of Human Rights Association of Newfoundland and Labrador, and Psychiatrist, Hospital for Mental and Nervous Diseases, St. John's: No.

Mr. Leonard J. Hyslop, Federal Government Representative, Citizenship Branch, St. John's: I know and I confirm what he has said.

The Chairman: Explain what he is trying to say. I am finding it difficult.

Mr. Hyslop: They have not had explained what expropriation means. They know only it is the house and ground and that is all.

Mr. Edward Harlick, Resident, Blackhead Road, St. John's: We are dealing with two kinds of expropriation here. The Homes Expropriation Act is a clause within the Expropriation Act. This is a safety valve to protect the homeowner. This was taken out in 1964 to help the provincial government without the safety valve of the Homes Expropriation Act. In other words, the homes and land have been expropriated so it would not be too much money claimed to feed back to residents. At the inset or start of the project it was agreed between the federal and provincial government to rescind this law and this has been investigated.

The Chairman: Has anyone been paid for land taken by the government?

Mr. Harlick: Yes, there have been claims paid.

The Chairman: Claims for what?

Mr. Harlick: I have a first hand knowledge of house and land.

The Chairman: Other than land being used for purposes of highways, has any land been expropriated and paid for?

Mr. Harlick: All land has been expropriated. It is a matter of the federal Government giving back conveyance and paying.

The Chairman: In other words, that law is no longer in effect—and the reconveyances?

Mr. Harlick: The reconveyance, yes.

Mr. Barry: Here is the way I get it. They started off by serving expropriation notices on the people up here. This was the first thing they got. It was my understanding then that the government owned the land. Then some people were compensated for their house and land. Now there are other residents up here who were not. A resident lives a little outside the scheme. There is so much land allotted at low cost—$500 lots. When their homes are demolished they will be compensated for their homes at very little cost. If their homes are to be demolished they will be given a building lot. We cannot choose. If I want to make the move I must be able to pay for it. If I want to move on and if they say there is a lot for $500 out here in X, I have to go over there.

Senator Cook: Are all lots taken?

Mr. Barry: No. They vary from 50 to 80 feet. Getting back to this Family Homes Expropriation Act, when the amendment was put in, the Family Homes Expropriation Act, the people figured out they were going to have their homes replaced. Anyone with a tar shack who expected this was fairly off their heads, but anyone with a decent home, with a roof over their head and who owns the ground it is on, and then move from A to B, would have to go in debt to the tune of $8,000 to $10,000 just to get water and sewage.

Mr. William Clarke, Resident, Blackhead Road, St. John's: I ask the question about expropriation. What expropriation means, land and housing taken, and I looked it up in the dictionary and it said, "for public service."

Mr. Frank Galgay, Teacher, Holy Cross School, St. John's: I am not a resident of the area but I am a teacher at Holy Cross School in the city and there are hundreds of students in that school from this area. I would like to quote a few facts. The whole idea of the Senate committee is on poverty and the whole investigation is on poverty. In January 1967, the provincial tax in Newfoundland was 28 per cent, in July 1969 the tax rose to 33 per cent and for the benefit of the senator from Alberta this tax is higher than all provinces except Alberta. Added on top of this high taxation, we have 7 per cent tax on car repairs, telephone bills, dry cleaning, and insurance. In Canada today we have the highest bank rate in its history. In 1967 the Canadian Consumer Index was 111.6, in 1969 the Canadian Consumer Index was 126.9, which is an increase of 10.1. In calculating this, $100 in 1967 is worth approximately $91.25 in 1969, so you can see that the value of the dollar as we progress is getting lower. Added to this in 1968 the Economic Council of Canada defined that anyone with no children would receive $1,500; two or less $2,500; three, four, or five in family $3,000 or $4,000.

I wonder if any statistics have been done to find out how many people on Blackhead Road are living below the poverty line. The students we have in school are concerned because if they cannot have proper facilities to study at home, it is bound to have an effect on their lives in school. Number two, we have to keep in mind many of their parents are and I happened to be, in my earlier days, a member of the poverty line. My parents were below the poverty line and I know what it is like to struggle. So my suggestions, as a teacher being in touch with the students every day, are:

1. I think if I could make a recommendation that the people in Ottawa get our message—that we in Newfoundland are one of the “have not” provinces east of Montreal or east of Quebec and it is essential that more funds be pumped into education if the students of the Blackhead Road are going to get an education comparable to the students of Montreal or the students out in Alberta. I think funds should be pumped into education, and I am well aware of federal funds pumped into education.

2. From speaking to me of these students the parents cannot afford to get into the ticky-tack houses of $4,000 to $5,000 for a piece of land and on top of that they are caught with $20,000 or $30,000 mortgages. They cannot do it. So the solution is low-cost housing, where people are not placed in the ghetto—in one huge apartment block where they will stay.

The two points again are, one, more federal funds to education so that the education of the students in this area is comparable to that of the rest of Canada, and two, the provincial and federal governments provide low-cost housing so that the people can assimilate in the community and that it will not happen again that they will become second-class citizens in the Urban Renewal Development of the Blackhead Road.

Miss Freda Berry, Social Worker, Medical Clinic, Memorial University of Newfoundland, St. John's: I have been visiting the homes of the unprivileged in Newfoundland and in this city during the past 21 years. I started visiting the homes in 1939 and in substantiation of what the last speaker said I wanted to give you some figures we have been working on recently. My research is on social problems and health, and social problems include health. I have the DBS figures for a low income for a family of five or more was less than $4,000 in 1961. In 1970 I have arrived at the figure after having visited many, many homes, not only on Blackhead Road but in other areas of Newfoundland. The average income for those people receiving allowances or doing casual labour or receiving unemployment insurance benefits for a family of five or more is $2,800 in 1970, as opposed to that level set at $4,000 in 1961 by DBS for Canada. In this year social assistance paid at full rate to a family of five is $2,460.

Now, I attempted to get some comparative figures from DBS and the only established figure I could get was the cost of food using Winnipeg as a base of 100. I was informed by the St. John's office that for every dollar one spends in Winnipeg, one must spend 96 cents in Toronto, $1.02 in Halifax, $1.00 in Ottawa, 99 cents in Edmonton, $1.01 in Charlottetown, 95 cents in Montreal, $1.01 in Regina, $1.01 in Vancouver, and $1.08 in St. John's. Now I inquired from DBS as to whether they could give me figures for clothing and all the other things that go into the cost of living. The statement I was given was that it was impossible. They could give me no other in St. John's, and I asked for the reason and was told they were not allotted sufficient funds to carry out research to arrive at these figures. So it is difficult to find out the cost of living here as compared to other provinces. DBS wants to and cannot. They have been asked by people doing research and cannot come up with it. I maintain our incomes are lower and our cost of living is the highest in Canada.

In all matters of health services we are at a deplorable level at present and I simply think that until we put a firm foundation of good services under our poor and underprivileged people they cannot begin to build a life of dignity and worth. I think the answer rests with a guaranteed annual income above the poverty level, to which serious thought is being given now, and also to indicate at the same time the problems of curbing greed on the part of some purveyors of life's necessities such as food, shelter and clothing. I have comparative prices of a item of children's footwear, overshoes actually of a certain type, purchased here in St. John's for $2.65 or something of that nature. In a bigger town they were cheaper and I thought this was agreed on the part of merchants. Now it is the aim of most people to improve their standard of living but this should not be done at the expense of the least fortunate and I must uphold everything said by the other speaker and they will make their way.

Mr. Barry: With all due respect to people who came up here, I have heard it said that you people came to get the gut issues. What Miss Burry said it all makes sense, it is perfectly true, but statistics you can get from DBS any old time.

The Chairman: It is up to you people.

Mr. James Williams, Member of the Executive, the Blackhead Road Householders' Union, St. John's: I would like to call on Tom Ryan of the Metropolitan Board as to the Urban Renewal Scheme.

Mr. Tom Ryan, St. John's Metropolitan Area Board, St. John's: I was not prepared for this. I have had some experience with the residents of this Hill. I lived in the west end all my life. I have been active on this Hill for a number of years on and off, in a number of capacities. The problems, as I see it on the Hill, as I read the opinion of the residents of the Hill. I know there has been $5 million spent on the Hill already, put into sewage systems in the streets to encourage residents with homes to put them into deeper debt and poverty than they are now in. The $5 million spent has good intentions behind it. Many more millions of dollars are needed but what it is doing is causing confusion among the people who came up on this Hill and had their own homes and then had a huge scheme thrust upon them with the purpose of helping them. It has helped them. It has caused complete distrust for authority and they have good reason to distrust certain authorities. They understood their land was expropriated but they didn't know that when you expropriate land the house goes with it. When they tried to get a court injunction to have the construction job stopped they found they could not get it because they were not homeowners.

The Chairman: Who were they—people who squatted?

Mr. Ryan: Their homes were expropriated from them.

The Chairman: Explain expropriation. Do you mean they put an order on freezing all the land?

Mr. Ryan: No, worse than that. The Expropriation Act of Newfoundland, by the mechanics of it, vested title to all land to the government and homes specified and everything in it to Her Majesty the Queen in the right of Newfoundland. In other words, the government became the owner of the property, the land, house, and everything thereon.

Senator Fournier: What act?

Mr. Ryan: The act of 1964 or somewhere around that time. The date of expropriation was July of 1967, I think, approximately around there.

Senator Carter: You say that originally the plan was to put in a sewage line.

Mr. Ryan: No sir, initially there was an interim report by an engineering company to do certain things on this Hill. This report was taken to the St. John's Metropolitan Board, a local authority, and they suggested that further studies be made. The result was what is known on the Hill as the "famous red book," the recommendation that a scheme be implemented here which could have in it water and sewage, paved roads and other things. It inferred in other ways that in all probability your homes will be hooked up to the street and you will get water and sewage and bathrooms in your houses. There was either a misconception in the minds of people or they either misunderstood what was explained. A home for a home or when the plan was completed they would not be out of pocket because of the plan, and I think I can get an answer here from the residents of the Hill.

Mr. Breen: When I was served the Notice of Expropriation all I got was a piece of paper and a lot of boundaries and lines northeast and southwest, etc., on it. To me it was like someone wrote it down in Chinese and I knew nothing about it. Before that a man knocked on my door and said how would I like water and sewage, and I said, "My God man who wouldn't want it." This is the way I was approached.

Senator Carter: This was talked about?

Mr. Breen: But not with me.

Senator Carter: It was a general plan, they were going to do something on the Hill. What was your understanding?

Mr. Breen: My understanding was this, a man came along to me and said. . .

Mr. Ryan: There were public meetings, remember, Gus? There were public meetings here, members of government and authorities who explained to the residents of the Hill the scheme. I will put the question to the residents of the Hill: Was it not the residents of the Hill's understanding that there would be a home for a home.

Residents of Hill: Right!

Mr. Ryan: And because of what is happening, because of improvements taking place which everyone is grateful for, in order to get what was promised they are going to have to go into debt, beg, borrow, and steal, in order to get what they had forty years ago when they moved up here. It is yet to be established as to who is going to pay for the hook-up to the houses. What good is the hook-up if there is no water and sewage facilities?

Senator Cook: Could the majority of houses, as they are now, be hooked up to water and sewage.

Mr. Ryan: As I understand it, the houses are from building line only. Once behind the building line it is not public property.

Senator Cook: What is the cost? The point is this, you are into heavy rock here. You have all sorts of problems. The Urban Renewal says $700.

Senator Carter: Do I understand if they remove these houses and build all new houses they still will not have water and sewage?

Mr. Ryan: Unless the people want to pay. Another problem, Senator Carter, is the fact that you have this mass confusion which goes on with regard to authority and who is responsible for what. There was a brief submitted in February of 1969. Mr. Galgay mentioned about low-cost housing, and a brief was submitted to the committee that a number of persons could be assisted in getting homes themselves. The people who put that together got an acknowledgement of it and nothing else.

Senator Cook: As I see it, the next step is a very formal step. You have a democratically-elected body and, as you say, things are beginning to happen, and I say you simplified the task of the authorities and strengthened your own hand by doing so. Maybe other things about the cost of hooking up land and houses to boundary lines might also be solved now that you have done this.

Mr. Harlick: I agree wholeheartedly with what Tom Ryan and Senator Cook have said. I put it in the form of a letter, sir. With your permission I would like to read it:

Sir, I wish a personal criticism, not of you or your committee, you both are performing your task with great faith and fervour. Nevertheless, during this study of poverty a definition of the word 'poverty' has not yet been defined.

We who can recall the period of the early thirties have an understanding of poverty in its raw state—soup kitchens and dole when people were suffering from diseases due to insufficient food, children clothed in rags, health and most public services non-operational. This is one meaning of poverty.

Here on Blackhead Road poverty must have a different meaning. Up here most of us own our homes and have land, where welfare services give us a base where absolute poverty is unknown. The gut of our problem here on Blackhead Road is twofold. One is the basic problem of unemployment (that missing job). The second part of the problem is housing and upgrading. This again is basic. Where are the dollars that are needed to upgrade our homes to meet the higher standards under the Urban Renewal Development?

The criticism that I want to make is how can you, as a committee, spend less than a week in this under-developed area and hope to get any understanding of the problems that arise. This, to my mind, sir, is an exercise in futility.

The Chairman: Mr. Harlick, may I reply to you on two counts. First, I will tell you something about poverty and the definition of it. We have been to five provinces and heard more than 100 briefs. We are not strangers to poverty and all its many faces. It is no different in Newfoundland. Perhaps it is a little more acute, but poverty is poverty. We on the committee have a pretty broad understanding of poverty. We knew something about it before we came here. Your minister, Mr. Neary, saw to that. We are not strangers to Newfoundland. We are here to listen. We have defined poverty very clearly as you may have seen if you have followed the record of our proceedings, and I redefined poverty in the Senate chamber on June 25. I pointed out that the definition of the Economic Council of Canada is:

Insufficient access to certain goods, services, and conditions of life which are available to everyone else and have come to be accepted as basic to a decent, minimum standard of living.

I further pointed out that the definition of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics is:

A basic assumption for the main set of estimates is that any family or individual spending more than 70 per cent of total income on food, clothing and shelter is in a low-income situation and likely to be suffering from poverty.

That is the one we accepted.

Now John Kenneth Galbraith comes up with a nicely-worded long definition. It sounds good but the basic one we need is the spending of 70 per cent on food, clothing and shelter. It is accepted generally and has proven to be so. We wish we found less of it than we have been able to find.

Mr. Harlick: I would like to have other people speak up because this may be the last time we will ever see a commission. But to get down to the gut issue, before this project started someone said that there is going to be an outbreak of bubonic plague. They did not say, "We will expropriate your land." They said, in fact, "We are going to expropriate your land, but we will justify it in this way. We are going to give you water and sewage because the very reason we are renewing your area is because you have the lack of this." This is why it was justified, so Blackhead Road could get water and sewage in the houses. No other reason to get it. Now it seems to be forgotten, someone is forgetting that very reason that this started—so that someone could have a toilet bowl in their homes and not a pail.

The Chairman: Did not anyone have a lawyer?

Mr. Harlick: No, at that time we were very naive.

The Chairman: Who took the case to court?

Mr. Ryan: It was a committee temporarily set up to get the householders organized.

The Chairman: Somebody said there was an attempt made before the courts.

Mr. Harlick: Someone said, "That is not your house."

The Chairman: At that particular moment if you had had a lawyer doing it, the lawyer would have said, "Let us see if that is his house or not his house."

Mr. Harlick: My point is this. If expropriation had been done for the sake of expropriation there would have been an outcry. Expropriation was done for a very good reason—to replace pails with toilet bowls. This has been forgotten and I wish I had someone up here to help me.

Mr. Cecil Warford, Member of the Executive, the Blackhead Road Household's Union, St. John's: We are all getting into poverty. Most of us on the Hill are in poverty because most of our people are not working. A good portion of our people—50 to 60 per cent—are stevedores. The people here in the R.C. Church here are not more than 4th grade. We do not have the education to do it. We need someone at the Canadian Manpower Centre to train the people on the Hill, like the adults on the Hill who are 32 years old or maybe up to 35 years or less. Get someone in to train these people.

The Chairman: If you wanted Manpower training, where would you have to go?

Mr. Warford: For me to go to get upgraded, I would either have to leave here to go to Bell Island or Stephenville and I have children and a house.

The Chairman: Nothing locally?

Mr. Warford: Well, they have one here on the Parkway, but in order to get upgraded we would have to go to the ones I mentioned, we cannot go to St. John's.

Mr. Breen: Mr. Warford just spoke of employment. I have been working steady for the past two years. I have my average income of $100.00 per week. Here in my hand I hold a summons. It is for the amount of $539.81, to me personally, Augustus J. Breen, which I owe the Great Eastern Oil in St. John's. With my $100 a week income I cannot afford to pay this sum due to the living cost to clothe my children. This is what our problem is. I am as poor as a church mouse, although I am making $100 a week with the company where I am working. I am supposed to be working, I am not supposed to be here tonight.

Senator Hastings: Why are you not supposed to be here?

Mr. Breen: Because I am supposed to be working. This is a lot of people's problem. Please God, I will pay it and if anyone wants to investigate it, I am in the Credit Bureau because my cost of living is so high, because I can't afford it. I wanted to get something around me and my family. I got married and I bought a house over the Hill for $500. Some people would say he bought a "shack" for $500. It was what I bought and no one could come and take it from me. While I have this "shack" any man here would be proud to walk into it for cleanliness and everything else, and for things around me, a washer to wash my clothes, I have a $50 TV set I bought in a second hand store. I have a chesterfield set in my home. I had to get it out on payments for my guests coming in and they are all working. Try as I may I can't get out of bloody debt and the only way is if I can win one of these commercials on cigarettes.

Mr. Ryan: I think there is one other point that should be made with regard to the concept behind this plan. It was intended that people get compensation for the excess land taken from them and turned into building lots. Now it was mentioned around that the Family Homes Expropriation Act was amended. That is a local act. It was to provide for extraordinary compensation for situations just like this on this Hill and instead of normal market value. Mr. Breen said he bought a house for $500. That would be normal value under the Expropriation Act. No provision was made for disruption, upheaval, or getting thrown out on the street, as was provided in the Family Homes Expropriation Act.

We had an incident here in St. John's, and legislation brought in that they would get extra compensation for it. Now, when this scheme went ahead the federal Government said, "We are not going to have the Expropriation Act amended because we cannot pay the expropriation that would be paid normally." Any person who has an expropriation notice served on his home is termed by some authority to be substandard. He will get $200 for his home, and that will not buy him a decent lot here on the Hill. This will not help him to get relocated.

The Chairman: Parliament recently dealt with the Expropriation Act, which is now one of the most enlightened acts in our country. We took the act and tore it apart. How did we get into the picture here?

Mr. Ryan: The situation was this. The interim report of this Urban Renewal Scheme, the red book, was sent to Ottawa for Ottawa's participation in this scheme. They were to pay a certain percentage of it. They had to approve it before they could be involved in the scheme. The residents of this Hill were deprived of extra compensation they would normally have gotten to eliminate some of the hardship they now know.

Mr. Walter Carter, Member of Parliament, riding of St. John's West: While I agree with Mr. Barry that this hearing should be restricted mainly to people in this area, I have the honour to represent St. John's West, part of which is Blackhead Road area. I want first of all to endorse the brief submitted by the Householders' Union to this committee and to ask the honourable senators to study the brief and to take back to Ottawa the message that the people of Blackhead Road are not content to be treated as second-class citizens, and that is how they have been treated. The people of the Blackhead Road Area have been treated like second-class citizens. I cannot think of any other people in Canada who would put up with what these people have had to put up with here in the past two years. I have brought this up in the House of Commons.

Like people in Alberta, the people of Blackhead Road are flesh and blood and have the same desires and the same worries that other people have. Just two or three weeks ago there were three houses bombed with boulders from a blast set off without being properly planned. Contractors show such a complete disregard for people it is unbelievable. Boulders came down through houses and there were pictures in the papers that homes were bombed by boulders. This is an infringement and they should not be expected to condone this treatment. I do not think that any other people in Canada would stand by and see this happen. There have been people's properties taken by the government under the guise of expropriation without paying the price or anything else. People were awakened in the morning to hear tractors going over their property without the courtesy of any warning at all.

This committee did not come here to hear about the Urban Renewal Scheme on Blackhead Road. You are here to hear our problems of poverty, and may I say from the people in St. John's West, we are glad to have you here and before you leave there will be a vote of thanks. Let us show it by our applause.

We did not invite you here tonight to nail your heads to the floor, to embarrass you people, but in this area there is a great need for dialogue with people in government. There is a great need for dialogue with relation to poverty. I would say, by and large, the majority of people living in this area are living below the poverty line. People making less than $70 a month are living in poverty. The people of Blackhead Road are here because they could not afford living in the city with the burden of taxes on their land, leases on their land, and so on. They moved here where they built their homes with flesh, blood and tears. They find themselves on the spot where they are asked to assume responsibilities for which they are completely unsuited. It is a great thing to put in water and sewage in the Blackhead Road area but it is another question how many people can afford it without going in debt; and, like Gus Breen said, they cannot afford to go in debt. They cannot afford to pay for bringing in water and sewage and that is why they are here—because they do not have the wherewithal to raise large sums of money. I think the least the people could have expected is that they would have been given a reasonable replacement value for their homes. It is not enough to expropriate Gus Breen for $500 and pay Gus Breen that amount, because I think the least people could expect, since his home is his castle just as yours or mine, and he cannot replace that home today for the amount it cost him initially. I think the people up here who had their homes expropriated under legislation that it should have assured them reasonable value for their homes.

I have a deep concern for the people of this area. My interest does not include membership in any exclusive golf clubs and I have known what it is like to live below the poverty line, like my friend Mr. Frank Galgay said here. I realize that a child who is hungry in Newfoundland suffers the same pain as a child who is hungry in Manitoba or in any other province. We have the lowest per capita income, we have the highest birth rate in Canada, sir. We have some very serious problems. Maybe the time is long gone with. You have heard five million words since this committee first held hearings. I think the time for talk is now finished. I leave it to you and your colleagues to take back to Ottawa. I think that five million words is quite a lot of talk.

The Chairman: We listened to five million words, I can tell you.

Mr. Carter: Well, I think from that five million words you get the message. I think the Government now should recognize this problem—stop administering aspirins and start administering some cures.

I want to make reference to a day when I came back from my riding. In one area we heard people talking about the moral fibre of our people wearing off, for what is happening when we find we have a situation where—I will probably be accused of being political but I would say the same if there were a Tory Government in Ottawa and when the Tory Government was in it probably existed—$5 million is being spent to throw a party in Japan. In a part of my riding where people are dependent on the fisheries I cannot get money enough to build a wharf. In one breath we hear a minister say that we cannot afford to build a stage in Admiral's Beach to enable fishermen to process fish to stay alive, yet under the same breath we hear of $5 million parties being thrown in Japan. Are we trying to kid ourselves or what? I can state examples in my riding. Austerity and inflation—these are words that are being plucked and used in Ottawa.

Committees, as we all know, file reports and your report cannot possibly get any action. It will take a year before you can compile your report and get it into the hands of the Government. I ask you to stop talking and I would ask you to go back to Ottawa and try to eliminate some of the problems affecting Newfoundland's people and the people of St. John's West. Ask the Prime Minister and his colleagues to tear up their golf membership cards and note that it is not a pleasant sight to see children who are hungry and who cannot get a decent suit of clothes to wear. Let us stop talking and you and your fellows go back to Ottawa and tell them that the people of the Blackhead Road Area are not content to be treated like second-class citizens. We need it now, not in six months time. We need it now. The Prime Minister and his Cabinet will recognize this and the people will have their homes, and long may your name be remembered, sir.

The Chairman: Mr. Carter, I appreciate very much what you said, but you know that we are looking for solutions and we would very much appreciate it if you would let us have any leads you might have so that we could take them back to Ottawa—any solutions you have which we could take back. If you have any ideas on that, please let us have them.

Mr. Carter: I have some. Your committee was commissioned by the Government and by the Senate to seek solutions—to seek problems and find solutions to them.

The Chairman: Mr. Carter, you appreciate it is not easy.

Mr. Carter: I agree.

The Chairman: This committee started to investigate about a year ago and invited every organization of any standing, having indicated that they wanted to, to come and be heard. They came and were heard and we visited five provinces and heard briefs. The problems vary somewhat, but poverty is poverty wherever you see it. While Parliament is having a holiday, men called Carter and Croll and their colleagues are out trying to find out all about poverty, and we are going to spend the next two months at it.

Now, poverty in its totality has never been studied in the history of this country. This is the first group to make such a study and our people have worked very, very hard at it. Solutions do not just come in a magic way, because poverty has many faces.

We have an obligation, and the five million words I have mentioned were from people concerned. Who are they? They are the churches in Canada. You name any organization. The farm organizations, the welfare organizations—they all wanted something to say about poverty. They have a contribution to make. Can you refuse to hear people like that? Of course you cannot. So, until we hear them and sit down and make our recommendations, there is nothing we can do.

When we set out on this task there were many on the committee who knew poorness—and knew it for a long time. Since we had the responsibility for providing a solution, we had to look at the welfare system. We had people out looking for solutions. We stated them publicly, and people generally agreed. When we started out on this journey there was talk about a minimum income on an equal basis for people in all parts of the country. No one understood it, but we had a discussion among Canadian people to point out where there is an understanding in Canada as to what it is all about. And in every province there has been an improvement in the welfare system as a result of their having to appear before us. Our task is not complete until we have heard all people who want to be heard.

Mr. Carter: We appreciate the fact that you are here. We hope your committee will take back a report to Ottawa and that we will get action. I think a check with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics will point out that in Newfoundland maybe 90 per cent of our people earn less than $4,000 or $5,000 a year. What I am saying is, we need some help for the people in the Blackhead Road area. I know that from this committee will come some research which will bring about action for this community.

Miss Eleanor Batten, Community Development Worker, Government of Newfoundland and Labrador: I am a community development worker with the provincial government. I would like to give you some examples of the poverty on Blackhead Road. For instance, Mrs. Cecil Bishop, with 11 in family—in that house they have to live from the 23rd of July to the 23rd of August on $195 a month for food for 11 people.

Then we have another man here, Mr. Leo Dillon, and he can tell you himself, he and his family (seven children, himself and his wife) have had $38 a week with which to buy food. This went on for about 11 months.

Then I know another person here, I shall not mention the name because she has asked me not to. There are six children in the family; their house has a kitchen and two bedrooms. The father and mother and the six children have to share two bedrooms. Their food order is even less than that of the Bishops.

Mr. Bishop is a stevedore and at the present time in St. John's, Furness Withy is the only firm employing stevedores. Mr. Dillon could not work because he had problems of eczema on his hands. He is a cook by trade.

In 10 weeks 75 per cent of the 2,000 people mentioned will be unemployed. In other words 75 per cent of the wage earners will be unemployed. Some social assistance payments go as low as $75 a month. I know, I have seen it.

I know another man, aged 81 with arthritis. He lives alone. I said, "Mr. Keough, what happens if you get sick in the night, do you have anyone who can come?" He said, "No." I asked him how much money he received. He receives old age assistance. If he gets someone to go to the store and he gives them $5, they will bring him back $4 without anything. In other words, they pocket $1 and that is all he hears of it.

I would like for the senators to ask some specific questions because I know a lot of people on Blackhead Road and I know a lot of the people present.

We have two terms in city welfare; long term assistance and short term assistance. With long term assistance, the recipient receives a cheque. The recipient of short term assistance receives a food order that varies with the size of his family.

I know one family, whose home leaks like a basket, when the rain comes. And in the winter you can skate on the floor, and it is not an exaggeration. We went down to the city welfare office to get some black jack to repair the roof. They would not give it to us because the woman living in the house was not the homeowner. She was in hospital several times. She went back in again because of the cold.

I know another case where three people were in a one bedroom house. Every time they plug in an electric appliance they get sparks, you turn the dampers up on the oil stove and it gets red hot and you don't know when it is going to blow up. The woman wanted to go to hospital and there was no one to look after her 11 children. I am sure there are people in this audience who can say just how much you can get from city welfare. How much will they pay you? They may pay $50 but if you go back and keep bugging them like I sometimes do you may get a few more dollars. Then some prospective tenants from this area were shown an apartment just a mile from here where you can go in and see a pile of human waste on the floor. You cannot see that on Blackhead Road. The homes may be small but they are clean.

Mr. William Druken, Resident, Blackhead Road, St. John's: I got a loan under the Veterans Land Act and bought a seven room house and in 1967 I was told by the Urban Renewal that the land was being expropriated. I have 26,223 square feet. They have had this half acre for two years and would not pay me one cent. I put a stop to it. I said that if they don't pay up I will close off the road, so in 1969 they set off an overloaded dynamite blast, blew the roof off the house and blew the side out of the house. Lundrigan's Insurance offered me $4,500. I went to the insurance company to collect $4,500 to repair the house. The insurance company told me I could not have the money, my house and land was being expropriated by the Minister of Public Works and I could get expropriation money. In the meantime, I am still paying DVA in St. John's, New Brunswick, on my house. It was bought under the Veterans Land Act and I have to pay $25 a month.

The Chairman: The Department of Veterans Affairs gave you your mortgage. They are not playing games with you at all. What you have to do with the provincial government in Newfoundland is another matter. You just protect your house by paying off your mortgage. Do not worry, the Department of Veterans Affairs will make sure you do not get a bum deal.

Mr. Williams: The Urban Renewal Scheme was supposed to be designed to help solve some of our problems. They took away our homes and lots and other things but all urban renewal means to me is the answer to a real estate man's dream.

Mr. Barry: Well the Department of Veterans Affairs have a lot of fringe benefits, yet how can I worry about a student from Jamaica getting an education and a lot of fringe benefits when the children on Blackhead Road cannot get an education. Put the money where it belongs with the citizens of Canada maybe that would do it. Maybe that is one answer.

Mr. Breen: I know you came here to listen to problems and try to seek solutions. Well I don't know them, and I know the average Joe doesn't either. We are hoping that you do. As long as you cut every man he bleeds red. Your task is a major one. There is one thing I want to say because Mr. Carter had something to say and before that Mr. Ryan was speaking. There is something I would like to know: how we will be helped by the scheme itself. There was a gentleman up here had a home it was expropriated. He was offered $4,000 for his property. He didn't think the deal was fair. He took it before an arbitration board and their finding was that his property was worth $7,600. But the arbitration was eventually overruled by a judge and the man ended up getting only $4,000 for $8,000 worth of property. So our famous Urban Renewal Scheme came along to help but instead of helping they got a judge to overrule the arbitration. So we are bucking them all over the place.

The Chairman: Mr. Breen and members of the Blackhead Road Community, first I want to congratulate you for getting together and taking action in a concerted way. Now you have a strength that you did not have individually. I congratulate you for taking this approach you have. It gives us great pleasure for in this communal way our fellow citizen can discuss with us, common problems that need a solution. We have been having that sort of experience across the country.

Tonight has been very useful to us. If you did not think that we knew that welfare here is the lowest in Canada, I can say that we know this and have brought it to the attention of Mr. Neary. We know what is going on and we know the need for jobs, the need for income, the need for future security. On the other hand you must realize also that Canadian people have a price to pay. Many are prepared to pay, others are reluctant to pay. We have to keep this in mind. Miss Berry gave 1969 figures of the poverty line. In our own way we can give you the 1970 figures. We know what the poverty line is. Where it was once $1,500 for a single person it is now $1,980, and it increases for others. We are desperately trying to find a solution. It will not be easy. The Americans have not found a solution. We are trying and hope to be successful.

You said you were thankful to us for coming here. We thank you for the opportunity of having an evening with you.

The Committee adjourned.

APPENDIX "A"

BRIEF

TO

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

BY DOROTHY WYATT

6 July 1970

St. John's, Newfoundland

POVERTY

1.1 Poverty can be defined as the absence of opportunity for the comprehensive development of the maximum potential of the individual. To restrict the definition to the economic would present a limited view. However, food and shelter are man's most basic needs and in our Canadian nation, we accept the premise that we buy our food and shelter for dollars and cents. The malnutrition which results from lack of money to provide food gives a prognosis of deficiency diseases with their lethal implications. Income certainly dictates our type of shelter and sets a forced adequacy on the individual and his family.

1.2 While this is the very real thing which is happening, health workers are busy preparing literature and dispensing evangelical directions on how to live. As a nurse, I have on many occasions discussed the merits of Canada's Food Guide with people who had a very reduced income. Maybe I even though I helped them with information as to how to modify their diet to make it as nutritious as possible but they went back to their homes and no one had the time to follow it up.

1.3 Often these people had not received the value of intensive direction in schools because educators are forced into a ritual of eighteenth century importance. We continue to produce generation after generation of school attenders who on empty stomachs have been subjected to the value of the Reformation or the history of World War One and they emerge from these institutions not merely knowing about the problems of automation but without the knowledge of how to live.

1.4 I, too, have been, may I say, guilty of telling people about the importance of washing their hands before meals and after using the toilet. This does seem a little ironic in an urban area where night carts and water trucks provide the only water and sewage facilities for the residents. These same children who learned about the open sewers from their history books can see them any day outside their own homes in areas within the city of St. John's.

1.5 Let us not forget the people who are forced, due to restricted income, to live in overcrowded, inadequately heated, leaky homes rented from the affluent society or absentee landlords who remain anonymous and lay the blame on rental agencies.

1.6 Thus, I suggest, that poverty should have an economic priority in its interpretation. I contend that cultural poverty, social and psychological poverty are in direct proportion to the economic status of the individual or family. To clarify, how can an individual pursue cultural activities in the concrete sense without the admission fee? Socio-psychological poverty as a consequence of economic poverty results in the implications of the poverty label we affix to those who finally arrive at the top of a waiting list of thousands on the subsidized housing rosters and are the beneficiaries of togetherness. Of course we get very humanitarian and suggest row-housing in lieu of high risers.

1.7 As far as political perspective is concerned, these conditions are often the ticket of elected or appointed people who should have at least a priority of unity of purpose in improving the conditions of those less economically fortunate and this priority should supersede the philosophy of a particular party which often grossly deviates from the concept of man as man. How can a national program undertake to eradicate or reduce poverty when the British North American Act restricts a national approach. The very matters which are the priority of the provinces are the areas where a concerted effort must be made. What about the poor provinces? In Newfoundland, we cannot pay the cost of our poor. DREE is commendable but will not solve the regional disparity.

1.8 Let us not fool ourselves. Individuals cannot, and indeed should not, be solely responsible for the total approach to improvement. As an elected politician, certainly I face the restrictions of real and imagined priorities. I believe all politicians and officials are concerned about the problems of the poor and they are sensitive to the realism of the situation but they are restricted by the very nature of the buck-passing system of our various levels of government. While we determine which level should assume the responsibility of the cost of the poor, people get discouraged with their present politicians and look to the next promiser who will find himself in the very same situation but during this time, people will be hungry and they will continue to live in increasingly substandard housing.

1.9 I suppose the most pertinent question here is: Can I hope that as one more avenue, this avenue of a special Senate Committee on Poverty—can some conclusions be implemented? Gentlemen, I congratulate the instigators of this idea but I doubt if any one of you will discover any great poverty mysteries and frankly the recommendations and conclusions from these meetings will have difficulty surviving the priorities of even the next few years.

(b) 1.1 No one has the answer as to the extent of poverty in Canada. We have statistics on the number of people receiving incomes below the classical designated figure, the number of people receiving social assistance and Workmen's Compensation, but where are the statistics for the proud poor—that is the people who have always been able to manage strictly through good use of resources but do not have any additional resources to meet the increased cost of living but are too proud to seek assistance.

1.2 What about the people who receive inadequate pensions whether this be through employment or veterans' allowances, blind allowances or pay-us-not-to-grow-wheat allowances, etc.? How do they manage? How many of them are there? What about the people who do not need these allowances?

1.3 From a demography point of view, one can predict that poverty will increase in the urban areas because of the mobility trend from rural to urban. It can also be expected to increase in the non-skilled labor force as automation accelerates unless opportunities for retraining are enhanced. If natural resources are not developed, there will be an industrial poverty and even a poverty of the affluent who, after all, provide for those who have not. Women will be destined for the poverty roles at a more accelerated pace than men. Provinces such as Newfoundland still authorize women to subsidize the economy by not having Equal Pay for Equal Work and Human Rights legislation. This contributes to the cause of poverty in this province.

1.4 The current psychology of advertising is also a cause of poverty. Indiscriminate distribution of credit cards appeals to those in need and affects the poor more than the rich. Such a theme as You Can't Afford to be without this deluxe washer meets agreement with the needs. Perhaps they make one payment and then the store confiscates the items.

B. 1.1 So these are some of the causes. What are the solutions? There are no magic answers but there can be dimensions to our perspective.

1.2 It is my considered opinion that the determination of how to solve the poverty problem will not come from briefs. Oh yes, we are aware of the surface problem but let's ask the poor people how to solve it from their point of view. Then we can evaluate the resources for correction. I also believe that we should be visiting the poor this morning and talking with them instead of about them. The approach we are using is somewhat analogous to the traditional missionary appeal or the foreign aid approach of some countries. I appeal to you to spend a day with the Public Health Nurses, Social Workers and Clergy of Canada and spend a day with the educators of our youth. They, gentlemen, could make you aware of the realism of poverty.

1.3 Since you are visiting Newfoundland, you should know that conditions have improved here since we became part of the family, Canadian nation. Baby bonus, old age pensions and medicare have improved our situation. We continue to emulate our Canadian counterparts and we educate for the job but not the man. I make a plea for education to be left for the educators not the politicians. Somewhere in our curriculum let us provide information to show our young how to care for family. Boys and girls marry younger but how many know how to care for a baby? This information may not be available in the homes and this approach could be a positive step.

1.4 Let us give up the idea that a university attains its status from the number of published papers and the impressive lists of research projects pursued in the institution. Let us get those highly educated professors back with the first-year students who need all the help they can get. Maybe then we can reduce the dropout statistics and students can receive the comprehensive approach which universities advocate.

1.5 Health education should be given a high priority with the media. In the struggle to meet Canadian content, let us use this avenue to demonstrate how families can use their resources wisely and baby care could replace some of the conflicts of marriage displayed on the afternoon programs.

1.6 What is the answer to hunger as we continue to dump fish in our harbours and wheat sits in the barn or even that people are paid not to grow? Why can't this be sold at cost with positive subsidies instead of the negative approach we seem to have?

1.7 Gentlemen, we know that a cheque will not solve all problems. Some people need to be sent a daily food order with a menu. They should not be condemned but they need guidance with planning. This could be helped by the media and also health workers who spend years preparing for their professions and have to do elaborate paper work which could be more adequately done by capable clerks and secretaries. Talking and guidance takes time but it is this man-to-man communication which is the very essence of need in the poorer groups.

1.8 Perhaps the reason why many people resort to social assistance is that wages offered leave little motivation for seeking employment. Where the minimum wage gives equivalent remuneration with social assistance, would you do otherwise?

1.9 To halt the destiny of women arriving on the welfare or poverty roles earlier, Equal Pay for Equal Work legislation would help. Human Rights legislation should be proclaimed in this province.

1.10 Pollution can make us poverty stricken if we are to alleviate the problem. Let's face it—industry does not have a humanitarian purpose in establishing. They elect to establish in an area to make money. Gentlemen, it is time industry paid for pollution out of the profits. A hundred jobs now with the inherent cost of pollution should be viewed with long-term economic results. This would prevent the poverty of the cost of pollution which our children will have to absorb in health and economic costs. The St. John's Harbour is polluted and the cost of correction is beyond the ability of its citizens to pay. Down here in this part of the country we don't understand why the Bonaventure cost so much to refit when she was slated for retirement. The war situation did not change that much in a few years. We think we could have used the money to help some of our sewage problems.

1.11 What about housing? In a nation where it is noble to give but shameful to receive, we tend to move the poor to a designated locality complete with label. We may call it subsidized housing or we may even have land assemblies where the latter can reside if they can get adequate loans and mortgages. Where are the forty-year mortgages contemplated ten years ago in economic circles? The down payment on a home is the major barrier for many families in acquiring one. Let us enhance a man's dignity by permitting him a choice of location—all he needs is the financing. Let us not make an exclusive street of shell housing. The final result of a man's personal labor and initiative would be equivalent to that expended by his neighbour who can afford a contractor. We have examples of shell housing in St. John's where men produced their homes by sheer ability. This continues to be evident in the rural areas as well and it should be encouraged.

1.12 Let us have an association for housing problems. I mean one with real authority to it—that is a combined authority working together. City, Province, Federal and people with problems should serve together. Standards should be easy to define. Frankly, I am suspicious of any home which rents for $50.00 or less per month. Could it be that $50.00 is the amount acceptable to welfare authorities who are attempting to house an increasing population with inadequate funds? If houses are leaky or firetraps, do we need a Royal Commission to correct this? Let us expose the owners who often use this avenue as a means of making money. Let them shed their anonymity they now enjoy under their use of a rental agency. How many people leave the city and ask a rental agency to collect rents without leaving any money for necessary repairs to homes? People across Canada have taken action through tenant associations. All levels of government should be giving this leadership. We wouldn't need tenant associations if all politicians were doing the job for which they were elected.

1.13 It has been projected that there will be increased mobility from rural to urban. Therefore, I would suggest that cities be given additional federal funds to help with providing services. A generation ago, Canadians thought rail, boat and plane transport were necessary but now we need to consider rural to urban and within urban transportation. Federal help is also needed with the provision of extensive water and sewage services. If Canadians are moving to the cities then it stands to reason that more federal money should be allocated to the cities.

1.14 Old age, Workmen's Compensation and veterans' allowances need to be increased in accordance with the cost of living. This province rates high in that we have the lowest salaries and the highest cost of living in Canada. We need help with school construction and let's be realistic and not look to the churches. The church funds have diminished greatly perhaps primarily due to the major economic expense they have sustained through the years. We need bursaries for high school and university students. Many now must seek employment early. Let us dispense with the motto of Stay in School as philosophy when people who fail in an out-dated examination must beg for readmission due to lack of space. Down here we don't care if the federal government calls it DREE as long as it's reasonably FREE. The simple fact is that we cannot afford to meet the cost of educating an increasing population. We have restricted facilities for the disadvantaged children and adults. How can we talk about comprehensive development of a man's potential if we cannot even provide the space for even custodial education?

1.15 Provinces such as Newfoundland need not have a stigma from accepting national help. Many Newfoundlanders work in Ontario and contribute to the wealth of the Province. In fact, this mobility which is increasing is one thing which makes us a nation.

1.16 Perhaps the best answers would come from the poor and the affluent sitting down together in man-to-man communication. Until the people who want and the people who pay understand each other, then man exists under his label of affluent or poor but not in terms of man as man. Politicians and officials should work together doing their thing. Right now, one level of government does not know about tentative plans being formulated by other levels of government. Where is the political communication in a communication era?

1.17 Man and his resources should be the theme of the war on poverty. Surely if man can go to the moon and Saskatchewan can build a mountain, we can plan to reduce poverty in the definition which I have used in this brief, i.e., the absence of opportunity for the comprehensive development of the maximum potential of the individual. I have brought my exhibits with me here this morning. These people have some of these problems and look to you for some solution to their situation.

Respectfully submitted,

Dorothy Wyatt, B.A. B.Ed. B.N. R.N.

APPENDIX "B"

A Submission to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty

by the

St. John's Club
Canadian Federation of University Women

The St. John's Club of the Canadian Federation of University Women appeals to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty to consider in their report ways and means of financing projects undertaken by groups of concerned citizens or organizations to help in the war against poverty, particularly projects which involve the co-ordination of several different types of services, and so do not clearly fall within the domain of any single government department, and with special consideration of the needs of the have-not provinces so dependent upon Federal assistance.

One aspect of the antipoverty campaign in the U.S. was the implementation of a new concept in government service, Project Head Start, a comprehensive programme of education, medical care, social services and nutritional aid to give pre-school children from disadvantaged backgrounds, and their families, help which they need. The St. John's Club feels that a comprehensive programme of a Head Start type may have merit in Canada also. Such a programme should be designed to enable the children of the poor, through medical care, family counselling and community awareness, and a carefully planned nursery or child development programme, to participate more fully in, and receive greater benefit from, the formal educational process. Federal funding for such programmes would make it possible to provide this preventative service on a nationwide basis.

The St. John's Club has recently embarked upon a Head Start type project, which is described in the accompanying brief, presented to the Senate Committee, but prepared as part of an application for a demonstration project grant from the Department of National Health and Welfare. We are encountering difficulties in obtaining financial support for this project precisely because it is a comprehensive programme involving the co-ordination of social work, medical and educational services. There seems to be some question as to whether such projects which involve education as one of several components can receive financial support from federal sources.

From our experience in this project, and from our study of current, relevant literature, the trend of thought nowadays, not only in

Head Start specifically, but also in respect to day care generally and other welfare fields, is that close co-operation of education and welfare services is imperative if a truly effective, preventative service is to be offered to people of the lower income groups.

We feel that concerned citizens, working through private organizations or agencies, recognizing a need for community involvement, could contribute much to a national effort to enable the poor to develop their own resources, and that by so doing they would also foster in the community a change in attitude towards these people through a meaningful understanding and appreciation of their strengths and needs. Many such organizations simply do not have the financial resources to implement these projects, and in provinces such as Newfoundland must look for financial aid other than through the provincial treasury.

Since education is strictly confined to provincial jurisdiction, any attempt to provide comprehensive services combining certain aspects of education with welfare, are bound to meet with difficulties in securing Federal financial aid. We would therefore appeal to the Senate Committee to explore ways in which channels for funding such comprehensive projects may be opened to make federal funds available for worthwhile projects of this nature.

We therefore recommend the following:

1. that channels for obtaining federal funds to finance comprehensive projects particularly those involving co-ordination of services in certain aspects of education with welfare, be sought;
2. as in the U.S., so in Canada consideration be given to federal financing of Head Start type projects, involving other services as well as Child Development, on a nationwide basis;
3. that a directory of funding agencies be compiled and made readily available, clearly stating the areas of service or research which may be financed through each government department or private institute (e.g. Vanier Institute of the Family) so that organizations wishing to sponsor or operate a project do not have to expend energies in a search for funds which would be better used directly in the project.

We would also like to take this opportunity to make the following comment:

Basic to all work with the poor is the attitude which motivates our efforts. A true attitude of respect involves the anticipation of give and take. With 'disadvantaged people' this tends to break down with the expectation of the giving being all on one side and the taking all on the other. Such assumptions lead us to respond to individuals who, while poor, share the middle class orientation and whom we therefore see as being able to help their people learn what we know they need to learn or acquire what we know they need to acquire. Such people may in fact not share at all in the aspirations of the community they are expected to 'lead'. The current rebellion of black peoples against the negro leadership accepted by white society is a clear expression of this type of problem.

Five Per Cent Helped Turn the Trick

FOREWORD

In addition to a more traditional role in adult education, the Extension Service of Memorial University of Newfoundland has a direct involvement in community development and social change in the Province and is charged by the University with a responsibility for that. In this respect it is unlike most other University Extension Services in Canada. It has had, since 1959, a number of field representatives living in rural areas throughout the Province, attempting to assess, with the people, ways in which the social and economic condition of Newfoundlanders could be improved, while preserving Newfoundland's cultural heritage. Citizen's self-help organizations have been actively promoted and encouraged by the Extension Service, and these community and regional development associations now provide a basic structure through which local people can work together with governments, private organization and other institutions. The Extension Service helps by making available short courses and workshops throughout the Province dealing with community leadership, organizational techniques, the functions of government, and means of access to its services, and training in planning. These workshops attract hundreds of disadvantaged Newfoundlanders who wish to have a more obvious stake in effecting change.

The Extension Service has a staff of specialists in St. John's and resident adult educators in rural Newfoundland including the Labrador Coast, the St. Barbe Coast, the Port au Port Peninsula, Notre Dame Bay and Fogo Island, the Burin Peninsula, Central Newfoundland and the Avalon Peninsula. Extension representatives work in close and constant contact with residents of these areas, helping them to prepare themselves to take a more active role in self-help programs, in rural development associations and in comprehending ways and in acquiring skills to assist governments and other institutions in planning and development.

The Extension Service also produces, during winter months, a weekly regional network television series called "Decks Awash." The series appears on prime viewing time, and contains information for fishermen designed to help them to function more efficiently in their trade and as citizens.

Regional conferences are frequently sponsored by the Extension Service throughout Newfoundland and Labrador to consider development possibilities and strategies. At these conferences, local people are given the opportunity to hear and to question people who are expert in resource development, transportation and communications, planning, education, and government programs. All told, this part of the Extension's program involves thousands of residents of the Province to whom no other source is available for such service.

For many in remote parts of the Province, these activities represent the only point of contact of consequence they have with the world outside their community. The Extension Service operates on the principle of total accessibility to all residents of the Province, and is rightly regarded by them as neutral ground on which people of diverse and conflicting points of view can meet.

The Extension Service is involved with the very poor; frequently, also, with people in leadership positions in communities which need direct government assistance. They are citizens who need to be heard, who have something to say and who want to be allowed to participate in planning policies and programs which will affect them. They are frustrated by what appears to them to be highly manipulative strategies imposed on them; they become increasingly resistant to an alien world which ignores their experiences and knowledge in the planning, designing and implementation of programs which drastically affect their lives. They are the pathetic product of a society in which communication has almost failed them.

Of some significance in relation to the work of this Senate Committee, Extension Service staff have experience in working with the poor in Arctic Canada, Alaska and the southern and western United States. Some Extension workers are deeply involved, on a daily basis, in the life of rural Newfoundland, which suffers from some of the extremes of some sorts of poverty.

INTRODUCTION

The Material in this Brief is made on the basis of first-hand observations by members of the staff of the Extension Service of Memorial University of Newfoundland. It reflects experience in dealing with the rural deprived, not only in Newfoundland but in other parts of North America. It is acknowledged that the Brief fails to touch on some of the more easily identifiable and measurable dimensions of poverty; nor does it attempt to describe the conditions which have caused Newfoundland people throughout the period of European settlement to live under constant hardship and frequent deprivation. Statistical data exists which illustrates vividly the difficulties which today face Newfoundland and its people in many ways. Such data has been included in other Briefs presented to the Committee, and it will not be repeated here.

It is this data which serves as the basis for continuing attempts by governments to develop remedial programs. We know that in many ways governments are attempting to combat diverse manifestations of social and economic malaise. We are aware, also, of the difficulties in determining needs, balancing priorities, conceiving, introducing, and administering development programs and of evaluating the results. We believe most emphatically that a root and basic cause of poverty is an economic one. We are not convinced it is the only one, or that enough attention is being paid to the myriad and complex evidences of poverty which are not directly economic ones, but which are equally vicious and debilitating causes. We are concerned that cost-benefit analysis has become the only standard of measurement for far too many bureaucrats concerned with elimination of poverty, or regional disparity, or rural redevelopment. As long as they fail to be aware that poverty involves human beings who have dignity, values, aspirations and rights and that the elimination of poverty is dependent on full acknowledgement of those qualities, Canada will not be successful in whatever attempt she makes to eliminate deprivation. For the poor will always wonder—Who are the Deprived?

Who Decides Who's Poor?

It is the dimensions of the traditions, cultures, and values so evident in the total fabric of the nation which may stand in the way of early solution to poverty in Canada, for poverty is different things to different people who do not, in this country, know one another well. The measurement of poverty to the Economic Council of Canada may well be applicable in the urban centres of Canada, in the centres of power and population. Yet these same standards which are applied nationally often have little validity in a Newfoundland outpost even in straight economic terms. Many rural Newfoundlanders falling on the economic borderline of poverty as defined by the Economic Council of Canada would be offended by being described as poor, and do not believe that they are. Most own their own homes, pay no local taxes, supply some of their foodstuffs and often much of their fuel, and have the benefits of excellent subsidized programs of higher education for their children. They, like the people of rural Quebec, have lengthy traditions and solidly rooted values which provide a richness to life not usually associated with poverty.

Yet in some vital respects they are poor, for their local experience and knowledge have not been sought as a matter of practice in the development of remedial government programs for rural Newfoundland. They have not been encouraged to understand power through organization, they have suffered from the debilitating effects of a primary and secondary education program with substantial defects built into it, and they are frequently without adequate information on which to make basic decisions about the direction their lives can take. There has been, and is, a strong feeling in much of rural Newfoundland that there has been far too little knowledge in Ottawa of the realities of the problems of rural areas of the Province, or of the factors which influence the ways rural people think and act here.

A Nation of Neglect

All these are manifestations of poverty—but a reflection of the Poverty of whom? Certainly it is a direct reflection on the ability or the desire of the nation to overcome poverty when in one Newfoundland community within a recent winter three people died when no medical help could be obtained because the community had no form of telecommunications with the outside world. It is the poverty of the nation when communities in Newfoundland have no teachers for years or when citizens who cannot receive state-financed radio are aware that the public broadcasting corporation finances colour television. It is a poverty of the nation when one large piece of the territory of this Province is never shaded in on federal maps indicating rural areas for development under Federal programs, perhaps in the hope those areas and their inhabitants will continue to bury themselves under the silence of their poverty until they disappear. It is poverty for the whole nation if children in this Province go to schools which have no programs of art, music, or organized sports. It is poverty for Canada if the fishermen of this Province and this region are so unorganized that they do not have a single telephone in Ottawa through which to participate with the Federal Department of Fisheries in developing rational programs of fisheries expansion. It is poverty for Canada if the majority of Canadians do not understand that most of the poor here want employment and strongly resist the loss of sense of purpose that comes with acceptance of welfare.

Canada is a poor nation if it provides funding only for technical or vocational education for its poorer adult citizens and fails to support social education to equip its citizens to be more effective with a sense of involvement in the society in which they live.

We believe that Canada has it well within her power to eliminate poverty in all its dimensions and that it could be concerned with doing so. We also think that lack of awareness by Canadians of the reality of poverty, or national indecisiveness in dealing with it, will leave a heritage of anger, frustration and hostility which is much in evidence elsewhere. The remedies later will be far more costly, far less certain of effecting cure.

COMMUNICATIONS

We have stated that the rural poor are the pathetic product of a society in which communication has almost failed them. It is on this premise that we recommend that the Committee consider improved communication a vital and critical need of the poor.

We fully support the recent recommendation of the Task Force on Government Information that the Government of Canada develop 'a greater sensitivity to the information needs of the unreached... that high priority be given to the problems of communicating with these individuals and groups of citizens currently outside of, or unaffected by, the main-stream of Federal Government information.'

However, in our opinion, this recommendation falls short of what should be the vision not only of the Federal Government, but of the nation, as it recommends no more than that which is the basic right of all Canadians, rich or poor, to be fully informed of national policies and directions and to be aware of the spectrum of Canadian life in all its richness.

But there is a higher priority, a more urgent need if Canada is to remain a restful nation, the need for a Government to recognize that it must also provide through communication and information the opportunity for the 'unreached' to communicate their hopes and aspirations so that their real needs become the concern of those in the centres of power.

Who Receives Information?

The poor receive less information of real importance to them than any other group of citizens. Their opinions are sought less than any other segment of society. People are poor, we submit, if they are not well informed about matters of vital and personal concern to them; they are poor if a blind and uncaring bureaucracy planning for the manipulation of their lives, ignores them, and is able to get away with it.

In most of Canada the devices for exchanging or obtaining information are easily accessible to all citizens—telephone, broadcast television, government offices, frequent and regular mail deliveries, public libraries, broadcast radio, daily newspapers, magazine racks and book stores. This accessibility to information allows citizens to make real choices about the directions they will take in their lives and provides opportunities for them to expand and diversify their interests and goals. But these sophisticated services and facilities, taken so much for granted by most Canadians, are a myth to many on the coast of Labrador, where people have been ignored in terms of information in as callous and miserable fashion as even the most isolated resident of the Canadian Arctic.

There has not yet ever been a serious attempt in Canada to provide, through our public broadcasting service, the kind of educational and informational programs the poor need. We have naively or maliciously proceeded on the assumption that what is au fait in Toronto is what is best for and needed by other English-speaking Canadians. There is virtually nothing from middle-class Toronto and almost nothing from Ottawa that gets through or means much to the truly desperate citizens of the Labrador Coast—and there is virtually nothing of the Labrador Coast that ever gets through to disrupt the comfort of the Ottawa planning office.

Getting information, educational opportunities and communications to the rural poor is often very costly—so is receiving information from them, especially when that information tells of inhuman neglect, and callous lack of concern. In their collective wisdom, governments and their agencies have believed it better to turn the communication dollars where they will be noted by most. We wonder if it has not sometimes struck the rural poor as funny that they do not receive adequate broadcasting and television service because broadcasting money has to go for coverage of the Olympic games in Mexico or to provide better competition for American stations beaming into our heaviest populated areas.

It is a cause for shame in Canada that scores of thousands of our poor are without any public television service. Why should the poor of the Labrador Coast feel grateful that only recently were they able to hear publicly-owned Canadian radio? Should an employee of General Motors feel grateful for the bonus of a mule at Christmas when his fellow workers all receive a Cadillac?

An Opportunity for Improved Communications

We are aware of plans for satellite television which would enable remote Canadians to receive general broadcast television, but we do not believe that in itself it will meet the special immediate and regional information needs of citizens in more isolated areas.

An experiment has begun recently in Newfoundland which may well point the direction to substantially improved communications with and for the unheard in this Province, with wide potential application in other parts of mid-Canada and the Northwest Territories.

Recently the Extension Service was requested by CBC Newfoundland Region to assist in the preparation of a television series about the Labrador Coast. It would not, of course, be broadcast to the Labrador Coast, for nobody provides television service to there. As payment, the Extension Service requested and received permission to 'dub' 1/2" video-tapes of certain other CBC television programs which it believed would be of interest to residents of Coastal Labrador, none of whom receive television. The tapes are compatible with equipment used in communications development by the University's Coastal Labrador Representative. As a result, people on the coast of Labrador are now seeing television there for the first time. Further video-tape equipment is to be placed in at least two other coastal Labrador communities this summer by Extension, under a grant from the Department of Communications, permitting a bicycling of programs between communities. Of even more importance, perhaps, the equipment will be used to present programs of social, technical and vocational education specially designed for the Coastal Labrador audience. Finally, a small inexpensive TV camera will be placed in these communities to enable them to record on video-tape matters of interest to other communities along the Coast and such video-tapes will be exchanged.

It is our strong belief that because of the simple technology of VTR equipment and its relatively low cost, a new and dynamic tool can be designed to provide an important device for effective communication for the rural poor.

Recommendation

The Federal Government, through the Department of Communications, should provide funds to needy communities in mid-Canada and Northern Canada which do not receive broadcast television. The funds would be used to provide a 1/2" video-tape camera deck, monitors and tapes to each such community for three purposes: to receive VTR's of select CBC television programs to be played in community halls; to provide a means for the types of adult education so desperately needed in the more isolated communities of Canada; and to provide an important means of inter-community communications.

ORGANIZATION—A REMOVAL FROM POVERTY

One of the most apparent, all-pervading senses of injustice in rural Canadian life is a feeling of the impossibility of rural people making any meaningful decision about their future in rural Canada. The Canadian Council for Rural Development has repeatedly pointed this out in relation to Canadian farmers. It has been equally true for many of the people of rural Newfoundland.

It is governments which are providing the greatest impetus to rural change—they are providing new subsidies or withdrawing old ones from primary producers; they are implementing plans for resettlement and centralization; they are making decisions about who should do what and where and how. It is natural that rural people, under these circumstances, should direct their concern, and some of their animosities toward governments, which have done so little to inform people before the fact of new development programs, or even more important, to involve them in the whole developmental planning process. At the same time rural people (and in Newfoundland most such people fall within the Economic Council of Canada's definition of poverty, here have probably not been aware that governments find it difficult to solicit advice and opinions from unorganized masses of citizens.

A lack of real citizen involvement has long been one of the negative aspects of life for the rural people in Newfoundland. This characteristic has been manifest in the dearth of local governments; it has been, until very recent years, evident in the lack of regional organizations concerned with social and economic improvement.

Within recent years there has been a significant growth in regional development associations in Newfoundland, comprised of local fishermen, farmers, teachers, businessmen, co-operative producers and others. They have provided not only a voice for the needs of their regions, but a device through which governments can work to ameliorate regional problems. There are now 19 such organizations in the Province and they have recently combined in the Newfoundland Labrador Rural Development Council. Their leaders are men of intense dedication, occupying their positions of responsibility often at devastating personal sacrifice. Membership fees are a pittance, enabling the poorest families to join and participate. While this has ensured the possibility of very broadly-based membership, it has meant that voluntary councils, representative of the people of rural Newfoundland, and representing their needs, have inadequate operational funds.

They have avoided, almost without exception, the pitfalls of commitment to a specific political doctrine. They have been refused information and have sometimes been summarily dismissed in attempts at serious negotiation. But they are determined that they will be allowed their right to participate in regional development in a meaningful and important way.

In order to do so, the Newfoundland and Labrador Rural Development Council needs financial assistance with which to hire a competent executive director and an adequate research staff. It should be expected to provide travel funds for its own members and salaries for clerical staff.

Recommendation

The Department of Regional and Economic Expansion should substantially increase its grant to the Canadian Council for Rural Development for the express purpose of allowing CCRD to provide grants to deserving provincial councils for rural development. Such grants would be adequate to cover salaries and operating expenses for an executive director and research assistant for each provincial council, which in turn would be responsible for payment of clerical staff.

RESIDENTIAL CENTRE

There has been much emphasis on government educational planning to provide greater mobility to citizens through substantially increased opportunities for vocational and technical upgrading. In Newfoundland thousands of citizens have attended vocational schools and the College of Fisheries. There is a justifiable necessity and such training is unquestionably leading to greater employability for many who go through it. But it in no way eliminates the need to educate the citizen as well as the citizen-worker. The poor suffer from more than lack of employment opportunities, and employment opportunities alone will not eliminate poverty. What is needed is the opportunity for the poor to be exposed to the massive alternatives available to the non-poor in Canada. Opportunities for education in humanity, in residential centres for continuing learning, must be made available to the poor, and not just to the organized, non-poor.

In Canada organized groups make use of such facilities in such places as the Banff School of Fine Arts and the Institut Desjardins. These groups pay economic rates established for the use of Centre facilities, and they are financially capable of doing so. The poor cannot afford to do so. Not only are the poor unable to pay for the use of such facilities but they are less likely to be able to articulate the needs such a Centre could meet for them, and would be perhaps totally unwilling to invest any of their meagre incomes in formalized learning of any kind.

Obviously government financial support is required to provide the rural poor with an opportunity to acquire the kind of skills they are now indicating they want—the understanding of individual opportunities; skill development to perform in responsible positions on local organizations; the strategies of planning; techniques for being heard; budgeting, home-making, exposure to the arts, basic business skills, co-operative training, and many other things that are learned best in short, residential workshops.*

Recommendation

The Federal Government should make available funds for construction of residential centres for continuing education and for appropriate operating budgets to enable the unorganized and the unreached to participate in education for social development.

*Additional and specific information and recommendations exist in a Report on a Proposed Residential Centre for Adult Education in Newfoundland, ARDA Project No. 20024 prepared by the Extension Service, Memorial University of Newfoundland, October, 1968.

APPENDIX "A"

Five Per Cent Helped Turn the Trick

The Senate Committee on Poverty is to visit Fogo Island as part of its tour of Newfoundland. For that reason it may be useful for them to have some observations made by people who are in a sense outsiders but who have had a very direct involvement for some years with the people of Fogo Island. The Extension Service of Memorial University has been deeply committed to working with the people of Fogo Island in helping to effect the changes which they have demanded as a right. In adopting this position, we have gained the enmity of some bureaucrats and some politicians, especially in Ottawa, who have been convinced that places like Fogo Island have no place in the new Canada. We do not believe that Fogo Island needs to be unique—but as long as the rural deprived have no faith in their ability to get things done no matter what hazards and hostilities appear to stand in the way, it may remain an unusual example.

In 1967, which in many ways marks a turning point for Fogo Island, there was a genuine and evident feeling of despair among most of the residents there. An outline of the history of previous attempts at inter-community co-operation on Fogo Island appears in "The Co-operative Movement in Newfoundland"—an ARDA study of co-operative organization from the viewpoint of Industrial and Social Development—numerous references—by Donald Snowden.

In poor rural communities rumour and gossip are an every-day part of community living. The rumours were strong on Fogo Island that the Federal Government despaired of Fogo Island offering any economic future to its residents. The rumours widely believed on Fogo Island were that the Federal Government, through its financing of a resettlement programme in Newfoundland, intended to force the people to leave the Island. Such a statement was never made publicly by any political representative either from Ottawa or from the Newfoundland House of Assembly. It was widely believed on Fogo Island, however, that some Ottawa civil servant responsible for the resettlement programme regarded Fogo Island as a major source of out-migration. The situation seemed to the people of Fogo Island to be truly desperate.

Although the Island had been long settled, the 4,500 people there lived in 10 communities which in many respects were very isolated from one another. They were isolated most of all perhaps by a lack of co-operation and by inter-village rivalry. It is estimated that in 1967, 60 per cent of the Island was on welfare. The fishermen of the Island had no organization, owned or operated no plant facilities of any sort and showed little evidence of faith in themselves. On an island which did not offer its inhabitants a decent standard of living, the population was exposed to a school system which made good education virtually impossible. If there was to be a future either for the producers of Fogo Island or for the children there had to be basic and hurtful changes.

The story of development on Fogo Island must, we believe, rank as one of the most outstanding achievements by deprived rural people anywhere in contemporary Canada. By 1970, 760 people, mostly fishermen, fish plant workers and just interested citizens on Fogo Island, had joined an island-wide fishery co-operative that had good credit at the banks in the province, and had gained the respect of policy-makers and administrators in the Government of Newfoundland. (It would perhaps be too much to be expected that those in Ottawa who had opposed development on Fogo Island could be happy about what has resulted since).

The details of the impressive growth on Fogo Island will undoubtedly be made public during the visit of the Senate Committee there. Because they were so close to the situation and have been so involved in bringing it about themselves, it is unlikely that Fogo Island people will articulate to the Committee the real reasons for change. We believe they are complex and interwoven, but that they are not mysterious. It is also evident that because they have lived so close to the changes they may not appear so dramatic to the people of Fogo Island as they do to external observers. Nor would we wish to leave the impression that the problems of Fogo Island are resolved. They are not, nor will they be until they receive the kind of sympathetic help they have so completely earned.

Perhaps the first thing that occurred to bring about recent change was that some tough-minded residents of Fogo Island believed they could make a living there and that they were not going to be pushed easily into settling off the Island. They called conferences on the Island, brought in outside resource people, got information on what fishermen had done in other parts of Canada where they had been organized. They believed they were receiving assistance from nobody and that nobody cared about them. They realized that if they were ever to have any sort of future on Fogo Island as primary producers they would have to make a personal investment in that future. In one major way the residents of Fogo Island have done that since the day they formed the co-operative. Five per cent of the value of their catch has come "off the top" and that money has been used as a reserve fund by the co-operative to help keep fishermen's gear in the water longer and to make them more efficient. If this summer is successful in the fishery, there will be enough in the co-operative's reserve fund to qualify them under the Industrial Incentives Act for the same type of assistance and under the same conditions as are available to any established private corporation in Canada. They are now investigating the possibility of putting their money into a modern multi-purpose fish plant. If they do, it will be the first such plant owned by the fishermen in Newfoundland.

A contributing factor to the success on Fogo Island during the past three years has been an overwhelming lack of selfishness on the part of capable citizens of that Island. In the case of one such man, he has, we believe, directly as a result of his total commitment on a purely voluntary basis, lost his source of income. There has been recent help from Government and especially from the Provincial Department of Fisheries, which has leased government-owned fish plants to the Fogo Island Co-operative, and from the Provincial Department of Community and Social Development which played a vital role in assisting with the establishment of a co-operative shipbuilding yard on Fogo Island and in providing some funds for a community worker.

Unquestionably, other root causes of the changes which have occurred have been outstanding and dedicated management in the fisheries co-operative itself, a truly dedicated board of directors, a determination by some of the clergy and school teachers of Fogo Island that a totally integrated high school to serve the whole of Fogo Island was required, no matter what the religious dictates of the past, and a commitment by many Islanders to that change.

They show a manifest concern for self-improvement through education in social development and they are learning, through workshops, how to deal effectively with external agencies.

During the Committee's visit to Fogo Island it will undoubtedly see evidence of some of the economic and social progress that is occurring so dynamically on the Island. It may hear something of the difficulties Fogo Island people had in learning that they had real power. It may learn of some of the pressures from a bureaucratic wall of silence which can come in response to legitimate requests from the people. It may hear pessimism and anger, because what successes there are are too new to cause the kind of security that will eventually come to Fogo Island.

We hope the Committee will wonder enough to accept our following recommendation, in the conviction that the recommendation could bring a message of hope to other deprived groups in Canada, and an examination of basic values and principles among those in power to make decisions about people like those on Fogo Island.

Recommendation

That the Department of Regional and Economic Expansion fund a research grant for the purposes of examining the developments on Fogo Island during the past three years, and for determining the causes for that development, in the expectation that such research would provide a possible guide to rural redevelopment elsewhere in the Atlantic Provinces. The findings should be made public and distributed widely.

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Tuesday, October 28, 1969:

"The Honourable Senator Croll moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to investigate and report upon all aspects of poverty in Canada, whether urban, rural regional or otherwise, to define and elucidate the problem of poverty in Canada, and to recommend appropriate action to ensure the establishment of a more effective structure of remedial measures;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisors as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time;

That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to adjourn from place to place;

That the evidence taken on the subject during the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Bélisle, Carter, Cook, Croll, Eudes, Everett, Fergusson, Fournier (Mada-waska-Restigouche), Hastings, Inman, Lefrançois, McGrand, Pearson, Quart, Roebuck and Sparrow.

After debate,

In amendment, the Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Burchill, that the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by striking out paragraph 4 thereof and substituting therefor the following:—

"That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to adjourn from place to place, and notwithstanding Rule 76 (4), to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate."

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion in amendment, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

The question being put on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck, as amended it was—
Resolved in the affirmative."

Extract from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Wednesday, October 29, 1969.

“With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Connolly (Halifax North) and MacDonald (Queens) be added to the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate appointed to investigate and report all aspects of poverty in Canada; and

That the name of the Honourable Senator Nichol be removed from the list of Senators serving on the said Special Committee.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.”

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

EXCERPT FROM THE MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS OF A MEETING OF THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY, held in St. John's, Newfoundland, on Monday, July 6, 1970.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Croll (Chairman); Carter, Cook, Eudes, Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), Hastings, Inman, McGrand and Quart. (9).

In attendance: Mr. Frederick J. Joyce, Director; Hon. Stephen Neary, Minister of the Department of Social Services and Rehabilitation of the Province of Newfoundland.

It was proposed by the Honourable Senator Carter and unanimously Resolved:

That the statement made in the Senate by the Honourable David A. Croll, Chairman, on Thursday, June 25, 1970, be printed as part of the record of the proceedings of the Committee.

ATTEST:

Georges A. Coderre,
Clerk of the Committee.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

INTERIM REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I would ask leave to make a report now on the progress of the work of the Senate Special Committee on Poverty.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is it unanimously agreed that the honourable Senator Croll have leave to speak on this subject now?

Hon Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, originally I had intended to speak on the committee's summer project, but I think more needs to be said than just that.

In the time available today, I wish to give a short, perhaps incomplete, bird's-eye view of what has transpired before the committee, with some broad general observations. These will not be in depth; I will touch merely some of the highlights. To this date, no definitive decision has been made by the committee on any of the principles which in due course it will have to enunciate.

The committee was established on January 23, 1969 and the hearings commenced on April 22, 1969. Mr. Fred Joyce was appointed director; briefs were solicited, and a small, competent staff was recruited. I shall say something about the staff on another occasion—something complimentary. They did some housekeeping, the organization was undertaken and ground rules were laid down.

The committee has been sitting in Ottawa every Tuesday and Thursday, without a break, since April of last year. We have heard 65 briefs. The committee has also had hearings in Halifax, Charlottetown, Winnipeg, Vancouver and in Toronto, where we received 47 briefs. In all, we have received a total of 112 briefs.

We were the first government body to reach out to the poor in their own locale and in their own environment. We went there and said, "Tell us your troubles." It was a precedent. Last week the Canadian Welfare Council followed that precedent and held a meeting in Toronto to which they invited quite a number of poor people. As a matter of fact, they brought in a number of people from various parts of the country, and you will probably have noticed that, according to the newspapers, there were some commotion because of some of the people present. When I read the report I realized that there were some there from our own alumnae, whom we had met on another occasion. It seemed that they had learned a few things since they appeared before us.

Before we made our trip, many of use were told that it was an unusual thing to do and that we would have some difficulties to face. Nevertheless, we decided to face the wrath. There were some rough days ahead and we took our lumps—but we kept our cool.

During the summer recess the committee will visit Newfoundland, Alberta, Whitehorse, New Brunswick, Saskatchewan, Quebec and the Gaspé-Rimouski area. I shall give you further details of that later.

Early in October when we return—it appears that the house will return on October 5, and as usual, I suppose we will return a week later. At least, I hope so!

Hon. Mr. Martin: Maybe earlier.

Hon. Mr. Croll: If you return earlier, you will return alone!

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: When we return...

Hon. Mr. Martin: We will be returning earlier!

Hon. Mr. Croll: ...we shall hear from Quebec, British Columbia, Manitoba, the Canadian Congress of Labour and six important groups that have not been able to appear up to the present time.

We look forward to completing our formal hearings by the end of October. Then, of course, the most trying part of our undertaking will be ahead of us, to make a total and meaningful report in accordance with our terms of reference. The reference directed us:

—to investigate and report upon all aspects of poverty in Canada, whether urban, rural, regional or otherwise, to define and elucidate the problem of poverty in Canada, and to recommend appropriate action to ensure the establishment of a more effective structure of remedial measures.

So, we on the committee realize that the report must articulate the nation's values; it must define its goals; and it must marshal its will—to the end that Government will take such steps as are necessary for the implementation of the report, so as to give meaning and purpose, and hope to the poverty stricken, as well as a challenge to the rest of us to eradicate a social plague which is unworthy of a great people in a great country.

The report can and must lead to the most progressive social advancement in the second part of the century. To do that it must break new ground and it must reach for new horizons.

Today I will speak in generalities and will neither define nor refine principles. I shall deal rather with the matters that were raised before the committee and repeated time and again. It is a consensus that I have in mind.

Let me speak first about the welfare system. The welfare system is a mess. Billions of dollars have been spent on social services which are failing their clients. There is an almost total loss of confidence in the system. Program has been piled upon program without evaluation to determine whether they are meeting the original objectives, or whether the original objectives are still valid.

Programs contain serious gaps. There has been a build-up of hostilities and frustrations. The sense of being on the dole, the lining up for a weekly or monthly cheque is demeaning. People prize their dignity. Recipients, by reason perhaps of the administration or otherwise, fight the system. They try to beat the game. They resent their lot in life, and they blame the system and the establishment.

The welfare system at best does not provide a decent living for the recipients. The system is limited for coverage. The Canada Assistance Act does not exclude the working poor, yet it has only just begun to be used by some of the provinces, and even they are using it in a most reluctant fashion. The insecurities built within the system tend to perpetuate poverty.

One of the great evils is unevenness of level of assistance. I have here an example which I think will make an impression upon you.

We took a family in Hull and a family in Ottawa of approximately the same age, with the same number of children, living in the same circumstances and paying approximately the same rent. One family lived on one side of the river, one on the other. The man in Ottawa received $100 a month more from welfare than did the man in Hull, and has been receiving it for some time. That unevenness persists across the whole country, and we have documented it. It is one of the evils that persists within the system.

There is unfair financial burden upon the poor provinces. The Provinces of Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia can take advantage of a fifty-fifty deal and put up dollar-for-dollar under the Canada Assistance Act, and use some of their equalization money for the building of bridges or for whatever else they may want to use it, while the poor provinces are unable to do that. The result is that in the final analysis the beneficiaries of the Canada Assistance Act are the treasuries of the rich provinces. The poor provinces can give their people very little. There is an unfairness about it. There is a total loss of confidence in the administration, and the system is, in my view, distrusted.

In addition, other Canadians, those who pay the piper, have lost confidence in the system, but for different reasons. Many of them think that the vast majority of welfare recipients are cheaters and bums who will not work. Time and again we have proved that not to be true, and could not apply to more than one per cent of the people who are receiving assistance. But these misguided opinions do not die. They are there and believed. There are others just as bad.

It is well to note that as against the welfare system the people welcome old age security, family and youth allowances, despite their inadequacy at the present time. They feel they come to them as an earned right by a method and delivery which has dignity, which they respect.

During the course of the hearings a great deal of awareness was sparked with respect to the plight of the poor. This resulted in the improvement of important administrative procedures and some increases to and adjustments of allowances.

A more important aspect was raised by the lady senators during the appearance before the committee of the Minister of Social and Family Services of the Province of Ontario. Welfare recipients in Ontario give the authorities the right to enter their homes under any circumstances. The practice is followed whereby many female heads of families experience a midnight knock on the door accompanied by a visit from the welfare investigator. He is not checking on the cleanliness of the house or how the children are cared for, but for the presence of a man. The investigator has a habit of visiting at various hours.

The point was raised that this is an invasion of privacy. The investigator should be allowed to visit only during the daytime.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: There would probably be no man present during the daytime.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Perhaps that is correct. The Honourable John Yaremko, Minister of Social and Family Services of the Province of Ontario, yesterday announced that this practice would be abolished and so advised the Toronto City Council.

Honourable senators may ask, how important is that? It is important to the people concerned and it is important to us. These people have their rights and dignity. If that practice does not apply to us it should not be allowed to apply to them. It is as simple as that. We may as well make our understanding of these matters clear.

It is important that we have activated the poor. They have become aware not only of their rights, but their responsibility. Instead of being part of the problem, they are beginning to become part of the solution. Therein lies our hope for a new beginning. If we succeed in bringing them into the fold and the decision-making process, we shall have attained much.

It is my opinion that the day of quiet losers is coming to an end. They are not going to continue taking it in the way they have done in other days. They will want to be heard, and they want things done in a way they can appreciate so that their lot in life will be improved. We have tried to instil into them confidence that they can affect the system by more active participation. If we do that, we will have achieved considerable success.

Now let me define poverty, Honourable senators know what it is as well as I do but it is well to hear how the experts define it. I can take honourable senators back almost 75 years in history, but as they have not yet decided on a definition, we must take our choice. The definition of the Economic Council of Canada is:

Insufficient access to certain goods, services, and conditions of life which are available to everyone else and have come to be accepted as basic to a decent, minimum standard of living.

Poverty, thus defined, is not quite the same as low income. That is the definition of the Economic Council.

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics definition is:

A basic assumption for the main set of estimates was that any family or individual spending more than 70 per cent of total income on food, clothing and shelter was in a low-income situation and likely to be suffering from poverty.

John Kenneth Galbraith, who is worth listening to, has a different definition in The Affluent Society:

People are poverty stricken when their income, even if adequate for survival, falls markedly below that of the community. Then they cannot have what the larger community regards as the minimum necessary for decency; and they cannot wholly escape, therefore, the judgment of the larger community that they are indecent.

The poverty line fixed by the Economic Council in 1968 is no longer valid. The cost of living since that time has risen 8 per cent, and thus it appears more in these terms. In 1968, for a family of one, it was $1,800; in 1970 it is $1,944. In 1968, for a family of two it was $3,000; it is now $3,240. For a family of three, in 1968 it was $3,600; it is now $3,888. For a family of four, in 1968 it was $4,200; it is now $4,536. It keeps increasing at a rate of $600 for each child. So that, due to inflation and unemployment the relative position of the poor has worsened.

No matter at what figure the poverty line is fixed, it is evident that two vital factors have to be considered: the rise in the cost of living and participation in the gross national product, which is the standard of living. The cost of living escalator alone denies to individuals and families participation in the rising standard of living. If only the cost of living escalator is used, in not too many years a situation similar to that which prevails in the children and youth allowances will result. The adequate use of the allowance has deteriorated, because of the rise in the cost of living, to make it almost meaningless at the present time.

The Old Age Security was strengthened by the supplement, but even it has become inadequate in this day and age. It therefore becomes clearly obvious that the poverty line must rise for two reasons, increased cost of living and increased standard of living; otherwise it will soon become obsolete and we will have to start again on the merry-go-round of the question of where is the poverty line and who is in poverty, instead of once and for all encouraging it in such a way that it moves on its own with the wealth of the country.

We began our hearings, as I hope you would have expected of us, and found that there were about four million people in Canada below the poverty line. We started out to try to identify them as to where they are, who they are and why they are there. We found that there were about 1,250,000 families—850,000 of whom are in the labour force. We then broke them up. We first took a look at what we call the disadvantaged, persons who are no longer able to participate fully in the labour force, such as the blind, the crippel, the maimed and the aged. We studied the females who became heads of the families because of desertion, divorce death and detention, and these we called our 4-Ds. There are 160,000 of them in Canada, with 350,000 dependent children.

We found the other disadvantaged people to be the welfare poor. In addition, we had the hard core and those who were unstable, had chronic illnesses or other causes. They represent approximately 45 to 50 per cent of the poverty group and there was no difficulty identifying them. We had their names, addresses and we knew where they were and how they got there. Our job now is to get them out.

We still have another group which total almost 50 per cent. The percentages are not as easy to come by, therefore you will have to take a reasoned view of them. This group is the working poor. You remember that I said there are about 850,000 of them. Some work full time, some part time and some accept casual work, but mostly they are unskilled and lack education. We do not consider these people to be part of the welfare group or the syndrome of the welfare web, because they have a different type of problem. Moreover, within that group of four million people who are below the poverty line there are two million children who share the family fortunes.

It is interesting to know where the poor are. These are the 1969 figures. Since I was unable to find any figures more accurate than these you will have to make some allowances. This is the geographical breakdown of Canadians living below the poverty line:

Region	Percentage of Population	Numbers
Atlantic Provinces	15	240,000
Quebec	30	1,400,000
Ontario	25	1,400,000
Prairie Provinces	20	540,000
British Columbia	10	240,000

I should like to give you a few more facts. There are more poor people in central Canada, Quebec and Ontario, than in the rest of Canada. There are roughly as many poor in Quebec as in western Canada and more than in any other single region, and approximately as many poor in Ontario as in the Atlantic and Pacific coastal regions, and more than in any other single region outside of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Urquhart: This is the percentage of the population?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes. I took the population of the Atlantic Provinces as two million in 1969.

Let us go back for a moment and speak about those who are no longer able to participate in the labour force. It is evident from the consensus of opinion that there is a need which can be defined. These people need income, services and opportunities. In so far as the female head of the family is concerned, she should have a choice to participate in the labour force. If she is qualified and is able to take work it will be up to her. If she wants to stay home and look after the children, that will also be up to her. As you can see, we consider her a little different. I repeat, the consensus is that these people who are disadvantaged must be provided for in an obvious fashion, with income, services and opportunities, because their problem was and is a solvable one.

The committee, of course, will take all of these views into consideration. I state them emphatically because they were emphatically stated to us. We have the working poor—and that is a hard nut to crack because it has many ailments. They are unorganized, unskilled and unlettered, but willing to work—able to work and handicapped with a lack of skills and education. They need employment. If they are unable to obtain employment, then we must look for the alternative which is an adequate unemployment insurance. If an adequate unemployment insurance runs out, then we must consider the future alternative of a maintenance income. That means that the Government will be the employer of last resort.

It is necessary for us to keep in mind, as the new unemployment act suggests, that 4 per cent will be a tolerable unemployment figure. This means that 300,000 people will be unemployed in this country, and that will be tolerable. It was never that high; we always thought of it as 2 per cent. We must keep in mind the fact that there may not be jobs for these people. There are some indicators you have to read. These people need training, retraining and various kinds of education. I am not thinking of a formal education, in that sense. There is education which is very useful to people but not taken at the university level. I hope everyone agrees with that. They also need taxation relief and work incentives. That is a bugbear with the Canadian people—I shall speak about work ethics in a short while. They need it for themselves, and they are very anxious to have these things.

Honourable senators, the matter of maintenance income came up before us time and again. There was almost total agreement on it. So we have to give consideration as to how it should be made available. The consensus was that income should come from the federal Government, services should come from the provincial government, and delivery can be made by the Canada Assistance Act.

The Canada Assistance Act is an excellent measure and was to be used as an umbrella for all the social measures—with two exceptions, which I shall mention. There was not to be a tent over the Canada Assistance Act. Specifically, it was to be an umbrella. All the various programs, 200 or more, were to be consolidated, streamlined, examined and evaluated from the point of view of efficiency and propriety. The suitable programs were to be under the umbrella of the Canada Assistance Act, so that it would be in a nice neat package. That can be done. The Unemployment Insurance and the Canada Pension legislation were not to be included.

Honourable senators, in the presentations made before us, there was much hope expressed regarding the raising of our sights. There was an evaluation that we were in a better position, in a war on poverty, than our American cousins. We have a better chance to win that war, and we can do so.

We have no racial problem, with a black lash and a white lash. We have no Puerto Rican problem. These constitute about 25 per cent of problems in the United States.

One of the other advantages is that the Canada Assistance Act is national and can be applied uniformly across the country. We have had a great deal of valuable experience with it; it has been tried and tested, and it can be used administratively almost immediately.

Honourable senators, in examining our situation, we realized the difficulties experienced in the United States, and we heard what they were doing about this problem. That information made us realize that our chances of success were better than theirs. There was a further reason for this, as you will understand as clearly as anyone in the country. One of the great blessings in our land is medicare and hospitalization.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Neither of these is available in that sense in the United States. It has been proved beyond a shadow of doubt that chronic, prolonged, irremediable illness is the greatest pauperizer. When you touch that, you are really touching the soft spot in poverty. It pauperizes the individual, it pauperizes the family, it pauperizes the generation.

The poor and the poverty stricken benefit now, and will continue to benefit even more from medicare and hospitalization programs as the benefits are improved. The quality of the medical service is good, yet when the doctors were before us they did not disagree on the point that there is room for improvement. Their delivery of service is not good. There is a need for neighbourhood clinics to reach the poor, at storefront access, on a shopping-centre concept. There is a shortage of doctors and the distribution is bad.

Hospitals are for doctors, in the main, and the outpatient department in our hospitals today has not changed in fifty years. They said they were doing something about it, and it is about time they did. That will come about; that will improve. To the poor and the poverty stricken, those are great benefits.

When the Americans came along with their program, the Nixon program of a guaranteed income of $2,400 per family of two—nothing for a family of one—I said to them at that time that this would not work. When we discussed it with some of the men at our embassy, I said: "It will not work, because you are in difficulty on your basic needs; you are all right on education, but medical services and hospitalization are the big issues so far as the poor are concerned." I was told: "They get their medical services by the age of 65 and over, and hospitalization too."

Honourable senators will have noticed that when the Nixon plan went to the committee the other day, the committee examined it and sent it back, stating that the situation would have to be corrected. The plan has to come back now for a further amendment of the act, to include all those who get the benefits of the guaranteed income as well as those persons over 65. We in Canada have already provided for that, so there are some pluses of which we can take advantage.

Honourable senators, another consistent theme before our committee was that of education. Speaking for myself—and I am sure I speak for the committee when I say this—education is a great equalizer. Education, in the modern sense, not formal education; education that is environmental, education cultural, education on resources.

The poor need educating at a very early age. Competent people told us that for the poor we must begin at three years of age. If it is neglected until they are four, they are losing ground; and if we wait for kindergarten, they are handicapped. All the evidence before us is that the poorest schools and the poorest teachers are among the poor—the people who need the superior schools, the superior teachers and the superior facilities. We are looking seriously into that situation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What are you going to do about the educated unemployed?

Hon. Mr. Croll: They will get jobs. They always have. The educated unemployed have never been a problem in this country.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: They are.

Hon. Mr. Croll: From time to time, some of them do not get jobs at the salaries they require. Their chances of getting jobs will be very much better than others.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Ask them? Were your terms of reference so vague that you could go wandering all over the country, with all these questions, including education? It certainly was a wide field, was it not?

Hon. Mr. Croll: That was the intention, that we should take a look at it in its totality. That is what we were asked to do.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is what he was afraid you were going to do, but he didn't find any solution.

Hon. Mr. Croll: He didn't reach that conclusion at all.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The Tower of Babel.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am sorry, I did not hear what you said.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You speak as if you were around the Tower of Babel.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Again if I have not yet penetrated with what I have said so far, one of us is not doing very well.

Speaking of education, I quote from Mr. Galbraith, who said:

To the best of my knowledge there is no place in the world where a well-educated population is really poor.

And education may well turn out to be the most potent weapon we have. I think we have to convince the Canadian people that education is the diploma out of poverty.

As I said, we had discussed the guaranteed maintenance income, and to me it is an idea whose time has come. From the arguments we heard, or at least from some of the arguments, I was reminded very much of what I had heard on many other occasions when we proposed some social measure. A philosopher once said that all good ideas pass through three stages—ridicule, discussion and adoption. Social ideas with political ramifications pass through five stages; those opposed always say, firstly, it is impossible; secondly, it is unconstitutional, thirdly, it may bankrupt the country, fourth, it is not a bad idea but you are going about it in the wrong way, and then finally in the end they say they were for it all the time.

I think honourable senators will find that this coincides with some of the views expressed at the present time, because the concept of a guaranteed income was overwhelmingly endorsed by logic, by force, by understanding. It was discussed responsibly, as was the work ethic about which I will have something more to say in a few minutes.

The suggestion took these forms: a guaranteed income, which is sometimes called the maintenance income; and the method of delivery, either by a negative income tax form or by the demogrant form. All of these have been discussed and studied in academic circles for some time. They have been misunderstood in the highways and by ways of this country, and they have been mistrusted by a great number of taxpayers. Yet, in principle, the Government has been practicing them with the approval of the country. I think it is well to recognize that if we are to win this war on poverty, this affluent country of Canada will have to deploy some of its resources towards redeeming the poor and make better use of the resources now being spent on the poor.

From the time that we began our study, public opinion has changed on many things. We now have a better understanding of our purposes, our desires and our will. The greatest detractors have admitted the inevitability of some form of maintenance income for people in circumstances of poverty, so far as people appearing before the committee are concerned. They are as responsible as any people in this country; their view could be summed up in the question. "How soon, how much, and by what means do you implement the concept?" As far as the poor themselves are concerned, they will do anything to become persons again.

A study of the guaranteed income has been made by the Conservative Party and was approved in principle. The New Democratic Party has also made a study, and it is approved in principle. The Social Credit Party has made a study and they have approved it in principle. And, as I say, the Government of the day has been practicing it. Those of you who have time on your hands and are interested in the subject would be interested in the presentation made before the committee by the Department of National Health and Welfare. It was a very healthy one.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It surely should be.

Hon. Mr. Croll: An excellent presentation was made by Dr. Willard, and every word of it had to be read. He took eight pages to discuss the guaranteed minimum wage concept. Let me read you a quote from Dr. Willard on that concept, printed in the Montreal Star of June 20.

Sources in Ottawa have accepted the fact that in terms of the working poor the Canada Assistance Plan has been a failure. Because of this, many Ottawa experts feel it may be only through a guaranteed annual income (which is not selective about what kind of poor get help) that the working poor can receive assistance.

Dr. Joseph Willard, deputy minister of National Health and Welfare, stressed this in a Toronto speech recently when he said that "the new income-tested technique or guaranteed annual income approach will receive greater attention" in future.

He pointed out that it is a more efficient anti-poverty tool than either the "demogrant" (family allowance, for example) or social insurance techniques, and that its main thrust is to help the working poor.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Honourable Senators, may I be permitted to put a question to the honourable gentleman? Will the honourable senator, who is just resuming his seat...

Hon. Mr. Choquette: He is only resuming it because you are asking him a question.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I would like to ask him how much it has cost the people of Canada—and I am not just referring to Government, because the Government is just one element—to take care of the poor. Furthermore, I would like to know from the honourable Senator Croll how much more it will cost the Canadian people, and by that I mean everybody in Canada, to follow his suggestion?

Hon. Mr. Croll: The cost is now between 7½ billion and $8 billion, in total—municipal, provincial and federal—for social services of every kind. As to what the cost will be, I will come to that, but you cannot fix the cost until you fix the poverty line. Until such time as you lay down the line where you start, it is not possible to fix the cost; but, as I say, I will discuss that in a few moments.

One of the things that is troubling the Canadian people is the work ethic, the desire of people to work, the concept of having to work. The question that arises is, "Will they work if they are given a basic income?"

The Americans are plagued with the very same problem. In 1968 the Office of Economic Opportunity initiated an experimental project in New Jersey, the graduated work incentive experiment, to measure the effects of a program that assures families a minimum income level in a manner designed to protect their incentives to work. We are faced with exactly the same problem. Of course we are privy to all their findings, and they keep us informed. It is a program costing some $5 million; we take a free ride, and they are glad to be helpful to us.

They are not complete, but these are the preliminary findings that they have published and have been accepted. I read from page 14, under the heading "Attitudes Toward Work":

In-depth interviews with participants indicate that the low-income individual is strongly motivated toward work.

As shown in Chart VI, the majority indicated that they aspire for a better job and are willing to move to another city or take training even if it meant a pay cut in order to get that better job. The majority also indicated that they are willing to work two jobs to support their families. Of all the factors influencing work choice, job security was ranked twice as high by participants as any other job factor, including wages, working conditions, or job interest.

These responses from the participants indicate that supplementary income assistance will not reduce their work effort.

It is more than that.

Chart VI reads:

Attitudes Toward Work	Per cent
Aspire for a better job	65
Would move to another city for a good job	56
Would take training with pay cut to get better job	55
Would work two jobs	60
Job stability is twice as important as any other aspect of job
Low income people are strongly work motivated.

Among the many interesting findings is one with respect to administrative costs. Talking about guaranteed income, this is said:

The estimated total cost per family for this type of administration is $72 to $96 per year, exclusive of work training and day care costs. This figure compares to the estimated cost of $200 to $300 per family per year for the existing welfare system, also excluding the costs of training and services.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): From where do those figures come?

Hon. Mr. Croll: This is from a publication entitled, "Preliminary Results of the New Jersey Graduated Work Incentive Experiment," put out by the Office of Economic Opportunity in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Is that an official organism?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes, a department of government.

The detractors of the guaranteed income make two arguments: firstly, that money alone will not solve the problem and, secondly, that it will be too expensive. Let us examine those arguments for a few moments.

No one appearing before the committee made any statement that money will solve the problem. No member of the committee made any such statement or believes it. The poor do not even believe it. Money is the first step out of poverty but it will not solve the problem. There is much more to it than that. The most important solution to it is, as I have indicated, jobs or alternatives to jobs, whatever they may be, along with training and so on. If the problem could be solved by money alone, the Americans, who began their fight against poverty by trying the "money alone" approach, would have solved it, but they did not and have changed their course.

The following is a quote from Molly Orshansky, one of the senior civil servants in the United States Department of Agriculture, and an international authority on poverty statistics. She appeared before the Joint Economic Committee in the Congress of the United States in June 1967, and this is what she said:

If money alone will not solve the problem of poverty it is still true that without money nothing else will avail much either. Mathematically, it falls in the category of necessary but not sufficient conditions. Pragmatically it is undoubtedly true that the persons who declaim loudest that "money is not everything" are those who already have some.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On which side are you?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am on her side.

We must remember that to the poor money is coined freedom. In the future we shall have to deal with the poor in the currency they understand. We might as well make up our minds if we are serious, that the Canadian dream will not be tax free.

The second argument is that it is too expensive, that we cannot afford it now. Must it all be "now"? Rome was not built in a day! Do we not need a plan, an objective, a purpose and some ground rules? Cannot we phase it in, whatever it may cost—a little now, a little more tomorrow—so long as we know the direction in which we are travelling and the objective we want to attain? Every social measure we have on the statute books of this country has been phased in. It may have had small beginnings, but we knew what we wanted in the end and we attained it. We cannot afford to take the "now or never" approach. We cannot afford to do a patchwork job, or a band-aid job, or a finger-in-the-dyke job, and think we are making progress. We have tried all these remedies before, and they have failed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This is a change in the social order.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Nobody is changing the social order.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Judging from the way you speak, there is no other way out.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I have not said there will be no change when we make a further contribution to alleviate the conditions of people who live in poverty. There has not been a change in the social order for twenty years. For twenty years there has been no redistribution of wealth in this country. Are the people not entitled to some change?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Are you suggesting that what has been done over the past twenty-five years has been to no avail, and has served no purpose?

Hon. Mr. Croll: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I suggest to the honourable senator that there are more people living in poverty today than there were, and that is after all these efforts.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The honourable leader was out of the chamber when I indicated that the conditions of poor people have worsened recently.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Despite all that we have done.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No. It worsened recently for two reasons—inflation and unemployment.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Ah...

Hon. Mr. Croll: But, wait a minute. We have to make some changes in our social order. I remember the theory of Mackenzie King who thought that he could get redistribution of wealth by social measures. At the time that appeared to me to be a good theory. But, you know what it has done in twenty years. It has made a two per cent difference in the redistribution of wealth, and nothing else has happened. So if I now suggest some further redistribution of wealth, I am told I am advocating a new social order, although my honourable friend did not say it was socialism, or something else. Is that a new social order?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think we have to come to that conclusion, judging from your argument up to now.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am giving you the consensus of those who have appeared before the committee, not that of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Very well.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I have my views, and I am not the sort of fellow who hides them under a bushel. My honourable friend knows that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No; that is obvious.

Hon. Mr. Croll: And you would not want it any other way, I hope.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are not speaking for the committee?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Well, I...

Hon. Mr. Croll: Just one second, senator. I started out by saying that I was making a report on the opinion expressed before the committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But you are not hiding your own views.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Whether you call it the consensus of the committee or something else...

Hon. Mr. Croll: It is not the consensus of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): ...I would like to know in a clear-cut way whether the honourable gentleman is proposing a socialist state for Canada or something else.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Are you sure that we have not a socialist state in Canada already?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): No, sir.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am happy with what we have at the present time. I have always supported the Liberal party which, if not openly socialistic, at least takes socialistic measures though it is not supposed to be a socialistic party. I have been a member for a long time.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I am not prepared to accept that. My honourable friend used to be a Liberal. I do not know to where he has gone today. In the past I know he was a Liberal, and in the minds of Liberals there is a national wealth that has to be distributed in an honest way, in a free way, to those who have less from those who have more. That is why we have what was called by George Drew, a former Prime Minister of Ontario, the baby bonus.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What is your question, senator?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Order. I do not think the honourable Senator Fournier (De Lanaudière) is asking a question. He is making a speech.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: May I help to synopsize his question?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Order, please. Unanimous consent was given to the honourable Senator Croll to make an interim report of the Senate Special Committee on Poverty. All honourable senators will agree that this is not a time to open a debate. Some of the remarks that have been made so far have not been questions, but rather argument. I would ask honourable senators to assist the Chair in dealing with this matter in an orderly fashion.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is, of course, up to the honourable senator who has the floor to accept or refuse questions. If he accepts them, then I do not think it is the duty of the Chair to intervene. If the honourable senator is tired of the interruptions, he can refuse to answer questions. But as long as he is prepared to accept questions, then there should be no intervention.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I agree with the honourable Leader of the Opposition. Before rising, I took great care to note that the remarks of the honourable Senator Fournier (De Lanaudière) did not comprise a question. They constituted an argument more than a question. If the Chair allows this type of discussion to continue, we will be involved in a debate.

I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that this is merely an interim report of the committee. The report will be considered in the fall, at which time all honourable senators will have an opportunity of making whatever contributions they wish.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If this is an interim report, then look out for the final report!

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Honourable senators, the honourable gentleman received the unanimous consent of the house to put his case. At the proper moment I asked his permission to put a question, which he accepted. That was quite in order. Of course, I had some reasons for putting my questions, but before I was able to explain all my reasons I was declared out of order. I was simply asking the honourable gentleman if he is a Socialist, a Tory, a Liberal, or a member of the N.D.P. I should like to know where he stands.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Are there any sensible questions? If not, I will continue. If any honourable senator has a question, then I shall be pleased to try to answer it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I should like to know if the honourable senator's theory is this: not necessarily socialism, but socialism if necessary.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He is a disciple of MacKenzie King.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am delighted to hear these thoughtful observations, but I shall go on with my speech.

My purpose, as I stated originally, is to indicate to the house something of what the committee is going to do this summer. The members of the committee consider that there is great urgency about the problem of poverty, and they have agreed to give up their summer in order to visit those areas of Canada that they have not yet visited.

The first visit of the committee will be to Newfoundland and Labrador in the week of July 5. This will be an extensive tour of the Province of Newfoundland, to include St. John's, Gander, Fogo Island, Corner Brook, St. Anthony's, and Labrador.

Two weeks later, on July 19, the committee will be visiting Calgary, Edmonton, Whitehorse, and the Northwest Territories.

During the first week of August, the committee has an extensive tour planned of New Brunswick, which includes Moncton, Saint John, Fredericton, Chatham, Newcastle, and Bathurst.

During the week of August 16, the committee will visit Saskatchewan. The areas to be visited are Regina and Prince Albert, and rural Saskatchewan.

During the week commencing August 30, the committee will visit the Gaspé Peninsula and northern New Brunswick. This visit will include Rimouski, Edmundston, Gaspé, and Campbellton/Restigouche.

I did not refer to housing, manpower, the role of the social worker, legal aid, taxation, day care centres, nursing homes, nor a myriad of other matters that have been brought to our attention and will have to be considered by the committee. That will be done on another occasion.

I have given a fair idea of the problems which have been presented. This is the consensus of the views of people who have appeared before the committee and the work which we feel it is our duty and responsibility to carry out.

For the balance of this summer we will visit various provinces which I have already mentioned. We would very much welcome any honourable senators who are in the provinces at that time to join us at our hearings. We will be glad to give you a copy of the program, if you wish.

One would go far to find a more devoted, responsible and co-operative group of men and women than those on the committee. They are concerned and hard-working. It has been a tiring grind, but every member of the committee feels a personal responsibility for finding a solution.

I believe that we have established a credibility in the country and that it will have confidence in our determination, ability and concept to formulate plans which will remove the curse of poverty which sears this land.

Clerk of the Committee.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

July 7, 1970

SUMMARY OF VISIT TO FOGO ISLAND

Mr. Fred Earle met sub-Committee "A" of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty at the Gander Airport and acted as the guide for the Committee on its visit to Fogo Island. The first impression upon arriving at the Island is its isolation from Newfoundland proper. It is separated by a one and a half hour Ferry boat ride.

During the course of the visit to Fogo, it became obvious that the people of the Island had a strong desire not to resettle. This desire has manifested itself in the formation of a number of cooperative endeavours. It is difficult to assess whether this cooperation was the result of being pushed into a position where the Islanders had no other choice but to join together or to be part of the complete disintegration of the Island's economy.

Relative to other parts of Newfoundland, Fogo Island people seem to be further advanced in their organizations. This may be a result of their being pushed further than Newfoundland people. They are attempting to integrate their denominational scheme system which would not have been considered possible a couple of years ago. They are making an effort to enhance the tourist industry by building a camping site. They have in the person of Reverend Jespersen a dynamic cleric who has taken on the task of printing an Island newspaper called 'The Fogo Island Profile'. They have a fish cooperative and a small "long-liner" ship building firm. How successful both of these enterprises will be, remains to be seen. Long-liner construction is subsidized by the Federal Government and the subsidy appears to be used as a means of controlling the number of fishermen. Fogo Island submitted a proposal to build four long-liners—only two were approved.

The general impression received from the visit to Fogo is that the people want nothing more than the opportunity to work, whether it be fishing, farming or ship-building. They detest the "dole" and appear to have gone to great lengths to avoid a welfare culture. In general, they have a great deal of pride in their Island and in their way of life. Their homes, though small, were well kept. They appear to be a very industrious people attempting to ensure the continuation of their Island way of life and have subverted some of their inherent independence to cooperate to ensure their culture survives.

They appear to be honest, sincere and very happy. They just want an opportunity to continue to live on Fogo Island.

July 8, 1970

SUMMARY OF VISIT TO COX'S COVE

Cox's Cove is an out port, 25 miles from Corner Brook, Newfoundland, which consists of about 800 people living in 150 families.

There are 80 lobster fishermen and about 30 drawing the old age security. They will do almost anything to make a living. They appear to go to the "mainland" to make some money and then come back to Cox's Cove. With respect to education, the high school graduates of Cox's Cove just walk the streets. There is nothing for them to do and they must leave. They lack opportunity.

With respect to their community organization which is relatively new, they said that they lack confidence in their own abilities until the McLeod family of Frontier College came to Cox's Cove and helped them organize their community development committee. The McLeod's have left and their organization still survives. They have had considerable difficulties getting satisfactory replies from the Newfoundland government. They mentioned writing a letter to Graham Snow of the Recreation Department on 1 March, 1970 and never received a reply. This was to solicit funds to improve their out-door hockey rink. They stated that Newfoundland returned $1 million in recreational funds to the Federal Government because they did not use them.

"In Cox's Cove, it is a privilege to work".

One of the main points they brought out in discussion was that short-term assistance was at such a low level that the condition of the family on short-term assistance, which can last up to many years, continues to deteriorate the longer they stay on short-term assistance. As a result, they revert to being culturally deprived. It was suggested that short-term assistance should be for a minimum period of time and then recipients change to long-term assistance so that the family was not completely destroyed.

Cox's Cove is a typical out port which is completely isolated. It has one telephone from which only collect calls can be made. They are 25 miles from a doctor or any other medical attention. Their only means of transportation is private or taxi cabs. In spite of all this, they do not wish to take part in resettlement programs because they like Cox's Cove and they are attempting, through their community organization, to improve their conditions.

July 8, 1970

SUMMARY OF VISIT TO PORT AU PORT-LOURDES AREA

A subcommittee consisting of Senator Edgar Fournier, Vice-Chairman of the Committee and Senator Eric Cook toured the Port au Port-Lourdes area by car.

At Cape St. George there were informal talks with local fishermen who were cleaning and salting fish which they had caught earlier in the morning. They also visited the home of a Mr. Benoit who is the president of the local improvement council where informal discussions were held with Mr. Benoit and other local inhabitants. Self help projects were seen and the need for additional facilities were established, in particular, a requirement for an adequate road to Cape St. George.

The members were impressed with the "aggressiveness to succeed"—a trait of the local inhabitants and their ability to organize a very worthwhile community council. To make a living in this area, the men have to fish and farm. A hardy lot of fine people who are enduring hardship to maintain themselves in their own homes in this part of Newfoundland. They wanted jobs—not hand-outs.

SUMMARY OF EVIDENCE

On behalf of the Deer Lake and Environs Association, the main witness was Mr. Grant Hiscock.

He first explained the purpose of his Association, which is "to act as the voice of the rural people of Newfoundland". He further explained this by making a review of the brief which was presented to the Committee. To illustrate the situation prevailing in the Deer Lake area, the witness said that they had had no resident dentist for three years and that they had inadequate water and sewage facilities. The witness concluded that there was a real need for federal and provincial assistance.

With regard to employment, he said that the existing potential of natural resources was not fully used. He considered education as a prime factor to create the much needed incentive. He considers that incentive grant for industry is a must and should also apply to fishermen and farmers as well. He said that there was enough arable land, on the west coast of Newfoundland, to fill all their needs for fresh vegetables and other agricultural products.

Upon being questioned by members of the Committee, he described in more detail the lack of adequate dental services in Deer Lake. With regard to medical services, there was only one nurse for a population of approximately 10,000 inhabitants; he added that she was a part-time nurse at that.

The dropout rate in the area is of the order of 40 per cent and it has been that way for a long time. Dropouts occur mainly at the Grade 8 level, and one of the reasons for such an occurrence is the fact that a fee of $5.00 a month has to be paid to carry on over the Grade 8 level.

He further described the working of their group: no fees are collected and all members are invited to take part in decision-making. All efforts are directed towards positively developing potential resources. As for the resettlement program "we are not involved in it", he said.

Port au Port Economic Development Association

Mr. Jim Campbell was the main speaker on behalf of this group. The brief which was presented to the Committee was read by the witness in its quasi-entirety.

Upon further questioning by members of the Committee, the following points were made:

(1) Parents are now pushing children towards more education. In many cases it is causing frustration as some children are not prepared to absorb the substance of a curriculum which is not geared to the problems of a small community; those who reach the diploma level may find that they can make little out of their knowledge, in the small community, in which they live.

(2) Retraining program: It is too restrictive as it is.

(3) Resettlement: It should be thrown out the window where it came in, in the first place.

(4) In short, the local resources should be placed in the hands of the people; more education, standardized adult education with much more personal attention. Sums devoted to education should be spent where they are most needed, that is, for the poor of the province and not so much, in universities, for a small privileged group, residing in St. John's.

In conclusion, being questioned for his views on guaranteed annual income or negative income tax, the witness said that he had given no thought to this matter.

Interfaith Social Action Committee

The Reverend W.J. Baker of the United Church was the main speaker for this group.

(1) After reviewing the brief presented to the Committee, he said that his group fully endorsed the principle of guaranteed annual income.

(2) With regard to education, more effort should be placed at the beginning rather than at the end. Pre-school training is a must for the poor.

(3) Although he admitted that defence was important, he thought that housing for the poor had more importance.

Professor Turner made a critical review of the local education system, especially at the primary level. Vocational training and academic training should be better coordinated. Coordination was badly needed between the various levels of the Department of Education, the Department of Health and the various social services. Parents ought to be informed what education really is. Education planners should realize once and for all that education in an urban and in a rural area should not receive the same treatment.

Mr. Gilbert Higgins and Professor Turner both favoured preschool education in rural areas. The "head start" program should be expanded and adapted to local conditions.

It is wrong to send best students to vocational school as very often the academic curriculum is identical to that of those pursuing higher education. There are too many supervisors and too many levels in the administrative machinery of education. Many worthwhile suggestions become "ghosts" before they leave town.

Reverend Baker said that all efforts should be made to protect the dignity of the poor. To this end, a greater number of social workers, which are not presently available, would be required. More effort should be made towards positively organizing the poor to help themselves.

The Chairman said that, so far in Newfoundland, the Committee had seen many instances where the poor were taking in hand their own problems; what the Committee had seen so far was very encouraging. After reviewing some of the aspects of the present social security measures, the Chairman said that "a man is entitled to a job or maintenance annual income".

Dr. Noel Murphy, Mayor of the City of Corner Brook

In welcoming the Committee to Corner Brook, His Worship Mayor Murphy said that the Committee should stay from two to three weeks in Corner Brook rather than a few days. However, he expressed the gratitude of the people of Corner Brook to the Committee for their coming to the city. "We are very grateful", he said, "for the opportunity we have to state our case".

What is poverty and what are we looking for? Poverty, he said, takes different faces according to location. Poverty here is not the same as in Ontario. Newfoundlanders have come up the hard way. The income is low and unemployment is high, but we still have the will to work. Although welfare may be required in many cases and for quite some time, all efforts should be directed towards work and productiveness. When there is so much to be done, every able body should be put to work. The poor may not be eligible for income tax, but he is however eligible for all other hidden taxes.

Reviewing the problems in Corner Brook, His Worship said that the cost of living in his city was the highest in Newfoundland. The main problems faced by the municipal government were housing, sewage, roads. The priorities, however, rest with the people. It is more important to have proper water and sewage facilities than paved roads.

In some cases welfare payments are higher than unemployment insurance. "When you get to this point", he said, "you should reassess the whole system". Such a situation tends to produce lack of interest in working.

Dr. Murphy further reviewed the local situation of poverty in his area. He stressed the fact that the poor, although not adequately educated, was proud and with minimum help had the will to work.

In conclusion, His Worship Mayor Murphy recommended that every effort should be made to provide job opportunities. As an example, with proper planning and help, Newfoundland should be self-sufficient in meat and vegetables. Fisheries could be greatly expanded.

His economic development program in Corner Brook has the objective of creating 100 new jobs a year. To this end it would be necessary to diversify the present industrial pattern. Because we have failed to create new jobs, our youth has to plan to go away to where jobs can be found.

Mr. Jack Marshall, M.P., welcomed the Committee to Corner Brook. He deplored inefficiency and procrastination in some quarters and he expressed the view that the Committee come up with appropriate recommendations in the nearest possible future.

Mr. Jim Walsh produced a private brief with worthwhile recommendations, some of which were:

(1) Upgrading centres were too far. The school should go to the people.

(2) Higher scales of pay for labourers. He favoured guaranteed annual income.

Mr. Gilbert Higgins as a Newfoundlander described the situation of the poor in Newfoundland as it exists today. He stressed the various factors of the personality of the Newfoundlander which may be different from that of other groups of Canadians.

In conclusion, the Chairman made a brief review of what the Committee had seen in Newfoundland so far. People in Newfoundland are more concerned for work than anything else. They value the quality of life more than its economic aspect: they want self respect and dignity. He then described the welfare system as it emerged in the Thirties. It grew and it grew and yet nobody is satisfied. An alternative has to be found and one that Canada can afford. We have the ability and the resources and I am sure that the "Canadian dream" can be realized. No doubt that our problems cannot be solved overnight, but with appropriate planning, our problems can be solved. One thing we know, the system is not working and poverty does damage, not only to the individual, but to humanity.

This is the problem we are confronted with and all our efforts are directed towards adequate solutions.

The meeting of the Committee was adjourned at 11.00 p.m.

VISIT TO NEWFOUNDLAND,
5 July to 9 July, 1970, inclusive

VISIT OF SUB-COMMITTEE TO NORTHERN NEWFOUNDLAND AND LABRADOR

7 July and 8 July

The sub-committee consisted of Senators Eudes, Hastings, McGrand and myself.

We were accompanied by Al Holman of the Committee staff and two reporters, Mr. Ron Crocker of the Evening Telegram, St. John's, Newfoundland, and Mr. David Allen of the Toronto Star.

We left St. John's on 7th July at 8:00 A.M. and deplaned at Deer lake at 9:30 A.M. where we rented a car and drove north along the west coast of the Northern Peninsula, a distance of 320 miles over a dirt road.

Our first stop was at Wiltondale where we interviewed Elliott Brake who had been unemployed since April when Bowaters discontinued woods operations at which he had been regularly employed. He had a family of five and was existing on $43.00 per week Unemployment Insurance. His last job was casual work on highroads maintenance.

Our next stop was at Daniels Harbour where we interviewed Angus Bennett, merchant, Mrs. Bennett, who was formerly an English nurse, and their son, Trevor Bennett had helped with the organization of NARDA (Northern Agricultural Rural development Association) but was now in business for himself.

Mr. Bennett felt that welfare had helped to demoralize the people and to some extent had robbed them of incentive and of their spirit of independence.

We also talked with Augustus Hose, retired, living on his Old Age Pension, and Howard Perry and his grandson from nearby Bellburns. Howard Perry, a very intelligent fisherman, informed us that his earnings from all sources varied from $3,000 to $5,000 per year. His opinion was that most families in Daniels Harbour averaged $3,000 per year or less. This would be mainly from the fisheries but would be supplemented by casual labour on highroads, woods operations, sawmills. The people would also supplement their earnings by growing a considerable portion of their vegetables and in some cases by cutting their fuel and killing game for food.

Our next stop was at Hawke Bay which is the headquarters of Norman McLeod and his wife, two teachers from the Frontier College.

Then we went on to Port aux Choix where we arrived around 2:00 p.m. There we met the McLeods who presented a brief, Appendix 1, and also showed us a videotape which depicted a discussion between some people of Hawkes Bay including some welfare cases and one woman, a Mrs. Helen Hayes, of that community, who described her difficulties with the welfare officer which developed out of a personality clash with him and resulted in some sort of discrimination that he showed towards her. This video tape drama provided a good illustration of the point brought out in the McLeod brief. The other point emphasized in the McLeod brief was the mobility of manpower. People must be mobile in order to take advantage of manpower programmes and this is a prerequisite which they cannot meet. The second point was the "boss" attitude of the civil servant rather than the attitude of a servant of the people.

We had lunch at Billard's Restaurant and there we saw three people who presented a brief, Appendix 2, on behalf of NARDA. They were Martin Lowe Jr. from Port Saunders, Ed Maynard from Port aux Choix and Wilfred Moulton from Hawkes Bay. These were three very intelligent men and their brief gave a very graphic description of their problems and possible solutions. Out of the discussion which followed their brief, it developed that in their opinion a man in this area with a family of five to live above the poverty line needs at least $4,000 cash in addition to any supplemental income from growing his own vegetables and getting his own fish and game for food. Another point brought out in the McLeod brief was that a person acts on an authority. This Mrs. Hayes went to see the welfare officer on behalf of her sick son, but went only when she had received authority in the form of a letter from the nurse. This illustrated another point in their brief.

The discussion at Port aux Choix lasted longer than scheduled and we did not get away until 4:00 P.M. We arrived at St. Anthony about 7:00 P.M. and checked in at the Loon Motel, and then went on to St. Anthony, another ten miles or so, where we had dinner with Dr. Gordon Thomas and his wife and their son, Len. It was a very enjoyable lobster dinner.

At 8:30 dinner was over and we went to the hospital where we heard two briefs; one presented on behalf of the International Grenville Association by the doctor's son, Len Thomas, Appendix 3, and another presented on behalf of the Town Council of St. Anthony by a Mr. Shepherd who was supported by a Mr. Hall, another member of the Town Council, Appendix 4.

The brief from the International Grenville Association was supplemented by remarks from Dr. John Grey of the staff of Grenville hospital and also by Dr. Thomas himself. The briefs form part of the official record. After the presentation of the briefs, questions were asked by Senator McGran who made enquiries there (as he did wherever an opportunity offered) about the possibilities of development of timber lots or sawmills from the forest resources of the area. His own opinion from his own observation driving along the shoreline was that these resources were very meagre but he was told that there were excellent forest resources at Harbour Deep and most of the resources were on the east side of the mountain range. One important point stressed over and over again in their brief was the deprivation of the people in this area through the lack of vocational training and the fact that the whole school programme was not geared to fit children for the kind of life they would have to lead. Children were not taught to cook or to make homes or to do any of the things they would have to do in their adult life, and the emphasis was wrongly placed in their opinion on academic training leading to university degrees, with the result that of 250 Grade 11 students there were only eight who really actually went on and completed university education. The others all became dropouts somewhere along the line.

I questioned Dr. Thomas about handicrafts which he said mainly consisted of ivory sculptures but now they are also concentrating on garments. This kind of activity was a very important supplement to the income of the area. They produced about $100,000 worth last year and could sell much more but their trouble was not in their finding markets but in actual production. When asked why there was such a problem in production when the unemployed in the area was around twenty-five per cent, he replied that it was difficult to get people interested. There was a lack of interest in this kind of work and the other problem was that their standards were very high and they could not accept a low standard of production.

Both the witnesses who presented the International Grenville Association brief and the Town Council brief agreed that there were great possibilities in the fishery but they needed long liners and possibly draggers to compete with the foreign draggers fishing offshore in this area.

Dr. Grey in his remarks stressed that there was twenty-five per cent unemployed and in winter unemployment probably reached fifty per cent. Another question which I directed to Dr. Grey who had spent a great deal of time in southern Labrador was in connection with the problem of Snug Harbour where there were only four families of about ten adults and possibly a dozen children and who were living a life of independence. They were keeping off relief which they could not do if they moved to a place called Charlottetown where they were being encouraged to re-settle, but there was the problem of the children being brought up with only three months of school. I asked Dr. Grey and Dr. Thomas how that problem could be solved. Their reply was that the people should be forced to move or at least the children should be taken from the parents and educated. It was admitted that the adults in this community would not be able to integrate into another community but they felt that the parents had no right to impose this kind of handicap on their children and that the state should step in and do something about it. The meeting at St. Anthony ended at 10:30 P.M. and we then went back to the motel which was another half-hour drive. Tomorrow we fly to Labrador in one of the I.G.A. (International Grenville Association) seaplanes leaving around eight o'clock.

Wednesday, 9th July, 1970

Up at six o'clock, airborne at eight o'clock and arrived at Cape Charles at 8:45 A.M. There we met with Cecil Pye and Arthur Pye who was retired. Cecil Pye was a fisherman. We also met the Reverend Lewis, the Anglican clergyman who was there to conduct a funeral. We had a short conversation with Mr. Cecil Pye and others there and we learned that there were no codfish, and salmon also were very scarce although the price was good, from sixty-five to eighty cents a pound. Normally by this time in the season a man would have landed about one hundred quintals of fish but this year they had only caught about twelve quintals of fish. The people from this community spend their winter at Lodge Bay.

We left Cape Charles at 9:05 A.M. and then went on to Marys Harbour which is a place where the people from several communities have their winter home. One of their great needs is a six mile road to link Marys Harbour and Lodge Bay. Another thirty miles would link Marys Harbour with Port Hope Simpson where winter jobs are possible.

We arrived at Marys Harbour at 9:30 a.m. This is a centre for church, school, the I.G.A. (International Grenville Association) nursing station and for the welfare officer. We were met by Mr. Hughlett Acreman, who is the foreman of the Grenville establishment there, and also by Nurse Harris and her mother. Marys Harbour has about sixty families and about fifty of these move out to the coastal communities to catch fish in the summer. These fishermen clear about two to three thousand dollars per year in a normal voyage, but the last good year was three years ago. This is the third bad year.

Leaving Marys Harbour at 10:30, we arrived at Square Island where we met Ben Powell, his wife and his daughter Marie and his son Louis, age twenty-six. We also met a fisherman, Mr. Clarke. It is twelve miles from Square Island to a place called Charlottetown which is a winter community. The people could fish as well from Charlottetown as they could from Square Island. Mrs. Powell felt that it would be better if the people of Square Island moved to Charlottetown, in which case they would have to maintain only one home. Under present circumstances they maintain two homes, one a winter home and the other a summer home from which they fish, and both are substantially built houses.

We left Square Island at 11:00 and at 11:30 we arrived at Black Ticks. We spent about fifteen to twenty minutes there trying to get ashore but there was a good stiff breeze blowing in the harbour and there was no sheltered place in the harbour where the plane could land so we took off again without getting ashore.

We arrived at Cartwright at 12:15. Cartwright is 150 miles north of Cape Charles and is a community of about 800 people with an I.G.A. (International Grenville Association) hospital. It is the largest community in Labrador apart from Happy Valley. When we got ashore at the Grenville mission we were met by Dr. Anthony Paddon who had arrived there from North West River where he is in charge of another I.G.A. (International Grenville Association) hospital. We were also met by Chesley Lethbridge, who is the forest ranger from the Department of Agriculture and National Resources, and by Mr. W. Moores who is the representative of the Department of Labrador Affairs. We also met Mr. Frank Kelly who is the president of the Coast of Labrador Regional Development Association and the Reverend Mr. Waye of the Anglican Church. We had lunch at Cartwright and immediately after a brief was submitted on behalf of the community of Cartwright by a number of people including the Reverend Mr. Waye, the Anglican minister, Appendix 5. A summary of the brief was given by Tony Williamson who with his wife is living at Cartwright as a representative of the Extension Department of Memorial University. The main points stressed in their brief was that poverty is not rooted in lack of resources but rather in the lack of utilization of the resources. The resources were not utilized because of lack of training, lack of modern methods and lack of investment capital. There is no processing plant on the coast and therefore no control of processing or marketing of fish. The main problems here are the same as everywhere we went—education, transportation, communications and particularly the need for air strips.

We left Cartwright at 2:20 P.M. and arrived back in St. Anthony at 4:00 P.M. Eastern Provincial Airways kindly delayed the departure of their plane so that we could make connections with it and we arrived back in Gander a little before 6:00 P.M. where we spent the night. We left Gander at 8:50 Thursday by E.P.A. and at Stephenville we were joined by the other sub-committee returning to mainland Canada.

Summary

All of the briefs as well as the interviews held with various individuals in all the communities visited stressed the following points:

1. The people do not want more welfare they want jobs.

2. They also want to preserve their personal pride and dignity and to live their own lives in their own way which for them has its own compensations and satisfactions for which they are quite willing to forego many of the amenities associated with the more affluent life of urban communities.

3. They do, however, want certain basic services such as education, roads, air strips and communication with the outside world through radio and TV.

4. The poverty in this region is mainly the result of isolation, the wrong emphasis on education (i.e., academic rather than practical and vocational), and lack of investment capital.

5. Local resources can provide many more jobs and a much higher standard of living. What is needed is investment capital and modern methods and facilities for developing their natural resources. It is evident that this is an area in which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should be more active. The opportunities for DREE are numerous.

6. Also needed is more consultation of local groups by government authorities and more opportunities for local people to contribute towards the solution of their own problems.

7. This is now becoming much easier to achieve because of the organization of community and regional development associations who are determined to have a say in the solution of their problems.

8. Organization of Fishermen's Unions and Cooperatives will also help and should be encouraged.

9. One common complaint was the lack of information from official sources and the inability after numerous attempts to get vital information from government authorities and their representatives.

10. There was also a common complaint that government representatives (civil servants) including welfare officers too often adopted the attitudes of "Commissioners" rather than servants of the people.

Respectfully submitted,

C. W. Carter

APPENDIX "A"

Brief to the Senate Committee on Poverty submitted on behalf of the Inter-Faith
Social Action Committee

The Inter-Faith Social Action Committee was established as an informal group in 1966 for the particular purpose of organizing an institute on "the Church and Industry". The institute was successful and the organizing committee received such a warm response from the community that it has continued in existence as an informal, loosely-knit body.

The nucleus is a group made up of clergy and laymen appointed by the various religious denominations in the City of Corner Brook. When the Committee decides to carry out a project it enlarges itself for that particular project by inviting people possessing the knowledge, experience or skill requisite to that project. On the completion of the project these additional members may be released from their association with the Committee. The Committee has co-sponsored a labor-management conference, an institute on health services in West Newfoundland and other projects. It was instrumental in the incorporation of The West Coast Inter-faith Social Welfare Council which is about to call for tenders for the construction of a senior citizens' home. That home will be operated jointly by five religious denominations.

This preamble is given simply to indicate the background of interest and concern against which this brief is submitted. While the Committee does not speak for any one religious denomination it feels that it can bring together some of the concerns which its members share in their overall concern for a segment of the community which even when it is vocal is not always articulate.

The Poor

The United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights declares in Article 25:

'Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age, or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.'

The Fifth Annual review of the Economic Council of Canada defines poverty as follows:

'In developed industrial societies the problem of poverty is increasingly viewed, not as sheer lack of essentials to sustain life, but as insufficient access to certain goods, services and conditions of life which are available to everyone else, and have come to be accepted as basic to a decent minimum standard of living.'

We fully realize that poverty can be a relative thing, in that what we class as poverty is high class living in some countries, yet, having said that, we are experiencing far too much poverty in this particular area considering the resources and potential available.

True, most of our poor are not productive members of society, the aged, illiterate, youth and handicapped, but we do not have the resources to care for them. We need greater distribution if they are to live meaningfully.

In Canada during the past two decades the poorest one-fifth has received 5 or 6 per cent of the national income, the highest one-fifth has received some forty percent. This means that the poor, and we are thinking mainly of the marginal income group or the "working poor", are not being compensated for their efforts and not being given jobs to do. This is an almost universal problem but that fact does not ease the pain. The low income man gets work, cannot survive, so he comes to society saying "I have done what you told me to do, I am working at a job to suit my skill, now what am I worth?" and society answers, "Not much, not even enough to support yourself and your dependents".

So the man who cannot find a job, or the man who finds one but is still unable to support himself and his family, is being told in clear and simple language, and loud enough for his wife and children and friends and neighbours and everyone else to hear, that he is not needed, that there is no place for him.

Newfoundland has abundance of such persons who are counted less than persons because of their misfortune. We have them in our city who are too poor to qualify for Public Housing because they want to remain independent of welfare allowances. A man earning $2,400 under Minimum wages is set alongside a Welfare recipient next door who, with his family and the value of rent, fuel, light, family allowance receives a money value of close to $4,500.00, that man needs a champion. That man needs consideration in Government planning, especially under the Canada Assistance Plan. He needs planning that is not done in a panic situation, as too much of the D.R.E.E. program was done.

Local situations need to be researched. We have a University that can handle this well. Municipalities may have to be pushed to set up "land banks", industries must be encouraged to come to the area, smaller industries must be subsidized, special training must be given to potential workers while industries are being established. Jobs thus created must be for people already here. This will mean less problems in housing, schools and services. We need income not merely for the experts who move in, but industrialization must provide at least a reasonable guarantee that needy residents will have a long-time source of employment.

In the matter of research, we must have more consultation on the local level concerning new programs, existing organizations must be encouraged to study their own problems in their area by local study groups and Improvement Committees which themselves may have to be subsidized. No program can be meaningful if it is not local and set up in accordance with studied needs and potential in mind.

Education

Newfoundland claims to have at present free and compulsory education, but this does not guarantee education of all children. Under our present inadequate system the children of the poor are severely injured. University education, heavily subsidized, is weighted greatly in favour of the affluent. Elementary education, the least subsidized of all, is not so geared that the poor are equipped to move on to graduation and enter university.

For too many children of poorer homes Grade VIII is a "dead end". We need more stress on education at the beginning, rather than heavy subsidization for those who survive to the end of high school. Scholarships are for those who can get them, not for the handicapped poor.

Too many poorer children do not have adequate words at ages 3, 4 and 5. Such children have not had the opportunity or encouragement or individual attention of educated parents to assist them to pick up the basic skills of communication and understanding of language that are a prerequisite for success in Kindergarten and Grade 1 where many have to start. After several failures and perhaps several years wearing second-hand clothing, the child wants to escape from the imprisonment of the school.

We would like to see both Governments plan for greater emphasis on pre-school training for children of disadvantaged families, so that they may have a meaningful chance to develop the abilities with which they were born.

Housing

Housing must be an important part of an anti-poverty program for Canada. Last year public housing constituted 1 per cent of all housing starts. The Government spent 60 cents per capita on subsidized housing, $5.73 on railways, $6.20 on dairy farming and $86.22 on defence. Surely we can get our priorities straighter than this. "Canada is wealthy enough to have all her citizens enjoy decent housing in the next ten years," so said Michael Audain, Consultant on Housing, Canadian Welfare Council at the recent Conference on Social Welfare. If this is so, a comprehensive program must soon begin.

In Corner Brook, according to statistics given us today, there are presently 249 applications filed for housing with the local Corporation. Of these, 47 are Welfare recipients, the balance of 202 are between $3,000.00 and $4,000.00 income level. The problem here is mainly overcrowding. Newfoundland, according to latest statistics available had 10.7 per cent overcrowding as against the Canadian average of 2.9 for metropolitan areas, and 11.5 as against national average of 8.2 for rural areas.

The local case-worker reported on three recent cases investigated in this city:

1. Thirteen children plus two parents sleeping as follows, five each in two bedrooms, three in the living room, two in a dining room, no water or sewerage facilities.

2. Ten children, two parents, two bedrooms.

3. Basement apartment housing two children, two parents, one bedroom, sewer leaking, landlord not willing to do any repairs, house condemned by the city, only ventilation is the kitchen window.

The poor are in the worst housing. The C.M.H.C. Brief to your Committee stated that in 1965, 97 per cent of N.H.A. loans went to income groups representing 60 per cent of Canadians, and that today many housing markets in Canada are available only to the upper one-third of the population. We support the Corporation's recommendations that:

1. That Public Housing units be dispersed in smaller groups.
2. Preservation and rehabilitation of neighbours.
3. Involvement of citizens in community design processed.
4. Housing allowance programs to assist lower income families.

We observe also that the most highly subsidized groups in our society are the middle and upper classes; they have the universities, recreation services and housing benefits, e.g. lower interest rates. There has to be provision made for the underprivileged to enjoy decent housing.

We recommend lower interest rates for poorer landlords to improve and renovate. Most older neighbourhoods can continue to provide good homes at modest rents.

We must find ways to encourage people to help themselves, by providing seed funds for Tenants' Associations and city Housing Councils etc. to take in all groups concerned with housing.

Government should set out to provide land at nominal cost to low income families who wish to build, often the site is the great obstacle financially.

Encourage shell housing with subsidized land costs, this with guaranteed annual income would foster initiative and pride of ownership on the part of those encouraged to build modest and practical homes.

What Can the Churches Do?

The people we are talking about are our people as well as the state's people. They need help, encouragement and guidance to enable them to help themselves.

We would say that the churches can help by assisting the poor in organizing themselves to look at their problems where they are. Recreational facilities are needed in most neighbourhoods. We can assist in organizing with the city or municipality in helping provide these facilities.

Assistance can be given in organizing Tenants' Protective Associations, organizing Penny Savers' Clubs where these people can even start their own co-operative with a little "seed money." We can organize Meals on Wheels for older citizens who have lost the interest or ability to cook nourishing meals.

We can organize local citizen volunteers for pre-nursery class assistants, for operating Day Care centres with assistance from government so that working mothers may be free to work.

We agree that wherever possible we comply with the recommendation of the Canadian Council of Churches that Churches make available a national fund (or funds) for organization of people's committees in a wide range of problems at the local level. These Committees should operate autonomously as to policy. The Churches should provide staff or money to hire staff, and help finance them on an ecumenical basis.

When we see that the Government of Canada is willing to accept their responsibility in alleviating poverty we will seek as well to do our part. We will need to educate our own people as to what poverty means and why it should receive attention, but nothing is really impossible. The poor are restless, we must see that when they awakened to a realization of their rights someone will be there with enough interest to guide them aright.

APPENDIX "B"

Report to the Senate Committee on Poverty

July 8, 1970
from the Newfoundland and Labrador
Rural Development Council

The organization known as "The Newfoundland and Labrador Rural Development Council" was organized in 1969.

Our purposes and powers are:

1. To act as a voice of rural people throughout Newfoundland and Labrador on matters of provincial and national concern, on a non partisan basis.
2. To exchange information and ideas on a regular basis between regional development associations and from rural development agencies elsewhere.
3. To stimulate improvements in all aspects of rural life in the Province by co-ordinating ideas and preparing plans for presentation to appropriate bodies.
4. To represent the Province on national organizations created for rural improvement.
5. To encourage the development of rural youth organizations.

Membership on the Council is open to elected representatives of regional organizations and our present membership total of seventeen is comprised of organizations throughout the Province.

A brief already in your hands from the Humber Valley Development Association deals with our concept of Poverty as applicable to our Province. It defines Poverty as being:

1. A need for all services presently lacking in our Province:—medical, dental, public health, and social.
2. Poverty caused by unemployment due to seasonal jobs or early retirement.
3. Indigence and the unfortunate lack of care being provided for those unable to provide for themselves.

Their brief like many others that are in your hands offers proposals and solutions to all three, but no doubt these and other solutions have been presented before to you and others before you. In return the Federal Governments have over the past ten years initiated several different policy approaches to rural poverty such as ours but, like death and taxes, rural poverty is still with us.

To quote from the brief submitted to you by the Canadian Council on rural development:

It is submitted here that the "people-oriented" participatory approach to rural development proposed by the Canadian Council on Rural Development should be adopted not only because it is right, but because it is more likely to work, more likely to prove economical than the approaches that have thus far been tried and found wanting.

Development programmes must be tailored to fit real contemporary human needs. Those include the needs for clean air and clean water, the need for a sense of dignity and worth, the need for a sense of participation.

For any development programme to ignore these needs is to court failure and failure is a luxury the poor cannot afford.

APPENDIX "C"

Submission to
THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

by

Frontier College Field Workers, Hawkes Bay, Port-au-Choix, Nfld., July 7, 1970

1. Norman and Fay McLeod, Frontier College field workers, have been engaged in adult and community development and education in west Newfoundland for the last year and a half. They spent a year in Cox's Cove, on the north coast of Bay of Islands, and they have been in Hawkes Bay for about eight months; in both cases, under contracts between the Frontier College and the provincial departments of Education, and Community and Social Development. Brief sketches of their activities in these two communities, and biographical information, can be found in the Appendix to this submission.

2. Our brief must necessarily be presented from the perspective of outsiders to this area: we are not ourselves poor, nor are we Newfoundlanders. On the other hand, we cannot produce masses of statistics and objective studies on poverty in west Newfoundland. Our observations are based primarily on our personal experiences while living and working with our neighbours in two communities.

3. We don't know an awful lot about poverty, how to define it, how it is caused, how it can be eradicated. We've both tried "studying" it, and found that the more we knew, the more we didn't know. We do, however, know a fair number of poor people. In fact, most of the people we know in both Cox's Cove and Hawkes Bay, are poor: that is, there are a lot of things they need, and a lot more things they want, that they don't have and can't get.

4. Now, it doesn't take a lot of hair-splitting about definitions of poverty to identify the west coast of Newfoundland as a poverty-stricken area: pretty well any definition will do. And to say this is an impoverished area is to say that to some extent, everyone who lives here is poor. If you live in Hawkes Bay, for example, no matter how much money you have, you still live 155 miles from the nearest hospital and 180 miles from the nearest decent school. But there are some people around here who can afford regular visits to a family doctor in Corner Brook, and can send their children somewhere else to board with relatives if they don't like what goes on in the schools here. These are not the people we mean when we talk about poor people. Most people in this area don't have that kind of choice. They are poor.¹

5. You have probably heard the argument that rural Newfoundlanders can live off the land, and so poverty here isn't so bad as it is in, say, downtown Toronto. It is true that it is cheaper, in dollars and cents, and perhaps easier on the psyche, to be poor in Newfoundland than that it is to be poor in Ontario. That is why most of the people who left Cox's Cove for a stab at "making it" in Toronto or Kitchener, including about a dozen families we interviewed in those cities a year ago, are now back in Cox's Cove. When they found that their strong backs and unskilled hands did not command a very high price, they decided they'd rather be poor in Cox's Cove than be poor in urban Ontario.

6. But it is not cheap to live in Newfoundland above the subsistence level. A man can subsist, a family can live, on a diet of fish and potatoes, for a very small outlay of cash. But the day that fruit juice and fresh vegetables become considered necessities instead of luxuries, it becomes, in fact, at least as expensive to live in Newfoundland as to live in Toronto. And if Jack ever gets a permanent job, he will no longer have time to augment the family diet with rabbit, moose meat, or fish that he jigged himself.² If you're resigned to a state of poverty, and expect to stay that way, then being poor in rural Newfoundland is probably not too bad, compared to some other places. But if you don't like being poor, if you want a better life for yourself, then it's a different picture: Newfoundland is not such a good place to be. Most of the people we know don't like being poor.

¹ On Map No. 6, in the A.R.D.A. series, "Economic and Social Disadvantages in Canada" (Project # 14021, 1964), areas coloured red indicate areas where over 50% of non-farm families outside centres of 10,000 or more—that is, rural non-farming families—have incomes under $3,000 per year from all sources, including the earnings of their children. From the south shore of Bay of Islands to St. Anthony, the west coast of Newfoundland is solid red.

7. We could go on to tell you what it is that poor people don't like about being poor; but there are poor people on this coast who can tell you how they feel much better than we can. We won't presume to speak for them. Rather, we shall focus our own brief on the concerns of our work: education, employment, and the community.

8. The poor people we know want to work. This is not just something they say because they know it's expected of them: they prove it every time there's a menial job within thirty miles of them. When Lundrigan's Limited began construction of the new bridge and the mill in Hawkes Bay, there was a great outcry in the settlement because outsiders were being hired and local men passed over. These people were screaming for jobs that paid $1.30 an hour.

9. They don't do much better at permanent employment. Wages in the sawmill and planer in Hawkes Bay range around $1.60 an hour. In the fish plant at Port-au-Choix, the men get $1.45, the women get $1.10. In both the sawmill and the fish plant, workers are trying to form unions. In the sawmill, I know for a fact that there is just one worker opposed to a union. But it's going to take a long time, and it will be a hard battle. Labour laws are especially hard on the unorganized who want to organize. Poor people have a tough time getting into unions.

10. The fishermen and the loggers do a bit better than the workers in the mill and the plant, when they're working. But fishing and logging are seasonal work. These men live half the year on unemployment insurance benefits. Unemployment insurance benefits constitute a subsistence income. That is, a poverty income.

11. What of the man who tries to change his situation? "If only I had a trade," say so many of our friends. Or, "Maybe I could do better on the mainland" (meaning, usually, Toronto). Canada Manpower has programs for retraining, upgrading, and mobility. But most people we know don't qualify for these programs. To get into the adult centre at Stephenville, you pretty well have to start from a grade seven level of basic academic skills. Not many poor people we know on this coast are functioning at that level of formal literacy.³ To qualify for a resettlement grant, you pretty well have to have a trade. The poor people we know don't have trades.

12. There are a few adults who do qualify for the Manpower programs. Five men from Hawkes Bay went to Stephenville this past winter, and two of them now have grade ten certificates. Both of these men are now working at exactly the same jobs they would have, on the mill, if they had never gone to Stephenville. Both had good employment records, as employment records go in this area, before going to Stephenville. Oh, yes, they were unemployed when they went to Stephenville in February: who wasn't, in Hawkes Bay? And the chances are that both of them will go back to school in the fall, and get some sort of trade; but the point is that the step for these men, from relative job security to full job security, is not a great one. It is not oversimplifying very much to say that those who are eligible for retraining grants, don't need it very badly; and those who need it most, aren't eligible.⁴ Vocational and "basic skill" retraining, as they are presently administered, may have a major impact in the cities—I don't know; but in rural Newfoundland, they are largely irrelevant.

12a. To most of our friends, the Manpower office in Corner Brook is simply a place where you go in the normal process of job-hunting, assuring that you qualify for unem-

⁴ The Deputy Minister of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, Tom Kent, in his brief to your committee, November 27, 1969 (para. 37), made a similar point, when he said:

"The hard fact of experience is that, unless a very special effort is made, the people who most need the help are the people who get left out. Even the best of government programs tend to work for the people who are at least already on the margin of the economy, rather than the people below the margin. It is peculiarly difficult for government policies to reach the people who are right outside the mainstream, who feel hopelessly trapped in conditions of poverty."

We dispute, however, that it is a "very special effort" (as if to say, above and beyond the call of duty) which is required. What is required is a re-examination of priorities.

ployment insurance, and sometimes, applying to go to Churchill Falls. When they get there, they are shown into a special separate room for unskilled labourers. Employees at the centre have told us that this is because unskilled labourers tend to dress poorly, shave infrequently, smell offensive, and stare at the girls' legs, thus making the counsellors and some of the higher-class applicants uncomfortable.

13. When our project in Hawkes Bay was first conceived, the provincial Department of Community and Social Development and the Northern Regional Development Association intended to persuade Canada Manpower to support our basic skills program. Preliminary applications were invited to see how much demand there would be for a centre on this coast; and over 300 applications came in from the surrounding area. Canada Manpower took copies of these applications, interviewed a number of the applicants, accepted a few into Stephenville, and rejected the vast majority as ineligible for grants, primarily because few of them had attained a grade seven level of formal education. Hence classes opened for adults last fall, with the co-operation of the provincial Department of Education, on a voluntary, night school basis.

14. We started out with over thirty students in academic upgrading classes from grades one to ten. We ended the regular school year in May with ten, four of whom received Department of Education certificates in grades eight, nine and ten. That's not a very impressive record, statistically: no better than the average night school program, of which there are a number in the province, administered and taught by day school teachers. Yet we had more time and resources for our students, more adult-oriented materials, and, quite likely, a better program than most night school teachers in Newfoundland. We lost a lot of students, through no special fault of ours, and certainly no fault of theirs. Involved as we are in the whole community, we know our dropouts just as well as we know those who stayed in classes; and we know that every one of them had good reason for dropping out. To put it in a nutshell, they had to feed their families. If a job comes up, they have to take it, even if it means working into the night. If there are no jobs, they still have to supplement their incomes with game and fish, and put in labour on their homes. And they have worries: their minds are very busy with surviving from day to day. Voluntary night school classes, no matter how well administered they are, are never going to have much impact on the employability of the poor.

15. Yet even if they could go to Stephenville on living allowances, and start a basic level of academic skills, not many would go. Even of those who qualify already, only about half of those accepted at Stephenville last fall, went. The centralization of these facilities, designed to train people into social and geographic mobility, actually presupposes the mobility of the person who attends. Financially, socially, and above all, psychologically, the undereducated poor are far from mobile. It is hard for them to pick up and move to a major centre 250 miles away from home, in search of a goal too far distant to have much meaning to them. They need to be trained into social and geographic mobility, close to home, at this basic level; and they need living allowances to do it. There is a crying need for a subsidized, decentralized program of adult basic education in Newfoundland.

16. The poor people we know are not apathetic, nor are they lacking in motivation, nor do they have values alien to you and me. They are unhappy, they are under a great deal of strain, and they are very realistic. It is because they are realistic that they devote most of their attention to making the most of what they have, and do not dare to dream that they can leave poverty permanently behind them. If they have realistic hopes, they are for better wages at their next job, union wages if at all possible, and a few community amenities, such as sewerage, better roads, and some recreation facilities. You have undoubtedly heard of a "culture of poverty". There is no culture of poverty here, for that would imply a specifically impoverished way of life valued by those who live it. The poor people we know have a way of life, much of which they value highly; but it is the things they value which are not now part of their way of life, which makes them poor. They are realistic: they have learned the hard way just how little power they have to change their situation, and they have learned to live with that fact. That is the real meaning of the "culture of poverty". The man who tries to change his situation soon learns it's not much use.

17. Collectively, the experience is similar. Economically, both of the communities we have lived in on this coast have been boom-and-bust communities. Cox's Cove has had boom and bust in the herring fishery, and marginal employment and bust in the logging industry; Hawkes Bay has seen boom and bust in the logging industry ever since it was established in 1946. Twice, the logging operations have pulled out, apparently at the whim of someone unknown in a company's head offices, leaving the whole community unemployed. These have been rather vivid lessons in powerlessness, and they have left the men of Hawkes Bay, if not permanently defeated and defeatist, at least very cynical. Few men we have talked to in Hawkes Bay expect the mill here to last more than five years.

18. Having experienced powerlessness as a community, people may try organizing in hopes of doing something about their common problems together. Too often, they meet defeat here, for they are up against forces much stronger than a single community can cope with, and if these forces are lined up against them, they are no further ahead than they were when they were not organized. When the Cox's Cove - McIvers Improvement Committee was formed, it set out to find government assistance for facilities which would make it possible to re-establish a viable fishery in their communities. The committee met with a peculiar attitude among most civil servants in the various departments they contacted: in order to get government assistance to establish a viable fishery in their communities, they would have to prove that there was a viable fishery in their communities already. The federal Department of Fisheries had statistics which showed very little activity in the fishery in Cox's Cove and McIvers; therefore, how could a civil servant justify spending public funds to establish facilities there?

19 Few of the civil servants encountered regularly by individuals and groups we know in Cox's Cove and Hawkes Bay are characterized by excessive sympathy for, understanding of, or trust in the public, in particular the poor. It is not only welfare officers and social workers, but employees in all government departments, who need new structures, new definitions of their responsibilities, to define them clearly as the servants, and not the masters, of the public.

20. On the whole, government planning and policy, especially those policies which most directly affect the lives and livelihoods of poor people, are drawn up and decided in isolation from the wishes, and the local knowledge, of the people. This can be brought home very forcefully to the organized poor, confirming in harsh reality what they had always known indirectly before they became organized. I draw again from the experiences of the Cox's Cove-McIvers Improvement Committee, around the time we were taking our leave of that community. Through strong political pressure on their provincial Member, Premier Smallwood the Committee had extracted the promise of repairs to the breakwater in Cox's Cove. Engineers from the Department of Highways were sent down to confer with the Committee about where the repairs were most needed and what sorts of materials would best be suited. They took note of the ideas of the local people returned to their head offices and came back with their own plans, which completely ignored not only the requests of the committee but also the valuable local knowledge they had been given about the cheapest and best sources of materials. Whether it was intended that way or not the people of Cox's Cove got the message from department officials. "We're going to do our damndest to ignore you."

21. I suppose we are not the only people involved in community development who occasionally feel a little hollow about our message to the people, "You can do something about it yourself." Poor people are more realistic than we: they know that it's not much use.

22. So far, we have spoken mainly about the "working poor". That is because most of the poor people we know, want to work, and do work then they can. Nearly all of them have been on short-term, "able-bodied relief", or on special supplements to augment unemployment insurance, at one time or another. But some of our friends are on long-term assistance, assistance for those who cannot work. If you've got a big enough family, and if you live in the right part of Newfoundland, long term assistance can be a better income than either able-bodied relief or seasonal work. In Cox's Cove, the working families resent the families on long-term assistance; in Hawkes Bay, they feel sorry for them. For one thing, families tend to be larger in Cox's Cove than they are here, and welfare gives you more money for each child you have. For another thing, Cox's Cove is only 26 miles away from the regional offices of the Department of Welfare. The better welfare officers are there, and there are more of them; so you can see several different workers, and it's fairly easy to take your case to the top. In Hawkes Bay, people go to one welfare officer in Port Saunders, and he has an awful lot of discretion, once he's filled the bare minimum letter of the law. Your fortunes depend on the personality of the welfare officer—whether he's a good guy or a bad guy, and if he's a bad guy, whether you're in his favour or not. Either way, you soon learn that you don't have much to do with your own fate.

23. We have not said much in our brief about the proposals of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and in particular, their plans for Hawkes Bay, Port Saunders and Port-au-Choix. That is because our brief is based primarily on our personal contacts with poor people; and to the people of this area, outside a small elite, DREE is little more than a vague rumour that the gods are about to smile on them. To us, it is evident that the working poor are soon going to experience an improvement in job security; that the jobs that will be appearing on the immediate horizon, in the fish plant, the saw-mill, the canning factory, and possibly in other plants, are not going to require massive efforts of manpower retraining—they are, at most, semi-skilled jobs; and that there will be improvements in services and facilities, such as roads, water and sewerage, and perhaps even television. With relative affluence will come a new kind of poverty: for the people now on permanent assistance will soon find themselves more readily distinguished from, and isolated from, the working men; and we know several families who already exhibit all the classic characteristics ("Low verbal facility"; "lack of goal orientation", etc.) of what become, in industrialized communities, "hard-core welfare cases". Since these changes will descend on our friends as the outcome of forces well beyond their control, it is also evident that the changes produced by economic development here will have little effect on the most basic cause and condition of poverty: social impotence.

APPENDIX:

Background of the field workers
The Frontier College field workers in Hawkes Bay are:

Norman McLeod, 26, B.A. (Queen's) M.A. (Toronto) previous experience with Frontier College as a labourer-teacher in Alberta in 1965 on a C.P.R. rail gang and in 1967, northwestern Ontario, in a large construction camp.

Fay McLeod, 26, B.A. (Alberta), M.S.W. (Toronto), with two years' experience as a caseworker for the Alberta Department of Public Welfare (Child Welfare Division), and field experience as a student in Toronto, at the Bayview Geriatrics Centre and the Family Service Agency.

The McLeods were married in April, 1968. In October, 1968, they commenced working as a husband-wife team for the Frontier College, on a community project in Cox's Cove, Nfld., under a contract between Frontier College and the provincial departments of Education, and Community and Social Development. They remained in Cox's Cove until October, 1969, and in November, began work in Hawkes Bay.

Their programs in both communities have been very broadly based, attempting to reach into every aspect of community life, through various techniques, informally conceived, employing aspects of community development, adult education and social work. Activities in Cox's Cove included sewing and knitting classes for women and children; dissemination of information on birth control; study groups for men on community problems; establishment of a library in the community; basic education classes; assistance in organization, and a degree of social animation, leading to the formation of a development committee and the organization of local government; and even, in a very informal manner, a certain amount of individual counselling.

Hawkes Bay is, of course, a different community, and the program here has evolved somewhat differently. There was a heavy initial emphasis on adult basic education, and formal education for adults in general: it was a specific request for this service which brought the Frontier College into Hawkes Bay. The program of classes included English, mathematics and science from grades 1 to 10; typing; and sewing, all of which took up five nights a week throughout the winter. During the winter, the McLeods sought also to become involved with the total community, through work with youth groups; assisting a group of women to organize a play to raise funds for a community playground; and some work with community leadership around local problems and issues. In the spring, while classes were still in full swing, the field workers began broadening their contacts in the community through social animation techniques; and as classes have necessarily slowed down to a lighter schedule for the summer, study groups among the men and organizational work among the women have begun, seeking to increase the involvement of citizens in community affairs. Typing and sewing classes are still continuing, as well as regular tutoring sessions with academic students.

A summary report of the Cox's Cove project is available from Frontier College head office, and a similar report on the Hawkes Bay project will be available soon after the termination of the project at the end of October, 1970.

APPENDIX "D"

Brief

Presented by Northern Regional Development Association Committee, Zone No. 1, Bonne Bay-Trout River.

We speak of nine communities, from Daniel's Harbour to Trout River, with approximately 7000 people. The area has no industries and is apparently not being considered in the program under discussion here. In the past, however, the area supported considerable economic activity: commerce, fishing, boat building and food processing (fish and fruits).

Considering the large sums of money involved in the DREE program, we pose the question of possible allocation of small sums to local Development Committees for their projects. These Committees have given much thought and discussion to their problems and, on the basis of local commitment, have made reasonable requests to the Provincial Government.

As example, we give you the preamble to an outline of projects written by the Tourist Committee of Northern Regional Development Association, Zone No. 1 of Bonne Bay-Trout River:

The Committee has drawn up an over-all scheme for the beginning of a gradual build-up of tourism into a major factor in the area...

The area has been famous for its magnificent scenery since the last century and is acknowledged to be outstanding in Eastern North America. The natural environment and the picturesque settlements offer a wide variety of attractions as they stand, among them the following: hiking, hill-walking and rock-climbing; ideal sailing and boating on two big inlets and three exceptionally lovely ponds; good fishing on the ponds and rivers and also on the open sea and on the two inlets where mackerel and tuna abound in the tourist season; game of all kinds to be seen on the hills; in winter scenery resembling alpine country and offering fine touring on snowshoe, skis or ski-doos. All these pursuits are readily available to the enterprising and experienced, but so far there are no facilities for the average tourist to enjoy them.

From experts in the field, from numerous publications and reports and from first-hand experience of other places, there is no doubt that the development to the maximum of the tourist potential of an area acts as a stimulant to all aspects of life, industry and trade. The scheme to develop tourism will tie in with any other industries developed in the area with reciprocal benefit. An exception would be any industry that destroys or pollutes the natural environment and makes it unattractive for visitors.

The cost of helping to develop a tourist industry is negligible compared to that of any other industry. It brings income to the people, both directly and indirectly, and this is widely distributed throughout the area and stays in it. Later developments by commercial concerns will add valuable jobs, but the majority of the income from these will go to the owners who may not even be in the Province. If local communities and individuals are encouraged to provide all the facilities they can in the beginning, the development of commercial enterprises later on will not completely by-pass them.

The scheme is designed to involve the communities as much as possible and to increase the number of visitors gradually so that the skills required for catering for them will be gained by experience, without the need for much outside help. If the "Community School" suggested for this area comes into being, groups would be encouraged to study some of the important aspects of catering for tourists.. (end of quotation)

The plans outlined were 1. public relations and information. 2. increased accommodation. 3. facilities for enjoyment of natural amenities, 4. special events.

The proposal then continues:

"If these simple plans prove successful in the coming year, more ambitious ones can be developed in future. Individuals will see ways to add to their income by providing needed services and thus the area will achieve its own independent tourist industry...If and when the National Park becomes a reality, the communities on the fringe will stand to gain considerably from it. By setting up the beginnings of their own tourist industry now, the communities will be then able to offer a wide range of accommodation and holiday activity as the number of visitors gradually grows. Even if the National Park proposal is shelved, it is certain that the influx of summer visitors to Bonne Bay will increase and that Bonne Bay has an obligation as well as an opportunity to provide services for them."

The Government reply, in refusing any aid to any project put forward stated: "...Your rationale seems to be based on the assumption that if you increase the supply of tourism, the people of Bonne Bay will invest in projects to extract money from the tourist in return for goods and services.

This is the assumption I question. Your assumption may be likened to assuming that if you place more fish in the sea, fishermen will catch more. When in fact fishermen may not be catching the existing fish due to lack of equipment or knowledge or market"...

It has so far been impossible to make Government see that we are seeking equipment and knowledge to catch the fish we have.

This Committee believes that several small industries could be organized with little capital. For example, the seasonal industry of harvesting and processing wild soft fruits such as bakeapples, raspberries, squash and partridge berries could be profitable. If the Park were developed, it would contain some of the finest berry-lands and these could be harvested under controlled conditions. Outside the Park areas, land could be leased to responsible people for the cultivation and protection of the area and for controlled picking.

Multi-use fish plants, small enough to be operated by local residents have not been considered. Nor has the development of the deep water harbour of Bonne Bay as a center of boat building and repair.

In preparation for the National Park, three or four workers could be employed on the Northwest coast, preparing people for the new opportunities by way of training; all that is needed is a slight variation in the ways people now have of doing things. The workers, intelligent and aware and familiar with the area, could choose people to be trained for various occupations; at present, training in the various technical schools is regarded as a way of making an immediate living and not as a preparation for further employment.

Many of our villages are not ready for resettlement. They need practical encouragement and support and development of initiative based on their own skills. If Government feels it must do something for these people, it should first listen to the people and with open mind consider their needs and skills.

Our only resource is in the natural beauty of our surroundings and what we can make of that. Tourism is the obvious industry for this area with a small sum of money, administered by local Development Committees, the industry would grow and thrive.

Submission to
THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

by

THE INTERNATIONAL GRENFELL ASSOCIATION

July, 1970

History of I.G.A.

The International Grenfell Association or I.G.A. as it is commonly called was founded as a medical mission by a young doctor from England, Wilfred T. Grenfell in 1892.

Grenfell saw the need in the area for hospitals and organized leadership. The Coast at this time was settled sparsely by "livyers" (those that stayed year round) who subsisted barely from the land and the sea. The policy of the Mission was to combine with the medical work, other activities that are for the welfare of the people.

Grenfell, in his books, describes the people on the coast as "demoralized and an impoverished people".

The people along the coast were exploited shamefully by the fish merchants, ignored by the Colonial Government, riddled with T.B., rickets, scurvy and beri-beri. They were so deeply in debt that they were a forsaken people. With no insurance, fishing gear and equipment that was destroyed in storms meant total devastation for a family. Law and order was non-existent. To those people Grenfell was an angel from another world. From the decks of his ship, he gave out pills, clothes, advice and companionship.

A hospital was built in St. Anthony in the early 1900's which became the headquarters of the Mission. A Children's Home was built in St. Anthony, Cartwright, and North West River. Workers were brought in to stimulate handicrafts, and other projects for Grenfell was determined to make the people self-sufficient. A farm was established to provide fresh eggs, milk and meat. A dry-deck was built, along with a work shop, a power plant and water reservoirs which made the Mission self-operating.

By the 1920's the Mission was rapidly expanding. One decade of 1950-1960 saw a phenomenal growth. The age of the air ambulance was introduced to the Mission and in 1968 a new modern hospital was completed in St. Anthony.

Today, I.G.A. operates five hospitals and fourteen nursing stations. The Mission also maintains handicraft industries, marine railway, machine ship, dormitories, three air ambulances and Hospital ships.

The Northern Peninsula and Southern Labrador cover a major proportion of the total area of the Province. There are a number of major centres; Daniel's Harbour, Hawkes Bay, St. Anthony, Main Brook, Rod-dickton and Forteau, Labrador. The Daniel's Harbour area lacks employment opportunities and the economic prospects are not good. There is a Heavy dependence on Government Assistance. The main source of income is the fishery and woods work. The cod fishery is not significant in this area and the fishermen rely a great deal on the lobster and herring fishery which has not been good in recent years.

There have been increased woods activities to the north of this area. This area must look to the woods industry more.

Hawkes Bay, sixty miles north of Daniel's Harbour, was a progressive woods industry town in the 1950's. This area supplies Bowater's with a large quantity of raw materials. This operation gave a good deal of employment. However, this operation was severely cut back causing serious unemployment.

This year a chip mill was completed in Hawkes Bay. The operation will give employment for eight to twelve men in the plant and twenty-five to thirty outside. The plant will give a slight lift to the area, but more needs to be done. Hawkes Bay has been selected as a region for some of the D.R.E.E. funds.

There is great potential in the woods operation in this area and there could be an industry producing wood products.

The fishing in the area is also a potential. Port Aux Choix, twenty-five miles north of Hawkes Bay has done considerably well.

A new fish plant was completed there two years ago. This has become a strategic point, as in recent years the fishery has been the best in the province. There has been a fleet of longliners operating out of this settlement from the rest of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

Port Saunders is included in this area. Port Saunders is situated between Hawkes Bay and Port Aux Choix. This settlement has a population of approximately 1000. It relies on the fishery and woods operation. There are less than eight longliner owners there, and thus the other fishermen are still using antiquated methods.

The people have complained a great deal about foreign trawlers and many fishermen have lost their gear. Special requests were made to Ottawa to rectify this.

St. Anthony's population is approximately 3500. There are two main sources of employment here; the International Grenfell Association which employs 370 permanent persons and approximately 45 seasonal employees and the fish processing plant which seasonally employs about 250 persons.

Outside St. Anthony, the main industry is the inshore fishery. While the catches have been relatively low, the prices for fish have been low, thus many fishermen received low rates of unemployment insurance payments.

The Main Brook—Roddickton area at one time was fairly well off economically. Bowaters accounted for a great deal of the employment through its woods operations. Main Brook was used as a port for the export of all the pulp wood. The settlement is mainly a woods town, however, since Bowaters has slowed down in this area. Main Brook has increased poverty problems. The price of newsprint decreased causing the operation in the area unprofitable in Bowaters' sense.

Roddickton is primarily a wood town. Chester Dawe had a thriving lumber industry here and shut down three years ago. He attempted to sell his operations, however, no one was interested. With the shut-down of his operations, and the slow down of the Bowater operation, unemployment increased greatly.

The Forteau area depends solely on the inshore fishery for a livelihood. During the last few years the fishery industry could only be described as a total failure. Many fishermen were unable to cover their expenses.

With this overview of our area, we shall delve into the core of this brief-poverty, and how it affects our life here.

Definition of Poverty

The first task then will be to define poverty as seen in this area. Poverty is the ultimate concern of economics and all economists.

Because pockets of poverty remain in the richest of countries, many economists are deeply concerned about equalization. Even with the achievement of "affluence" in the more industrialized countries, there is still a prominent proportion of poverty in certain areas.

What is Poverty?

One cannot define poverty with one simple definition. One is faced with the great differences among different areas and the inadequacy of any single criterion for spotting it. Poverty includes quantity comparisons with richer areas in the fields of Health, for example, can be measured by death rates, life expectancy, infant mortality, and the like. Education can be measured by literacy and the proportion of the relevant age-groups completing primary, secondary and university education. Per capita incomes are another indication.

Our problem is thus reduced to finding the figures or definitions that will provide an approximation so a measure of the incidence of poverty in our area can be reorganized. The level of per capita income is a start, but it does not tell us enough. We must know something about the distribution of income, including the impact on disposable income of government intervention in the form of taxation and expenditure on public services.

One of the most striking factors of depressed areas is what has been called a "technological dualism": the division of the economy into two distinct and radically different sectors, one technologically advanced and the other technologically retarded.

It is this retarded or "traditional" sector in which is found handicraft or cottage industries and very small scale industries and outmoded fishery methods. In this traditional sector, the techniques are themselves traditional, sometimes centuries old, highly labour-intensive, causing productivity to be correspondingly low.

From this base, we shall illustrate how poverty has affected education, welfare, communications, and the vicious circle that has evolved.

Education and Economic Development

For centuries, economists have emphasized the importance of "human investment".

Today, the conviction among economic development planners that human resources yield particularly high returns is so strong that there is a maxim among them, "when in doubt, educate". Development planners tend to feel that when they are confronted with seemingly impossible problems of establishing priorities and allocating development resources, they can never make a mistake by putting a lot of money into education—meaning here not only formal education but all aspects of training as well, including adult education, literary campaigns, vocational and technical training, fishing extension work and the like.

What is education? This is a basic problem. We have accepted the fact that our area is backward but how do we go about the reconstruction process. Is it to educate ourselves into a new sort of life consistent with the spirit of science and yet retraining the fundamentals of humanity and its ideals? This is one of the most pressing obligations of a progressive society. It is to this end that efforts must be directed.

Education

In dealing with education, one finds two types of poverty; that is an economic type and an impoverished type. The economic type includes persons who are backward intelligently. These persons have not been exposed to the outside. They have been isolated totally. These people have had no opportunity to communicate with the outside and have not been given the chance to develop.

The impoverished type include those people who have been neglected by modern methods. These people have high intelligence quotas, but have no basic knowledge because they have been deprived of a good solid background.

This second class is very evident in our area. Three years ago children from the smaller communities began to be bused into St. Anthony schools. Many of these children were intelligent but they were so far behind children in St. Anthony, that they set themselves apart. They were used to seeing only their own environment, and they could not adjust to a different one.

The school found these children were not able to express themselves. The Supervisor of Education for this area felt that bringing the children in from the smaller communities was a great step forward. He felt that in the last six years the standard of education in the smaller communities has greatly decreased.

In discussing the topic with the supervisor, he felt that exposing the children in this area was the greatest difficulty. This could be solved a great deal by utilization of guidance counsellors and special education groups. He stated that the Newfoundland government made special application for this type of education this year. However, it could not be applied in this area because of space in the school building.

Isolation is a basic factor and everything connected with education revolves around this phenomenon. No connection with the outside is fundamental to our life here. There is no understanding of the outside and how things are done.

This leads to a lack of incentive and initiative by individuals. There are two types of motivation: firstly, motivation for a better standard of living, and secondly motivation to be comfortable in isolation.

After living in isolation, most people find it very hard to adjust to the busy life of the outside.

The Supervisor of Education pointed out the difficulty in getting teachers to go to meetings and conferences in major centres of the province. Likewise, he stated, the difficulty in getting them to take responsibility. This attitude is inherent in isolation—cutting oneself off totally from any external forces.

While discussing the present educational structure, that is the elementary school and high school, the Supervisor felt that the high school was not meeting the needs of the area. He felt that the high school caters to university potentials only, and the majority of the students become drop-outs. Last year the number of graduates from the area that entered university were less than eight. He felt compulsory education was too long, thus cutting out opportunity for apprenticeships. An example of this: a boy failing grade nine twice is pushed on to Grade ten where he again fails twice. He is then pushed into Grade eleven where he fails twice and finally drops out, holding a Grade eight diploma. This boy is now twenty-one and frustrated.

The Supervisor agreed with a suggestion for vocational courses combined with some required academic courses in high school. He suggested a "Junior College"—an institution where drop-outs can obtain a vocation and where adults studies are given. Here the drop-out becomes up-graded and receives a trade. This gets away from the frustration of the classroom.

This type of education was practiced by Grenfell in the early 1900's. When the Grenfell Mission built schools in this area and Labrador, the curriculum was complemented by special training courses for the children. These courses involved cooking, dress-making, preserving foods and the like for the women. The men took carpentry, boat building, nets and gear and other practical courses.

The population was then augmented by compulsory academic courses and practical knowledge that was fundamental to life here. Many argue today that people were further ahead with this type of education than today. This is a matter of opinion, however, more stress needs to be placed on technical courses and practical courses. The majority of students stay in the area and do not further their education past Grade ten or eleven. There is a great void meeting the needs of the great number of people found in this group. A few move to major centres where they attend Vocational schools; however they return to seek employment. If they cannot find the job they were trained for, most are quite content to accept anything in order to stay at home. This is a type of "retardation to progress" that is common in all depressed areas.

We find ourselves in a vicious circle, these types that prefer to stay at home lack initiative and shun responsibility. It is these people that make up the majorities and are left to run our local affairs.

The people in the area seem to have an ingrowth, in the sense they do not seek counsel from outside the area to improve their situation. So we never improve our situation as the cream of our population often leave, leaving the drop-outs and similar types to run things. The educational system has not given individuals self-assurance. For the most part, people bottle up when given the opportunity to make suggestions, or given the opportunity to better their situation. Newfoundlanders are generally known for this phenomena. It dates back through the centuries and is the result of being an island and being cut off from the rest of Canada.

One of the basic problem in the educational system here is the lack of qualified teachers. The high schools are fairly well staffed, however the elementary schools often lack good leadership. Thus, the children lack a good foundation for later education in the high schools and universities. Often it is because of the poor foundation that children can not cope in the high schools where demands are made on them.

Another problem is getting the people concerned about their situation and to motivate them to act. An experiment was carried out in the Fogo area by the Memorial University Extension Program some years ago. The process involved filming the people of the area in their daily tasks and interviews held with people of that area. Different attitudes were expressed in the film by the people. It was not until the film was taken back and shown to that area did the people suddenly realize their situation and sought to improve their lot.

The people were amazed at what they saw about themselves and realized that they had never seriously looked at themselves. One could argue for more of this type of study for depressed areas. Once the people begin to realize the importance of improving their own situation themselves, the negative attitude that is so dominant will change, issuing in a new encouraged attitude by all.

Welfare

Welfare is another grave problem. There are approximately 600 persons on long term assistance and 700 persons on short term assistance in the White Bay area. Long term assistance may run into a number of years. While short term assistance is from a few months to a year.

Welfare is directly related to poverty. Welfare is the result of poor economic conditions or disabilities in individuals. More, Welfare is the result of poor economic conditions for the most part. It has been the philosophy of the Department of Welfare to furnish financial assistance on the basis of need as they see it. The payments are determined by the Department to provide adults or families who are unable to provide in whole or in part by their own effort, necessities essential to maintain a normal, healthy existence.

Able bodied relief accounts for the major proportion of payments made in this area.

This is largely due to low prices for fish. The last five years have been poor and a good number of fishermen were unable to cover their expenses. All those fishermen seeking relief are using traditional fishing methods that were used three centuries ago.

There are a fair number of people who have sold their gear and have been content to go directly on relief. Many people find this is the only answer. The proportion of this type going on relief is alarmingly large. As a fisherman stated, "why go on fishing—working from 5 a.m. to 9 p.m. for a few dollars, when I can go on relief and stay home all day and get relief".

Department of Welfare do not always face the facts along this line. They state that this type of person is a small minority and not significant to merit mention in their annual report.

One cannot argue against Welfare assistance as every individual should be given the chance to "comfortable living". However, one could argue that the relief payments given, do nothing to improve the families' situation. It keeps them living from day to day and that is all. There is no social work done in this area. The Department feels that because the numbers on Welfare are related to economic conditions which are poor, their function is namely one of keeping the people alive.

There have been suggestions for work projects for persons on Welfare. This has received positive attention and one could argue that it needs to be implemented. Straight handouts are demoralising and have lifeless effects on those who receive them.

One of the main problems of those on Welfare is basic knowledge in money management. The assistance is often wasted on non-essentials and the like.

Some feel that the Department of Welfare does not do enough. For instance, they seldom check to see how the assistance was spent.

There is a great need for social workers. A lot of our problems are related to a type of backwardness and retardation of a type. This can be found more prevalent in smaller isolated communities where there is a great deal of inter-marriage.

The Memorial Extension Program is a step in the right direction in remedying the basic lack of knowledge in many of these smaller communities where the people are completely lacking in any type of family management. However, this program only touches a few towns and cannot meet total needs.

The biggest task of the Welfare Department should be one of education—that is teaching their dependancies means of a better living. At present this is not being practiced, however, the Department has long range plans for more of this type of assistance. For instance, those on Welfare shopping in the local supermarket usually buy bread, T.V. dinners, sweet biscuits, frozen vegetables and the like. While the low income family buys flour, meat, tin vegetables and other basic essentials. The main argument here is that those on assistance just do not have the basic knowledge in good family spending.

Welfare benefits have greatly increased in this area in the last five years. This is largely due to the depressed economy that has set in, in this period. In the pre 1964 era, the fishery was moderately good and road construction was at a maximum. Generally jobs were easy to come by, and the unemployment level was low. With the completion of roads, other construction projects, and the poor fishery, unemployment has greatly increased. Thus, the Department of Welfare was called upon to assist in supplementing the family's income.

This in itself is not bad, as the cause for poverty is a symptom of social disfunction. However, as the Welfare benefits are presently structured it is difficult, and one could argue impossible, for the deprived person or group to better his lot.

In dealing with this problem requires a great deal of effort on the part of many services. These services must be integrately planned for different areas, as the problems of one area are often completely different from another. Co-operation will have to exist between the Welfare Department and the Education Department whereby, the two can act as a brain to the extent of further services.

The Canadian Welfare Council in 1966 concluded in a study that low educational levels often determines a person's position with regard to poverty. Thus, it will be up to the two Departments to act efficiently for continued progress along those lines.

Communications

This phenomena affects poverty in many ways. Because we have no live television, no newspaper, one radio station relayed from Corner Brook and a very poor road, our isolation is established.

Isolation is a basic aspect of poverty. This affects education immensely.

With no live television, the area is not kept up to date on the affairs of the outside. Not only by the news coverage of television but also through television-new trends are introduced and new methods of living seen.

Television is very beneficial in education the people and generally broadening their mind and increasing general knowledge. It is hoped that this area will receive live television within the next year. This should be a positive step in the progress desired.

The road is another very 'touchy' topic. As you may have realized, one only comes over the road when one has to. We have two scheduled E.P.A. flights a week if the weather is good, landing on the gravel air strip. This schedule is hampered by fog and stormy weather and only operates successfully in the summer months. In the spring the air strip is washed out, and the Air Ambulances are often grounded for as long as a month.

It is hoped that the airstrip will be paved. It has been under water for some time, and it is hoped that positive action will be taken on this essential link with the outside.

The road has helped the area considerably since it was completed nine years ago. We now receive fresh fruit etc. year round. Because the road is gravel the cost of transportation is extremely high. This road is the longest gravel road in Canada, 320 miles. The road has linked up tiny communities scattered along the coast and brought many of them together.

With the opening of the area by the road, many isolated communities missed by the road have been resettled in areas linked by the road. This whole resettlement program has been under study and there have been many arguments placed pro and con as to the results of such a program. In this area, one could argue that the results have been poor and those resettled have been placed on relief, whereas before they had a type of home industry of fishing and gardening in their tiny isolated settlements. The social aspects of this re-settlement are varied and do not belong to the scope of this paper.

The road has contributed to a limited number of tourists in this area. It has been argued that if the road was paved the numbers would immensely increase. Many reports have reached us, that tourists upon reaching the gravel road quickly turn around and spend their holiday elsewhere.

There is a great potential in this area for tourists as sport fishing is excellent, the scenery is beautiful, the traditional life awes many, and the Viking interest some.

Recommendations for Development

Few depressed areas have been without substantial improvements in techniques in the past. The problem is not merely one of introducing some degree of improvement in techniques, it is a matter of raising the rate of technological progress. Nevertheless, there are many problems with regard to increasing the rate of technological progress in depressed areas.

A high rate of technological advances require both invention and innovations, that is, it requires that new techniques be not only discovered, but brought into use. Unfortunately, most depressed areas have limited indigenous entrepreneurisms. True, government may replace private enterprise as an innovator. Government enterprise has disadvantages for development in depressed areas. Most depressed areas are very short of trained people at the top levels of government. If these people concentrate on development policies and problems, they neglect regular duties of good government. The result is bad administration which is one of the main barriers to economic development.

Any comprehensive program for economic development demands the development of sophisticated inventory of resource endowments, an appraisal of present systems of resources, utilization, an analysis of cultural and physical obstacles to resource potentials, plus one must take into account conflicting use and demands for given resources.

Looking at our potentials, two resources are evident. Fishing could be a main industry for seven months of the year. The present size of the fish plant should be tripled. A large fleet of fifty to sixty long liners and draggers should be utilized. This would be an immense boost to the area.

Presently, the policy for subsidies for long liners are inadequate. A man must come up with a 10 per cent down payment before he can qualify for the subsidy. This is practically impossible for most fishermen. Possibly this 10 per cent could be paid once the fishermen have begun their operations. Many fishermen feel this would be a better set-up and many more would apply for the subsidy. Longliners have been built in St. Anthony, and the Grenfell Mission have the facilities of a marine railway offering a good centre for construction and maintenance of a fleet of longliners and trawlers.

Presently, cod and salmon are the concentrated species sought by fishermen of this area. The foreign fleet diversifies its operation as should be done with the inshore fishery, especially shell fish, crab, herring, scallops, and the like. Many of these types are plentiful but not exploited.

The main complaint with regard to the foreign fleet is that these fleets drag a large proportion of the fish and disposing of the waste, supply feeding ground for the fish, thus these fish stay off the land some 30 to 40 miles—too far out for the inshore fishery.

A second resource found in the area is timber. In the Hare Bay-Roddickton area the timber stand is significant. Suggestions have been made for shorter road link to the logging and lumbering area. These suggestions include a road from the airstrip along the bottom of Hare Bay to Roddickton. Now the road runs over the top of the peninsula along the West Coast to Plum Point by-passing the timber stand, and also making the road length 180 miles instead of a possible 60 miles.

This potential road would open up the interior where there is a fair proportion of good farm land. Also, this road would link up with an area that is a potential park site. The site is situated approximately twenty-five miles from St. Anthony, on the potential road mentioned to Hare Bay. It includes an area of five square miles of forest, a large lake and beautiful mountains. This is an ideal fishing area as well as skiing in the winter.

With a good paved road and a park area, this area would become a potential tourist attraction.

A co-operative movement is practiced here. The present Co-operative Society established by Grenfell has lost its purpose. The people do not understand the meaning of a CO-OP and have defeated themselves. The CO-OP could be an industry within itself. As it stands today, it is no different from any of the other private enterprises. This type of Society needs to be re-established in areas such as this, and the people need to understand the purpose of such a society.

Conclusion

We conclude that this area is depressed as evidenced by this brief. The people are deprived of cultural, technological and educational advances felt by other areas of Canada. Because we are isolated we experience the frustration of a lack of any link with progress.

We hope that through the actions of an intelligent government, this area will receive the assistance that is needed, in order that the people of the area may share in the program and 'Just Society' that is applicable in the rest of Canada.

APPENDIX "F"

Having carefully looked over the area known as the Northern Peninsula, there is no difficulty to see poverty in abundance in many places. Those conditions exist because there is no opportunity for many of the workers to obtain work.

We all agree that not all of the men would take work if offered them but the majority would; and because they are not able to find suitable employment they are living in a state of poverty. Most of the poverty is among the class of people who have lived through the hard times when this whole area was an isolated area. There were no schools or a school with no teacher.

Children were not able to get an education, therefore, are now not able to take skilled labour or when looking for work the first question asked them, "What education do you have"? The answer has to be none or very little—consequently, no work. He is then found to live in poverty, not by choice but by circumstances over which he has no control.

Poverty caused by being unemployed or underpaid can be cured. Poverty caused by an inability to rise above the conditions one finds oneself in, regardless of effort, cannot be cured. This we will deal with first. For example, two men start out in life at the same time. After a few years, a comparison is made. They are both carpenters by trade getting the same wage. Having the same number in family, one lives very comfortably while the other finds it very hard to get the bare necessities of life. When Christ said, "The poor ye have with you always", he could foresee circumstances over which society could have very little or no control. Thus we know that regardless of opportunity, regardless of efforts of alleviation, the same circumstances will exist.

Poverty caused by unemployment or poor wages is different. This, without doubt, is unnecessary in a country such as Canada. Someone once said, "Only fools and horses work". This could be true but there are thousands willing and eager to earn a livelihood for their families in Canada today, but the opportunity is not there. Surely, the brains that can run the affairs of the country, many of them in an efficient way, could pool their intellect in such a way that those who would rather earn their living by the sweat of their own brow than the sweat of somebody else's brow be given the chance to do so.

We do not believe that those responsible for employment should only think in terms of whether a certain project could have a certain yield but think in terms of how many could be employed; then, if a deficit occurs, subsidize.

Years ago enterprising people would start small industries. Now with all the regulations to deal with, the forms to deal with, and the reports to make out, half of them unnecessary, the same type of people would rather be the employees than the employers.

We think that small business, whether in fish, agriculture, real estate, or whatever it might be, should be encouraged to the full.

BRIEF TO THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

CARTWRIGHT, LABRADOR

Introduction

This short brief, prepared by the undersigned residents of Cartwright, is presented to the Senate Committee on Poverty with the intent of providing a capsule outline of problems, potentials and general conditions in the Sandwich Bay area of the southern coast of Labrador. It is hoped that it will aid the committee in its assessment of both the causes and effects of economic disparity and poverty in southern Labrador. The brief is in no way comprehensive nor does it pretend to represent a consensus of the community of Cartwright. It is an outline of the situation as perceived by the contributors who have an interest and concern for the development and welfare of this area. They assume full responsibility for the contents herein.

Population

Cartwright with a population of slightly over 800 people, is the largest community on the southern coast of Labrador. It serves as the centre for the Sandwich Bay area. This area includes all habitation between West Bay to the north and Seal Islands to the south. Within this area are the winter communities of North River, Paradise River, Cartwright, Porcupine Bay and Black Tickle. Former winter inhabitants of Spotted Island, Batteau, and Seal Island now reside in Cartwright during the winter. The total population for the area is close to 1,200.* Three quarters of the Cartwright population return to small and scattered fishing stations during the summer months. The people of Paradise River, North River and Porcupine Bay also scatter to summer fishing stations. Most families return to their winter homes by the end of September.

*For a detailed demography see "Community Inventory of Labrador", A. Prince Dyke, Dept. of Labrador Affairs, Confederation Building, St. John's, Nfld., March 1969.

Employment

Cartwright began to develop as a large centre when the U.S.A.F. radar site offered employment opportunities starting in the early 1950's. While many men were employed as casual labourers during the construction phase of the site, it levelled off to a permanent employment of local people of about 20, once the site became operational. This employment injected approximately $150,000 in wages into the local economy. In 1968, the U.S.A.F. withdrew from the site, reducing local employment to 8 men who have been employed by Canadian Marconi Company, which continues to operate the site under contract to the U.S.A.F. This local labour force is likely to be phased out by the end of 1970. Out of a labour force of approximately 275 men and women, there are in Cartwright about 50 employed in permanent positions (i.e. teachers, nurses, police, store personnel, govt. depts., and Bell Telephone). The only present opportunity for the remaining labour force in the Sandwich Bay area is the inshore fishery. Wage opportunities do exist at Goose Bay and in central Labrador at Churchill Falls, Labrador City and Wabash, but most of these opportunities require a trained and skilled labour force, which is lacking on the southern coast of Labrador.

Marine Resources

The inshore fishery in the Sandwich Bay area depends upon two species, Atlantic Salmon and Atlantic Cod. The salmon are caught in fixed gill nets. Total production of salmon varies between 200,000 and 300,000 lbs. in normal years. Although a few crews harvest 10,000 to 15,000 lbs. of salmon, most crews average 4000 to 5000 lbs. Total yields per unit of effort have declined over the years and this high priced fish is now under heavy pressure in offshore waters. Salmon fishing realizes the highest profits for fisherman and merchant alike on the southern coast of Labrador. Current competitive market values bring 50 to 70 cents per lb. to the fisherman.

The cod fish has always been the mainstay of the inshore Labrador fishery, and the Sandwich Bay area, including the Domino region, has produced some of the highest yields per unit of effort for the Labrador coast. In good years, 2 million lbs. of fish (20,000 quintals) have been caught between West Bay and Seal Islands. These fish have been caught in fixed cod traps and in recent years also in fixed gill nets. This method of fishing depends upon the fish coming to the fisherman, however, and consequently the fishery is always a gamble. In the past two years, in fact, the cod fishery has been a total failure on the southern coast of Labrador.

The fishery has other difficulties besides the risk of failure. In the Sandwich Bay area, all of the codfish produced is marketed as heavy salt bulk fish. Revenue is lost through shrinkage and also through lack of quality control. There are no processing plants on the coast, and the centuries old mercantile system prevails. In the Sandwich Bay area there is little actual exchange of cash. Supplies are given to fishermen on credit and in many cases even fishing gear is rented out. Cod and salmon both have been sold to the merchant on open receipt and it is usually not until the "squaring up" in the fall that the fisherman knows what he will receive for his fish. This situation is now in the process of change due to the presence of competitors for salmon buying and due to the newly created Salt Fish Marketing Development Corporation, but for generations the fishery has been an exploitive one, with all the risks going to the fishermen and the bulk of the profits to the exporter and merchant. This system has offered a degree of security in that the fisherman is never allowed to go under, but seldom is he able to accumulate capital to innovate, to adopt new fishing techniques and to take advantage of new markets.

A number of marine species which are to be found in abundance in certain years are not commercially harvested at all. Herring, mackerel, trout, and arctic char have been abundant in the past two years of codfish failure, but were ignored for lack of processing facilities and marketing outlets. A number of species of seals are another marine resource which are not taken full advantage of owing to lack of harvesting, processing, and marketing facilities.*

In summary, neither the capital, the equipment, the training, the information, nor the encouragement are available or accessible to produce the necessary economic flexibility to take full advantage of the marine resources in the Sandwich Bay area and, indeed, along the whole of the southern coast of Labrador. Thus, the poverty of this area is rooted in the underdevelopment of economic and human resources rather than in the lack of these resources. Such poverty manifests itself in the growing dependence upon transfer payments to maintain the economy, particularly as cash needs grow with the demand for such new technology and innovations as skidoos, outboard engines, telephones, and modern community services. Moreover, with the centralization of the population of the Sandwich Bay area into Cartwright, subsistence income, particularly from country foods, has decreased, with the consequent increased dependence upon costly imported goods at the local stores.

Forest Resources

The only major apparent alternative for development on the southern coast of Labrador is in timber resources. In the Sandwich Bay area there are sufficient timber stands to support a logging or pulpwood operation up to a maximum of 150,000 cords per year without any danger of depleting the supply. To the south, St. Michaels Bay, Alexis Bay, and St. Louis Bay could, in combination, provide a sustained yield of 150,000 cords per year also. For 8 months out of 12, a forest industry could rely upon a dependable supply of local labour in these 4 bays of at least 150 men, with a potential labour force of close to 400 men. Sandwich Bay offers excellent road building conditions and good harbours for loading ships. Moreover, its navigation season is 2 months longer than that of Hamilton Inlet and Lake Melville. The same is true for the 3 bays to the south. Nearly all the forest resources of southern Labrador are presently held in concessions by private corporations and entrepreneurs.

Development Capital

Although there exists development potential in both the fishery and in forest products, development capital has not been put into the Sandwich Bay area. On the Federal level, the southern coast of Labrador has been excluded from the ARDA Agreements and the Incentive Acts of DREE. Since the provincial government depend upon these funds for their own development programmes, there has been little input from that quarter also. The southern coast of Labrador does not even have access to the funds available to the northern coast of Labrador, which is eligible to receive a million dollars per year through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development because there are Eskimos and Indians living in northern Labrador. Yet, there are also white settlers living there and benefitting from such aid. The economy and way of life in southern Labrador differs little from that of northern Labrador, and certainly third and fourth generation white settlers (many with some degree of Eskimo and Indian Blood) are as much native to the coast now as are the Indians, Eskimos and Settlers of northern Labrador.

*See "Fisheries Development in Labrador", Memorial University of Nfld., May 1966.

Transportation and Communications

The lack of adequate transportation and communication prevents or inhibits the growth of business and industry which is directly related to poverty all along the South Labrador Coast.

The modes of transportation are aircraft in winter and spring and shipping and aircraft in summer and fall. The only aircraft transportation from early December until June is on a space available basis on any chartered aircraft that might come this way, subject to the charterer allowing incidental passengers aboard the aircraft. The incidental fare from Cartwright to Goose Bay, a distance of 142 air miles, is $28.00. Other than that, an individual or business wishing to travel on, or to and from the coast, must charter. This method is prohibitive to an individual or small business because of the high charter rates and having to pay for the return mileage. Rates from Goose Bay to Cartwright for a Cessna 180 are $165.00; for a Beaver $256.00; for an Otter $373.00. Ninety nine per cent of charters to the coast are by large corporations or government agencies (eg. Bell Telephone, U.S.A.F., D.O.T., Dept. of Fisheries, etc.).

It is interesting to note that the charter rates available from Goose Bay are ten cents a mile cheaper for a DC-3 than for an Otter. The DC-3 has over twice the carrying capacity of the Otter but cannot be used because of the requirement of landing strips. There is not one landing strip on the south or north coast of Labrador except for the Saglek radar site where there is no community. The Quebec Government have landing strips on their coastline all the way to Blanc Sablon, with a scheduled air service to all communities enroute.

Freight movement by air is virtually non-existent due to the high cost of 14.2 cents per lb., which means the southern coast of Labrador is without fresh fruit and vegetables for six months of the year. These are only some of the basic things available to all other Canadians.

Water transportation extends from mid June until early December. This could be extended, starting earlier and finishing later. It is definitely possible to navigate the south coast of Labrador until January every year. The freight handling aboard ship and on the dock could be definitely improved. There is a high degree of damage and loss of freight. At Cartwright there is a dire need for a wharfinger to protect and speed handling.

Most of the first class accommodation on the coastal ships is booked from St. John's by tourists and is not available to the Labrador people that the boats are basically intended to serve.

The mail service during the period handled by aircraft is acceptable. There is a once weekly flight, but mail could and should be at least twice weekly. The mail service handled by the CNR coastal boats is most unsatisfactory. The period between mail boats is from 10 to 12 days. No proper check is kept to protect the mail as no manifest is produced by boat staff to show the quantity of incoming mail.

Communications in respect to telephone service appears to be improving. Bell Telephone of Canada has already installed private dialing in some communities on the coast, and Cartwright has been promised the same before the end of the year. Until this dial system is installed, service at Cartwright could be improved by extending the time the radio-telephone is operational, which at present is 7 hours out of 24.

Communications in respect to information flowing between government agencies, both provincial and federal, and residents of this coast is practically non-existent. The population is continually left in the dark when policies are made which affect it. There is no flow of information from the MHA or from the Dept. of Labrador Affairs. Messages sent to the Provincial Government in St. John's usually receive no answer.

The lack of communication from government is most detrimental to the effectiveness of such voluntary self-help groups as the Coastal Labrador Regional Development Association. It restricts their ability to assist government in gauging the needs and in correcting problems which exist. CLRLDA also has great difficulties in operating due to the lack of funds and the means to travel or to assemble the directorate. Application to the Provincial Government for travel assistance has been refused.

Community Services

Cartwright has the only certified community council on the southern coast of Labrador north of the Strait of Belle Isle. Its financial needs for such services as road maintenance and garbage disposal are met by a per capita local roads grant by service charges and business taxes. Its major task at present is providing water for the community. Special grants from the Provincial Dept. of Municipal Affairs have been sufficient to bring to a successful conclusion a well drilling program by the end of this year. However, the cost of distributing the water derived from these wells and of providing a disposal system have not yet been estimated. This cost will undoubtedly exceed $100,000 and will require Federal Funding. Until an adequate water system is operational in Cartwright, the situation remains critical with constant hazard to public health.

EDUCATION

The Educational District of Labrador South is the largest single district in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador. It stretches

	Grants	Fuel and electricity	percentage of grant
Labrador East	$150,803	$47,900	30
Deer Lake	$142,191	$30,000	24

We feel that the above is a graphic example of regional disparity and we suggest that some method be found to correct this situation. We realize that the Government is bound to treat all schools fairly, but it is nevertheless obvious that because of geography the present system of allocating grants is grossly unfair to Labrador schools.

Problem

It is difficult to recruit qualified Newfoundland teachers to Eastern Labrador schools.

from Nain in the North to Mary's Harbour in the South. One complete plane trip throughout the district comes to 1,160 miles. Because of our geographical location, length of winter, high cost of living and transportation and communication problems, we feel that special consideration should be given to our district.

Problem

Operating costs for education facilities are higher in Labrador than elsewhere in the province and grants now received are inadequate to meet these costs.

Solution

A different system of allocating grants to Boards should be devised, or some method found for meeting the financial needs of Eastern Labrador schools.

Eleven years ago at an education conference called by the Government of Newfoundland, Rev. F. I. Peacock, Superintendent of Moravian Missions, proposed that because of: (a) the high cost of fuel (b) the length of winter (c) the extremely cold temperatures (d) the adverse effect of the latter two on property maintenance grants to Labrador schools should be increased. From that time to this Labrador school boards have been making the same appeal. However, although their costs are higher, grants to Labrador school boards are the same as those to all other schools in the province; and our school board finds it extremely difficult, indeed virtually impossible, to meet normal operating expenses. From the foregoing figures we see that we are spending approximately one-third of our operating income on fuel and electricity. The following comparison with another Newfoundland centre is significant.

Solution

This problem could be overcome by extending the cost of living allowances presently paid to all Government employees to Eastern Labrador teachers.

Another area where Labrador finds it difficult to compete with the rest of the province is in teacher recruitment. Not only do we have to compete with less isolated and more developed areas of the province, but with our affluent neighbours, Labrador West. The most important aspect of any school is the teacher, and yet we find it difficult to attract better qualified teachers to Labrador, particularly to the Coast.

How can this be changed? All Governments involved in Labrador, the United States Government, the Canadian Government and the Newfoundland Government, recognize that there is a 15-20% cost of living factor. All Governments provide for this in the way of living allowances to employees. However teachers are the only group paid out of Government funds that does not get a living allowance. These allowances are on the average $1200 per annum for married personnel and $600 per annum for single. This discrimination is especially detrimental when we consider the priority, a priority that the Government of Newfoundland has always insisted on, that education should have. There would seem to be a great discrepancy between the priority that education is given philosophically and the priority it is given financially, at least in this particular instance.

Problem

The district of Labrador South is the largest in the province, more personnel are required for effective supervision.

Solution

Change the regulations to permit smaller Boards to hire generalist instead of specialist supervisors. This can be done at no extra cost.

Teachers even the better ones, need supervision. At the present time adequate supervision is extremely difficult, if not impossible, for our administrative staff. This is so because there are too few supervisors compared to the area to be covered and because of transportation problems. Suffice it to say that the district, to be effectively supervised, needs more supervisory personnel. At the present time we have one superintendent, one supervisor of instruction, and one business manager. There is a need for additional generalists supervisors. However regulations presently adopted by the Department force us to hire specialists. To begin with (and as we pointed out above) we find it difficult to attract qualified specialists to our area. Secondly our teachers, on the coast in particular, are in need of general supervision rather than specialist advice. We request that we be permitted to employ a generalist supervisor instead of an additional specialist. This can be done at no extra cost.

HEALTH AND DIET CONDITIONS

The general health of the population of Cartwright cannot be said to differ greatly from any average community in Canada. However, probably there is a quicker spread and lower resistance to infection, the former due to overcrowded housing conditions, the latter due to poor dietary standards. Homes vary greatly but where there is inadequacy of diet it is often due, not to poverty but to a lack of knowledge of the right way to cook them to preserve the most nutrients.

Cleanliness is generally very good in the homes, but outside the homes it is poor—litter and broken glass being a common occurrence. Sources of water are often not fit for human consumption and there is an inadequate disposal of sewage. The number of out houses is few, the general occurrence being pails in the houses mainly for the use of the women.

Other public health problems are interminable. There are inadequate dental facilities, practically no ophthalmic service, no school medical services and very rare visits by a paediatrician, as shown by the list of doctor's visits given below. Up to the present there has been little health education in the school and what has been done has been by teachers unqualified in the subject. Sex education is nil and moral conditions lead to unhealthy adolescence.

Doctor's Visits

No ophthalmologist for refraction

11 General Doctor's clinics in the past 18 months with an average of 19 people seen in three and a half hours.

1 visit by a psychiatrist—8 patients seen.

1 visit by a paediatrician—7 patients seen.
9 months between dental visits—one visit being for two weeks and another for ten days.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Edmonton, July 20, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I will call the meeting to order. This is a subcommittee meeting of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty.

The members present are: Senator Josie Quart of Quebec, Senator Arthur M. Pearson of Saskatchewan, Senator Raymond Eudes of Quebec, Senator Chesley W. Carter of Newfoundland, and Senator Fred A. McGrand of New Brunswick. The committee is broken into two groups. One group is sitting in Calgary and will join us tomorrow. We are sitting here today and tomorrow and will finish tomorrow evening.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty was created in April of 1969, and Alberta is the seventh province that we are visiting. Then we will go north for a couple of days. We have had about 112 briefs from organizations and concerned bodies, and we have been holding hearings twice weekly in Ottawa.

Parliament is in recess at the present time. We decided that the poverty problem cannot wait. It has waited too long and we are using the time to visit those provinces that we had not previously visited.

I think it should be noted that in coming here we created the personal open forums—certainly on poverty—in going to the people. We did not wait for them to come to us. People are speaking, and we are listening. We are encouraging them to speak, and speak out, honestly, forcefully, competently, and sometimes eloquently. We hope before our hearings finish that poverty-stricken people will not for too long remain part of the problem but, rather, will become part of the solution and will themselves participate in the solution.

We have had excellent response, and we think the time of quiet losers is coming to an end.

There has been some confusion about social services, welfare and poverty, and they are not as closely related as they would appear to be. Social services were measures taken for social security to meet the needs of the needy. Our first social measure in this country was actually in 1908, the Annuities Act; then came 1927 when the Old Age Pension came into force, and subsequently we have had many measures that have been very good in many respects.

But the theory behind the social measures was that they would redistribute wealth. It is unfortunate that in the last 20 years there has been no actual redistribution of wealth. The rich has got richer and the poor have remained poor and become relatively poorer.

The only redistribution we can trace is 2 per cent redistribution which came directly from social payments. That is all. So in that respect the social measures have failed, but only in that respect. Not to say that they are not good or useful or essential. Of course we will need them for the future, but they are not antipoverty measures.

Welfare was originally intended as an emergency measure during the great depression in the thirties. Welfare came and has stayed and is growing and is now a running sore national problem. It is not an anti-poverty measure, but it is basic to poverty as a social security.

Welfare in other countries has become a way of life and it has drawn within the web individuals, families and generations, and today the drug of welfare is far more deadly than pot. It doesn't kill but it cripples for life the living; it saps the will, frustrates by its inadequacy and robs persons of dignity and leads to a mere lingering existence without meaning. It is not what we figure as the Canadian way of life.

I have given you all this to indicate there is a community of poverty which exists in Canada.

In the Province of Alberta we find that the allowance is most generous in all of Canada.

Yet it suffers from some administrative hang-ups. The province works very hard on digging money out of the federal government under the Canada Assistance Act, and it is the wish of the committee that more provinces would do what the Province of Alberta is doing in that respect.

A poverty line was suggested perhaps as a guideline—if that is still a good word to use in this country—by the Economic Council. They indicated that they thought $1,800 was the amount that should be available for one person; $3,000 to two persons; and $600 for every additional member of the family. That was in 1968. Since then there has been a 20 per cent increase in the cost of living, and so that itself becomes less useful than it did. But keeping that in mind as a poverty line, as a measuring rule, the geographic break-down of poverty is something in this order: Atlantic provinces, 15 per cent; Quebec, 30 per cent; Ontario, 25 per cent; Prairie provinces, 20 per cent; British Columbia, 10 per cent. And it is well to note there are more poverty-stricken people in Central Canada, Quebec and Ontario, than there are in the rest of Canada. There are roughly as many poor in Quebec as in Western Canada, and more than in any other single region. There are as many poor in Ontario as in the Atlantic and Pacific provinces together, and more than any other single region except Quebec.

So here we are in this fabulously rich Province of Alberta which has its share of poverty—you are not the richest province in Canada. We have read the briefs, and the briefs go from good to excellent, and we are delighted, Mr. Mayor, that you came before the committee, and perhaps we will take a moment to congratulate you on this lovely centennial building which you have. The fact that the Poverty Committee should come to this place is an indication we can all do much better than we are doing.

Now, Mr. Mayor, I have spoken to you about our mode of conducting the meeting. Will you go right ahead?

His Worship Mayor Ivor Dent, City of Edmonton: Senator Croll, members of the committee, I want to thank you first for allowing me to appear before you this morning. My gratitude is most sincere because personally I am not an expert on poverty, and if such an expert exists I don't know him. You people, I hope, before you finish this, will be the next Canadian experts in this particular area.

I realize that a multiplicity of solutions to problems that you listen to may possibly make being an expert much more difficult than it is for those who have very little knowledge because it appears to me at least in my position that those who know the least, often have the best solutions for problems, or at least they have in their own minds. And it appears as you get to know more and more on the subject the solutions to problems has to take in more and more factors and become more difficult.

I realize the people in this committee are confronted with this problem, and all I can say is, it is good it is yourselves and not myself. I have many of my own.

I shall be brief. Our presentation will be in two parts, but both very short, and then we would welcome questions.

I believe you have the submission of the City of Edmonton. It is my experience usually with people serving on committees such as this that usually you are ahead of people like me in that you have read it more carefully and have done it more recently.

I have two main reasons for appearing here. The first, like you were expressing, senator, is that I would like, too, to see poverty eliminated or at the very least reduced to an irreducible minimum. The second is that I have a proposal that I think will go a long way towards achieving this objective.

In my opinion the resources of this country are not being used effectively in the fight against poverty. This ineffectiveness results from too many cooks spoiling the broth. Millions are voted by one level of government or another to help ease the despair of the poor in this country and yet their despair persists, of, if anything, it grows apace.

Why? The answer lies partially in the phrase "One government or another or private authorities." We have conflicting jurisdictions, mutually exclusive bureaucracies and several brands of red tape all bound up with getting millions of dollars into the hands of the poor, and because of this, much of the money may never get down to them.

Therefore we propose a unitary delivery of services to the poor, and I want to emphasize "unitary delivery." This presupposes placing in the hands of the poor the means to improve their position. Quite frankly, I don't care how this is worked out. Our various levels of government have been known to co-operate with each other on other issues. Let them co-operate on this. Let them first adopt the philosophy of a unitary delivery of services and then let them work out details on who should contribute what portion of the money to finance such a program.

Such a program is surely not beyond our capabilities. This will require effort, but surely a great deal more effort and brainpower has gone into an array of unco-ordinated and fragmented programming than now confronts the poor. This array leaves many gaps unfilled, and as a practical matter, many of the poor find themselves shunted from one government office to another because doubts hover over jurisdiction.

I might just say at this point that I have said to people at the federal level and people at the provincial level that we are not interested ourselves in empires. If someone else can do the job, if someone else will do the job, then we will be only too happy to leave it to them and not continue to try to do the job ourselves, when in fact we are certain that what we are doing, despite the help we get from other levels of government, is totally inadequate.

The poor I am sure do not care who deals with their needs: the federal government, the province, or the city. We in government, at any level, should not care either. We should pool our resources and offer to the community a single point of contact where they know they will get help.

I know the achieving of such an objective will not be easy. I admit, too, we may never reach the ideal, but surely we can travel along a path towards it and with goodwill go a considerable distance along it.

At first it may be a matter of a pilot project here and there, and Edmonton is ready to be a part of what I might call an intergovernmental guinea pig and to work not only with other levels of government, but those of the private sector who attempt to grapple with the problem as well. But this city cannot be a guinea pig without meaningful federal participation.

We are powerless without federal help, and I would just say at this point that we have started out on a program or at least a study for a program of this sort. We have federal participation. It is tiny. But the point is we have participation from people from the private groups; we have participation from the city; we have participation from various departments of the provincial government; but the participation of the federal government is "We will throw a few shekels into the pot but we see at least to this point no real need to get into a meaningful consideration or dialogue with you to work out any plan that we may hope to take into the community to solve the problem," and this is what I mean by meaningful participation: if in fact a level of government, or any group, is going to participate, then they have to participate, and when I say participate I mean they have to be people with knowledge and skill and an interest in this participation, and not merely saying "Here are a few dollars. We are picking up our share."

The program we were suggesting can be expanded as experiences came.

Ladies and gentlemen, I have avoided the jargon of the Erudite cadences of the sociologist. We are dealing with plain people, the poor, and they need plain language. I have tried to speak plainly. I do hope I have been able to put my point across, and that in your wisdom you will find some merit in it. I have with me, ladies and gentlemen, Mr. Keith Wass, who is head of our Social Service Department, and with him, Mr. Milne. Mr. Wass is going to follow up in the introductory presentation, with your permission.

Mr. D. K. Wass, Superintendent, Social Service Department: Mr. Chairman, members of the Senate Committee, I am delighted that the mayor was with us this morning. I think this is an indication of the support that the city administration gives to this whole question of social services.

Senator Pearson: Social services, is that a city body or provincial, or what?

Mayor Dent: City. It is a city presentation.

Mr. Wass: In our submission we have focused on questions related to the provision of essential social services. The omission of statistics and data related to poverty in Edmonton was intentional because we believe that we would have little really new to submit in that area, and that this would be a subject matter of several other briefs, particularly those from self-help groups here in Edmonton.

However, we hasten to add that poverty is a fact of life in Edmonton, just as it is in other cities. Some of the particular problems in our area relate to the influx of Indian and Metis families that are seeking a better way of life but are ill-prepared educationally and socially for urban life.

The rural urban migration and seasonal nature in some areas of employment and the lack of sufficient education and training have handicapped many individuals in our increasingly technical society.

This afternoon another group of our staff are presenting a brief relating to a special demonstration project where we are attempting to assist unemployed men back into the economic mainstream.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, this may be some indication welfare administration does not have to be as you have depicted it, as a trap that sucks people in. It does not have to be this way; I think in this project we try to show that it is not.

Now again because this group are coming in, we have only made passing reference to social assistance which we also administer, and the need for the unemployed and the poor to have their financial needs met in a manner that preserves their dignity and feelings of self-worth. We believe there is need for flexibility in financial assistance programs and the ability to reward effort and provide incentive to those who strive to improve their position.

I wonder if this flexibility might be most effectively provided on a local basis related to rehabilitation, and as a supplement to broad assistance programs or guaranteed annual income if it comes into being.

In 1966 Alberta passed the Preventive Social Service Act. This legislation, linked in with the Canada Assistance Plan has enabled the municipality, through its own services or through the purchase from private agencies, to support and extend essential social services and strengthen and enhance family life.

Some areas of service strengthened are day care services, with particular reference to sole-support mothers and low-income families; homemaker and home help services; family life education; volunteer services; information and referral services. Also there has been some emphasis on area-based community service units aimed at meeting local needs related to short-term counselling group program and drop-in centres, and trying to mobilize local resources in the area. A school readiness centre and community psychiatric service.

In all these programs heavy involvement of volunteer and clients has been sought. We believe that a range of such services is essential in all our large urban centres, and that increasing financial resources under existing legislation is essential for their development.

We believe the terms for the federal participation under the Canada Assistance Plan should be broadened so that some programs such as family life education and community service units could be included, whereas at this point they are exempted from federal sharing.

The area of effective planning for social services has long been neglected. Locally-based social planning units need to be established with sufficient power and influence to effect policy and program. Such local social planning units must be interrelated with provincial and federal planning so that an effective range of service evolves rather than the present fragmented system.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, I would terminate at this point and be glad to speak to any of the points in our brief.

Senator Carter: I would like to express my appreciation of this brief, the particular briefs that I have read from Edmonton, because you seem to be searching for a new philosophy which I think is needed.

If I understood Mayor Dent correctly, he said that federal aid in this pilot project that they have been working on has been very tiny. I would like to have him elaborate on that. How did the federal get into it at all? And if the federal is in it, how come it is not under the Canada Assistance Plan which will provide up to 50 per cent?

Mayor Dent: Let me explain it first. I am sorry. I may have said it incorrectly. I am in no way faulting the federal government for the amount of assistance.

I did say that what we are asking for is a very tiny amount. This is because we feel that we need for the study for a pilot project only a tiny amount. And my concern over the federal government's participation is not the amount of money (I want to make that eminently clear); the amount of money they were asked to give, they gave, and I will have to allow you to check out the source of the money elsewhere because I am not quite certain myself. The amount we are talking about is only $5,000, and that was all we asked for.

However, my concern has been that we started this study, looking at this problem to see if we couldn't come up with something new three years ago, and although the federal government has been as generous with money as we have asked them to be, as far as any participation of brainpower or involvement is concerned, it has been totally inadequate. And that is my complaint. That if in fact we are going to concern ourselves with the poverty problem in this country, and if in one place we have got the representatives of the private sector, representatives of the city, representatives of the province, all together, to sit down and say, "All right, let's take a concerted look," then knowing how difficult this task was, it appears to me that those involved and concerned with poverty in Ottawa should, too, be willing to come in a meaningful way and join us—and this is what we said—at least in the direction of the expenditure of the $15,000 that we are expending on this study for a possible pilot project. And, Mr. Chairman, if I may elaborate, here is our concern: more and more people and more and more money it appears goes towards the solution of social ills one way or another, whether it is poverty or other type. And despite this, with the fragmentation that we approach social problems with, it appears to me that less and less is actually getting done, and that in fact the problem in a society such as ours is growing instead of shrinking, and I believe if we get together we can at least consider how to shrink it.

Senator Carter: Well, I thank the mayor for elaborating on that. I obviously misunderstood what he had said.

Mayor Dent: My fault, sir.

Senator Carter: But you did mention the phrase, and I wrote down the words, "powerless without federal help"; that nothing much is going to in Ottawa, each of which in one way or another is concerned with the social ills of society; each of which has in this city some personnel either steadily or coming in, and each dealing with things that if they were working together and delivering their services themselves from one delivery place or one delivery authority, even the federal government could very meaningfully improve what it does to assist with the ills of society.

Indians are separated from the unemployed and the veterans' families that are suffering some way or another are separated from those who have health problems. And in discussing this with this group of nine representatives from the federal government, it appeared to me that not only were they not together, but it appeared to me that they had damned little desire to be together as far as an approach to this problem was concerned. I don't know whether this is correct or not, but some of them told me on the Q.T. that it was the first time they had met one another.

Now, we have this, don't we, at a provincial level, but to a lesser degree because it is smaller so we don't have it magnified to that extent. We have it even at the civic level. But once again it is lesser because we are smaller and we can be better co-ordinated between departments. We have great multiplicity in private agencies that are involved in this with loose patterns of agreement on getting together.

When you take a look at it, the approach is fragmented, and there is no way we can solve a major problem by each one of us taking a peashooter and shooting it, and that is what we are doing.

You mentioned in your introductory remarks this morning the need for unitary delivery of services, and you mentioned it also in your brief. In your brief you go a little further, and you suggest that the instrument to do this is some sort of corporation. Am I correct in interpreting your brief in that way?

Mayor Dent: Mr. Chairman and senators, yes, you are.

However, I want to make this entirely clear: we have that real participation from the private sector and from the city, from the province, and money from the federal government, and a group studying this problem in the city now that we have hired from Toronto, leisure consultants, and if they tell us and other experts in the field tell us we are wrong, we are not married to a concept ahead of time. Therefore should they point a direction that does not involve such a preparation, then we will draw back and follow their advice.

In other words, in our thinking to begin with we thought this might be a good way. We still, as far as we have looked, think it may be. However, we are quite willing to draw back should it be indicated this is not the right approach, but call it a corporation or what you like, one authority to deal with problems.

Senator Carter: One instrument. You cannot have a unitary delivery of services without some agency for doing it.

Mayor Dent: Right.

Senator Carter: And it is not a matter of what you call it, but regardless of that you are going to have some agency. And what puzzled me when I read your brief, how would you draw all these nine federal authorities that you mentioned when you were up to Ottawa, plus the other agencies at the provincial level and municipal level, how would you draw these all together for an input into this corporation or this instrument or agency, whatever you want to call it, and what would be the relationship of such an agency to the provincial government?

Mayor Dent: Well, what we have done to date is each of the departments of the province that are presently concerned with the problem have been sending to our—we called it the mayor's—committee meetings, representatives, ministers or deputy ministers; the city has been sending representatives from the departments that are involved here, and the private sector has been sending representatives as well.

We think we have made tremendous strides. They may appear very small, but they are tremendous according to what we have had. We feel if we can get together and agree, as we did here, then if we can get representatives from other levels of government, and set up a board then that would direct this agency and the agency would in fact deliver all of the services that are presently being delivered if they are needed, which means in all probability you could drop some. But we could add possibly some of the positive services that are necessary if in fact we are going to grapple with this problem.

I was going to mention two school boards were represented on this committee as well. In other words, we have had an excellent experience in that we have gotten the kind of input that you look for. We got agreement at these levels, but my point is, only in the one area of government. I think it can work, and from the small experience we have had so far I think it can work excellently.

Senator Carter: I would like to be clear on this point: this one agency that is going to provide unitary delivery of services, would that be one agency for a province or one agency for a municipality, one agency for every city, or would this agency have branches? How would this agency operate throughout the province? You have to split it up somewhere.

Mayor Dent: That is right. We haven't gone beyond the pilot project. We felt what is necessary is a pilot project. We say this: when we get finished with our pilot project the thing may be no good whatsoever and it might fall flat on its face, but at least we will have tried in the field where trying to do something different has seemed to be forgotten entirely.

Senator Carter: Your present pilot project; is it working along these lines?

Mayor Dent: Yes.

The Chairman: Yes. He covers it in paragraph 9 of the brief.

Senator Carter: Yes, but he mentioned the Metis and Indians and veterans. Is your pilot project occupying itself with these groups just now?

Mayor Dent: What we would do is, we would take an area in the city that is identified, and it would deal with all the problems of this sort in that area, and that is the only step we want to go because should we find that this is useless, we would hope others would get some ideas on another pilot project.

Senator Carter: Just one more question: I do not quite get what Mr. Wass said, but he mentioned something about the family service planning or some service he mentioned, and then you said it was exempt from federal assistance.

The Chairman: Family life education. He made the same mistake that others had been making. If he had used "Manpower" or something like that he would get away with it, but he used the wrong word, and we wise them up on these things. You remember we got the same thing from others.

Senator Carter: Oh, yes.

Senator Pearson: Talking about the Indian and Metis migrating to the cities nowadays, I would like to suggest this: during the 1930's when there was a tremendous problem on the hands of everybody who could not make a living particularly in the country, rural people, there was a problem there, and there was no money in the municipality to support them, so these people saved every dollar they could find for a year, and the ruling was then they could move into another municipality which had sufficient funds apparently to support them.

Now I know this happened in Regina and I know a great many farmers who saved money up for that year, walked out in the dead of night and left all their bills behind them, and they had nothing to do except to live in the city somehow or other for one year and then they were able to draw relief from the city in some form or another.

Now it seems to me this is a problem you have got on your hands today with Indians and Metis. There is no money in the rural areas for these Indians and Metis and they have found there is a certain amount of money or living conditions in the city and they are moving in there.

Do you find it is a problem that you are drawing these people in here in spite of this? It is not a place for them but they are coming in here because it is a chance to live.

Mayor Dent: Mr. Chairman, Senator Pearson, I have this to say on that: there is a process of urbanization going on all over this world, and we have moved into a country here and the Indians are accepting our type of civilization and our type of civilization seems to involve jungling-up in urban societies, and so therefore we get the Indian and Metis coming in.

However, the Indian and Metis are no greater problem to us actually than many others who are following the same process, and I cannot really see that we can solve the problem by saying to one group in society, well, you stay out, and you try to make it in a rural setting, at the same time that the vast number of people who are white, and others, are saying not only here in this country but all over the world, that they are not making it in the rural setting because of automation in the rural setting and therefore they are moving to the city.

That is happening here, and that it is happening with Indians and Metis, as far as I am concerned, makes no difference. You can't say to that group "Stay out of the city" while all the rest move in.

What we have to concern ourselves with is what to do with them when they arrive. I believe that we do now in a fragmented, disjointed way attempt to do something for them.

If, for one generation, Canadians would say that we are going to take positive steps and we are going to work with these people, all people who are disadvantaged, and we are going to give them not something that is too little and too late, but give their children particularly the training that is necessary to live in this modern world, we would take a giant step towards elimination of poverty with which we are concerned.

Senator Pearson: Do you not think the Indian and Metis in the rural area where they live at the present time, do you not think they would prefer to stay there in their own community and avoid the city?

Mayor Dent: I think this would be true of the older generation. It appears to me that young people want to be where the action is, as they would say, and the action is around the bright lights. It is where the economic action is, too, and therefore there is a tendency for the young Indian and Metis to be like our own young and say we want to be here where there are educational opportunities and cultural interests and excitement. So therefore the tendency with the young Indian and Metis is much the same as our own young people, and I do not think we are going to change it.

The Chairman: I think, Mr. Mayor, it is well to point out, and perhaps Senator Pearson is listening, actually in the Province of Alberta, the Metis receives a greater allowance outside Edmonton than he will receive in the City of Edmonton. The Edmonton allowance is lower than the provincial allowance. I was going to ask the mayor why, and now that you have opened it, it puzzles me, I think perhaps I have got your answer as to what you are trying to do in Edmonton. Is that the right answer?

Mr. Wass: As to why our rates are different?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Wass: We have for the most part adopted and followed provincial social allowance rates. They have one or two allowances that they gave to long-term assistance families that we did not place in our shorter-term assistance scales.

In the same way, the province did not grant these extra allowances to their short-term, so-called employable unemployed, so I think that basically we have the same assistance scale as the province with the difference that the provincial department has a little higher allowance in some categories for long-term assistance.

The Chairman: You are not alone in this. Saskatchewan does the very same thing between the north and the south, I think I know the reason why you are doing it. I am prepared to accept what you say. The senators are very understanding in that respect.

Mayor Dent: Mr. Wass is saying it is not geographical this difference that he is explaining.

The Chairman: I am speaking of the difference in Saskatchewan.

Senator Pearson: I am very much interested in your brief, and the idea of fragmentation of services, I think you have hit upon something there that is really needed in this country. Just to follow along that line, you said there were nine different bodies in Ottawa that seem to be dealing with this subject of social services or poverty or such like.

Could you give us any idea how many agencies there are under the provincial government here in Alberta, and then how many agencies there are, private and municipal, in the City of Edmonton?

Mayor Dent: Well, sir, I would say that I will allow the provincial representative to answer that this afternoon should you ask him. However, there would probably be three or four departments one way or another that deal with people who are, in one way or another, disadvantaged.

First, that is the province. The City, I suppose we would have health, welfare and the police department. That is three. So within the city—I wouldn't begin to guess. I think probably with your experience here you would know in a community better than I how many organizations would be involved.

But the point I was in fact attempting to make was that we were able to all sit down together and have really meaningful discussions and come up with what I consider to be a meaningful idea, and I think that although fragmentation exists even within our own jurisdiction, that there is no reason to have its evils persist.

And we have agreed in a second area. As a matter of fact, the same concern with the drug problem. We have gotten together with members of the provincial government, representatives from the city, from the private organizations, again. In other words, we followed our path twice and once again we attempted to get at least a coordinated approach to the particular social problem, and once again after we had sort of looked at society and seen what was going on without, to my knowledge, anybody talking to anybody, the federal government threw open the armory and said, "Here, fellows, we are going to do this," without working with the people in the community who had begun the type of co-ordination which I begged the Howard Society to think about, and this is one of the reasons I would imagine why Mayor Campbell is so fired up at the moment. It is thrust upon him with no dialogue whatever.

Senator Quart: Along these lines of your various agencies, and to follow up a suggestion which I think agrees with what Senator Carter said earlier, a co-ordinating council would seem to be the answer, I suppose with each of the different government levels sort of paying in to the upkeep, maybe, but with complete independence. I think it must be very, very frustrating for a poor person to go around, and I have said this many times, that I would love to dress up and go around and see what I could come up with because I am sure the agencies and I am sure the federal, provincial and municipal people are all very conscious of it—and I don't think you do it purposely—but I think on the other hand by the time the poor person gets around to find out what advantages could be drawn, or help and so on and so forth, they become so discouraged that they sort of remain quiet and starve for a couple of months anyway.

Now that may be a very uncharitable thing to say, but I wonder if it is not almost true. You ask a poor person where do you go for this and where do you go for that, so it seems to me that all these agencies and the different government levels getting into the deal, the poor person is still frustrated because, as you said, Mr. Mayor, and I thoroughly agree with your expression, they are shunted from post to pillar, and if they do not die from frustration they are pretty tough.

Mayor Dent: I don't know how to respond to that if it is a question that I agree with everything you say.

Senator McGrand: I have several questions. Now going back to the Metis, what success are you having in the control of poverty among the Metis? How many of them do you have in Northern Alberta who have a tendency to come here to the bright lights? When they come to seek the benefits of the bright lights, as you have mentioned, do they stay segregated as a group within the city, or do they tend to integrate with the other people who are trying to obtain the affluency of the bright lights of Edmonton, and the prosperity? Do they remain segregated or do they integrate?

Mr. Wass: Mr. Chairman, Senator McGrand, I am not sure of the specifics there. I do not know of anyone that can really give us any close figures of numbers who are coming to the city, I don't even have the figures of the total population north of us that are in this area, but we are certainly aware that this is a growing phenomenon, that more and more are coming in.

There must be certain areas of the city that they get housing a little more often. I don't really think we have any real ghettos of this kind. I think they often face real difficulty, just as many families coming into the city are facing difficulty renting at a price they can afford.

We have a friendship centre established. I think many of them get help there. So I think they are settling in and widely settled around the city in many different areas.

I think many of them have adjustment problems, but perhaps we could over-emphasize because I think many of them are settling in and making a good adjustment in the city.

Senator McGrand: The mayor mentioned this urbanization is going on world over, and you are only having your share here of it in Edmonton, and probably having a little more than your share because of the great development that is here in Northern Alberta.

Do you have many people from the Maritimes who come here and find life very difficult? Do you find many, in your problems with poverty, many Maritimers, or do they all stop at Toronto?

Mr. Wass: I think we certainly have some, but I think not a great number, and I think, again, the majority that come get settled in.

Senator McGrand: Now, Senator Carter referred to your pilot project. I look at a pilot project as sort of something you use, an expression, you try it on for size to see how it works. Is that right?

Now if you had enough of pilot projects carried out at the civic and the provincial level of government, and with private groups, is it possible to evince development, a department at the provincial level, to work in the field of poverty to administer problems of poverty the same as derive to day in the field of education and in health?

What I mean is, you try these pilot projects and you find you are successful. Would you continue with that project, and finally you get enough pilot projects successful that you can put them together into a framework of a policy to be administered at the provincial level the same as they have educational problems and health problems?

Mayor Dent: Sir, I would like to say this: I do not think the idea of a pilot project is in fact to put in one and then another and then more. You are trying pilot projects, and if it works and it works well, then you expand, and in this way you change what you have. But I must emphasize because I feel in your question (and maybe I am reading something in it that I should not) that you want to have the federal government out.

Senator McGrand: Oh, no, no. I mean it would be administered at the provincial level, but I should have said with federal assistance.

Mayor Dent: Yes. I am trying to make a plea here—realizing, too, that you people are all from Ottawa—that it is more than money, and that is the fact that a kind of assistance also be a meaningful input of knowledge.

The Chairman: I thought the country was pretty well satisfied that there was a lack of brains in Ottawa.

Mayor Dent: Let's say this: they hide themselves well.

Senator McGrand: You did not quite answer my question, and what I am groping for, anything in the field of education or anything in the field of health, as you develop it from practically nothing to something worthwhile, it was done by trying a project here and project there and eliminating the weak and continuing with the stronger project until finally you get something, a framework, that covered that problem.

Now there is no mistake about it that this question of poverty is today a national problem. There is no question about the pockets of poverty. It is poverty that is national in scope, and it has got to be treated as national in scope. It is a national issue. That is why I think this old approach that it is something you fix up here and fix up there basically has got to be abandoned, and some department, perhaps of government, at the provincial level with federal assistance, will undertake a program for the elimination of poverty. That is what I had in mind.

Mayor Dent: Now that I understand you, I think by way of explanation I agree with what you are saying, and what we are suggesting actually in our pilot project is an experiment which can be replicated elsewhere if it works, and therefore I can only say I believe that this is correct, that it is a national problem, and all that we want to do is to suggest that we work out a legitimate means of handling the problem and go into the problem of poverty, the disadvantaged, in a positive rather than a negative way.

Senator Carier: Before you follow it up, would you alleviate the mayor's anxieties, that because we are from Ottawa we are not Ottawa-oriented?

The Chairman: That is exactly what I was getting at. The committee represents every province, and the only place it was loaded from was Newfoundland. We have two representatives from there.

Let me tell you what the thinking of the committee is. We are thinking in terms of income from the federal government, services from the provincial government, delivery under the Canada Assistance Act which is to be an umbrella for everything with the possible exception of unemployment insurance and the Canada Pension Plan.

That does not make us regional Canadians in that thinking, I am sure you will agree. I cannot ask Mr. Wass that question because I do not think it is a question for him. He may say that it is too political for him. But it is not really a political question. That is our thinking. What do you think about that?

Mayor Dent: I would rather you elaborate a little further in your thinking.

The Chairman: We think the Canada Assistance Act is a very good Act and has a good method of delivery with possible amendments here and there. We were thinking in terms, as I say, that the income should come from the federal government—that is where the responsibility lies under the Constitution—and we think services should come from the provincial government, whatever arrangement they make, and the method of delivery. That is our thinking. What do you think of that, whatever we decide on it?

Mr. Wass: I would like to take a swing at it.

The Chairman: Sure. Go ahead.

Mr. Wass: I think as far as you have gone it is fine, but I would hope within provinces they are going to do some delegating down to the local area.

The Chairman: We are not running the provinces. We are not suggesting for a moment that the province run the welfare scheme. That is not our suggestion at all. We are talking broadly: income, service, method of delivery. Now you punch holes in that.

Mr. Wass: No, I don't choose to punch holes in that. I think that sounds very sound to me. It is just that at the local level we have got to have flexibility and involvement of citizens in this program.

The Chairman: No one is denying that.

Mr. Wass: I was hoping you went a little further.

The Chairman: Then we would be telling the provinces how to run their departments.

Mr. Wass: Right.

The Chairman: Which we are not doing, and it is none of our business. But the principle, we are talking about getting some coordinated body to do it.

Our experience in giving this thought is the Canada Assistance Act has all that possibility in it, and everything could come under that umbrella. We are thinking in terms of cutting out dozens and dozens of services so it is merely an umbrella and not a tent.

How the province does it is another thing, but that is not for us to say. What do you think of that in general terms?

Mayor Dent: I think generally, sir, this is in some measure coordinated or co-ordination of what is going on or what we are attempting to do, and I think that this is one of the answers to the problem, that we actually get into the situation where you almost have to have a government or socially approved type of poverty or else you are actually left out.

I guess you can't always fit whatever your problem is into a mould, and therefore anything that cuts down the fragmentation of delivery or the way that we deal with these problems I think is important.

I think what we are discussing with you, of course, is the one part, the services, and in fact we have not really made a great contribution as far as income from the Federal Government is concerned.

The Chairman: What do you mean?

Mayor Dent: Well, I mean we have ignored that portion of your comment and what our brief is involved with is more delivery.

The Chairman: That federal aspect does not concern us. All they are doing, the federal, is they are giving you money. That is essential, but all the money in the world, you are not going to solve this problem unless you have services. We know that.

Senator McGrand: What percentage of people in Edmonton and Northern Alberta—when I think of Edmonton I think of this area. I think of Edmonton and Northern Alberta. What percentage of the people are below what we call the poverty line?

Mayor Dent: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, we cannot answer.

Senator McGrand: Would you have it in Edmonton?

Mayor Dent: No.

Senator McGrand: How many people in Edmonton do you have on welfare? What percentage?

The Chairman: It is 12 per cent. You can correct me, but these are our own research figures.

Mr. Wass: I would accept your research figure. Because a fragmented program between the province and the city we don't have it.

Senator McGrand: Going back to Northern Alberta again, and your Indian and Metis, when you think of development of resources of Alberta you think of oil and gas. That is the way I look at it, but there must be others.

What is there in the way of natural resources, sort of resources in their area that could be developed that would provide these people with a livelihood—perhaps not as good as they would get in Edmonton, but at least good enough that they would stay home.

You know there are people in Newfoundland and in New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia who go to Toronto or places like that, or maybe Edmonton and Calgary, that try for awhile, but they are satisfied to go back home and take a little less because it goes farther.

I was just thinking that if these people have the resources—they may not have the resources—but if they have resources in their area of development they would not be so anxious to come in here even for the bright lights.

Mayor Dent: Well, Mr. Chairman, Senator, I believe this question should rightfully be asked of the Provincial Government.

I think most of the industries of any magnitude that grow up outside of Edmonton are of the extractive industries.

I know the Provincial Government is thinking recently in terms of attempting to bolster up by encouraging industry in smaller centres, the industry there, and to attempt to de-centralize in some measure. However, I think you still have the problem, and the problem is more than economic, and the fact that London and Tokyo and New York and other cities of the world continue to grow, then it is more than economics. It is the feeling of need. It seems almost in our generation and the coming generation to live closer together.

I think we can do things to stop this and maybe another generation will stop it, but it seems to me that the process of urbanization is quite universal for our generation, and I think we had better learn to deal with it till the people come.

The Chairman: As I indicated we read your brief and, by the way, I neglected to pay you the deserved compliment for developing Edmonton's human resources. I notice you were a member of the committee as alderman and now you are mayor. But in the brief there is a theme which says in effect you are allowing $25 earnings and deductions after that for single women and other people. I started out by saying—I think that is true—that Alberta is the most generous province. Ontario allows $40 before making deductions. I cannot think of any good reason why you should allow $25 when they can allow $40. Really $25, we have found is very low.

Mr. Wass: I agree, Mr. Chairman. I would not try to defend that deduction. I think there is consideration of changing that, and in certain cases there is a change already where there is a rehabilitation plan.

The Chairman: What are you purchasing in the way of volunteer organizations? You talk about purchase. What do you purchase? Day care?

Mr. Wass: Day care, homemakers service, family life, education.

The Chairman: Meals on wheels?

Mr. Wass: Meals on wheels.

The Chairman: When you say "purchasing," what do you mean, on the basis of so much a meal? For instance, the meals on wheels, so much a meal, and day care so much a child?

Mr. Wass: It varies with the project, Mr. Chairman. Some of them submit over our budgets, and these are reviewed and the budget is approved which basically underwrites the program.

In other cases it is a fee basis. Day care is a fee basis, but there is a sliding scale charged to the parents. But they mainly give support to the lower income families, sole support mothers, so that this is usually a minimum fee, and that others, in a preventive program, we pick up the balance to support the day care operation.

The Chairman: You know most of these things come in under the Canada Assistance Act?

Mr. Wass: Right. The province looks after that. They reimburse us 80 per cent.

The Chairman: I said they were very good. Of course there is one great advantage in facing up to the federal Government. All you say to them, "Dollar for dollar we will match you." All provinces cannot do that.

Senator Pearson: Do you have any difficulties with the province at all in helping you?

Mr. Wass: I think, Senator, we have excellent relations with the province in regard to a preventive program. We are hopeful, and I know other areas of the province are that they will continue to expand allocation of monies to this program because it is fairly limited at this point.

The Chairman: The staff tell us or told me that the most imaginative use of the Canada Assistance Act is in Alberta.

Senator Pearson: I just wanted to have it on record.

The Chairman: In fairness, let us say it to them and encourage them to do more than they are doing.

Mr. Milne: I just wanted to emphasize the preventive dimension of our operations, and point out that one of the reasons that one of the recommendations placed before you was so placed is that the Canada Assistance Plan has tended to require a definition of need prior to the provision of assistance.

Our suggestion is there are many families that are not yet definable in those terms that need some further services, and in fact it provides an excellent preventive to provide services to them prior to the point at which they have need, and we would look for some broadening of the interpretation of the section dealing with those likely to become in need.

The Chairman: You have raised the point there.

Senator Carter: That is the question I was going to ask.

The Chairman: There is a real point there. Need can be defined as broadly as possible by any province. What you are saying it is in effect is "likely to be in need." Does that include human need?

Senator Carter: That is tied in with their theory of flexibility and giving authority to the social worker on the spot because she makes all these decisions.

The Chairman: Yes, but the question I ask is there likely to be any need? Does that include the Chairman and Mr. Milne? You see where are we when we talk "likely to be in need"? It is limitless then, isn't it?

Senator Carter: Yes. I think you have to put limits to it, but I think we know what they are talking about. On the verge. On the borderline.

The Chairman: A good point, very important to us.

Senator Carter: I would like to ask two short questions. You mentioned this preventive social service act and I gathered then you mentioned day care, family services—a whole lot of services which seem to be funded under this family service.

The Chairman: Purchased.

Senator Carter: Yes. Apparently this preventive social service act—is there a limit to funds? How are funds disbursed under this Act?

Mr. Wass: Yes, there is a limit to funds. The province has a budget, and of course the city would have a budget as well. They have been gradually expanding the amount of money of this program, and each area of the province submit projects, and eventually they run out of money and they let you know there is no point in submitting any further projects until next year.

Senator Carter: Yes.

Mr. Wass: So it is a project submission to the province until provincial allocation for a program.

Senator Carter: Yes, so much for each year.

Mr. Wass: Yes.

Senator Carter: But my other question is, coming back to these nine agencies up in Ottawa and the necessity for them to get together at least to talk to one another and know what is going on and not only that, but have somebody so that provincial people and municipal people could talk to them.

I would like to get your reactions to the idea of a council somewhat like was set up I think for Consumer Services.

The Chairman: Like the Economic Council of Canada?

Senator Carter: Yes.

The Chairman: The Social Council of Canada.

Senator Carter: Yes. I have difficulty with your project because your project is based on the existence of this thing which does not exist really. You are talking about input and dialogue and all the rest of it, and this means without some coordinating agency at the federal level which can talk to the coordinating agency at the other level—

The Chairman: Isn't that for us? Isn't that something we have to consider, the idea of having some body, some economic body to review and assess the social atmosphere and social acts from year to year?

Senator Carter: Yes, but I would like to get his reaction.

Mayor Dent: Mr. Chairman, Senators, we have at least gotten from three areas people who are agreed this panel shall exist. As a matter of fact we are going to go with this whether the Federal Government participates or not.

We, however, realize that it cannot truly be a pilot project if we cannot really get input from all of the agencies, but if we can get it from the Federal Government we are determined we are going to attempt to approach this problem in some way that is new and different.

Senator Quart: Regarding your emergency homemaker service, which is a short term help for these families, for that you charge a small fee I suppose?

Mr. Milne: Geared to income.

Senator Quart: Now your family aid service, that is free, is it not?

Mr. Milne: That is correct.

Senator Quart: I note here in your brief and I was very impressed and I think maybe you are the only group that we have had before us that indicated the name—and I think it is a wonderful name—leisure consultants. I did hear it over the radio this morning, "Leisure" for "unemployment". I think that is quite an imaginative word.

On the other hand, I notice here where you mention in your brief what you call purchasing, which is rather a new term, I think, too, as far as I am concerned.

Would these purchasing arrangements you have with these agencies be with the volunteer groups or are they also agencies which funds have been provided for or volunteers? I notice that you mention on a team basis with social worker.

Mr. Milne: Funding arrangements we have under the preventive social service program exists with agencies that were already structured and also provided by the formation of citizens' groups who wish to carry out certain types of programs. We have funding arrangements for that type of group.

We have also funding arrangements with informally structured groups of citizens. As long as they have sufficient formal structure in terms of responsible officers and constitution we will consider some funding arrangements with them.

Senator Quart: Does it work satisfactorily with social workers? There is not any sort of jealousy between the volunteers?

Mr. Milne: In respect to these family aid service which is the point you are discussing, the service originally developed within the social service department related to this in respect of social assistance, and it has been gradually broadened to cover other situations in the community and is now available on the same basis to all types of agencies in the community of referral.

Where there is a person already involved, bearing in mind that this service was set up to assist those whose level of family functioning was not what it should be, generally speaking the initial point of contact has been through a social agency, and we feel it is an important aspect of this service that the family aid and the social worker work together in a combined relationship rather than having two people going in independently and trying to assist the individual.

Senator Quart: I note with great interest this team work has provided incentive for group programs which are friendship groups, as you call them, and I think that should be very valuable.

Mr. Wass: I would like to think, Senator, that we are moving away from lack of dialogue between volunteers, indigenous client people and social workers. They could do many things that social workers cannot do, and I think we need a real team approach here, and I think in many areas in Edmonton we are working on that.

Senator Quart: I think that is excellent. I realize social workers must become very—I don't know whether I should say frustrated or annoyed with a volunteer who doesn't know too much about it, but I think if you gave them a chance they would like to swing into action again for this area of poverty.

Mr. Milne: May I point out that contrary to widely-held opinion, the experience in Edmonton has shown it is possible to have effective partnership between volunteer and government departments.

In our Glengarry Centre that was referred to in our brief we have several hundred volunteers involved.

The Chairman: That concludes our hearing on behalf of the committee, Mr. Mayor. I want to tell you how helpful you were this morning in the statements you made to the committee; perhaps more than you can appreciate.

We thank you for the courtesy of coming. We thank Mr. Milne and Mr. Wass for appearing but what is more important to us is the fact that this subject is not new to you. You have had a long-time interest in it and you have had deep concern. We have heard from many witnesses and we feel that you have a knowledge and awareness that is very useful in times such as this.

On behalf of the committee I thank you.

Mayor Dent: Thank you, Senator Croll and members of the committee. If I may, I would like to say our thanks on behalf of Mr. Wass and Mr. Milne and myself for the cordial and extremely knowledgeable hearing.

One of the things that concerns us most is whether the people who are looking at things really in fact have the depth of understanding of the problem that is required to say, when they finish, "Here at least are some of the answers." I personally judge this to be so by the questions that I was asked, and I just want you to know, sir, and members of the committee, that I think we can expect certainly a high final exam mark from this committee.

Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Our second brief today is from the Monica Society. On my right is Mrs. Marie MacDonald, and behind me and Mrs. MacDonald are the lovely ladies who are part of the delegation and members of the Society.

Mrs. MacDonald will make a short statement and then we will start on the questioning. Go ahead, Mrs. MacDonald.

Mrs. Marie MacDonald, President, the Monica Society: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Senators, ladies and gentlemen, the Monica Society of Edmonton is a group of approximately 350 widows, separated and divorced women, and we welcome this opportunity to put before the Senate Committee our views on the important subject of poverty in Canada today.

The Senate Committee asked us for our views on poverty as it exists, social, psychological, political and cultural, which we feel are the main issues, and the end result is economic poverty.

Now, poverty as it exists in the lives of the Monicas, as we see it, is in four basic categories. One is loneliness, being unable to share things; being unable to share love; being unable to share responsibilities of the children, financial, economic and so on, and being unable to share experiences. This is very difficult in our lives.

The second thing we feel is important is the rejection by society. Everyone is sensitive to rejection, but many of us have had one serious rejection in our lives already and therefore we are very sensitive to it. Rejection in social gatherings, rejection by landlords when we apply for rental privileges; rejection by department stores when we apply for credit. Various means of rejections by society.

We feel there is a very serious void in the home with the absence of a father and husband. The children suffer because they do not have the male image. Our boys and girls are the adults of tomorrow and they do not know what to pattern their lives after. The boys don't know what is expected of a husband and father.

The girls don't know what to look for in a husband because in their home atmosphere mother is the main person, and this is not a true family situation.

We also feel that there is an inadequate system of legal aid. The present court system does not deal adequately with family problems. In the Province of Alberta there is a Family Court which is as adequate as possible and is doing a wonderful job except it is limited in its administration. We feel you have to jump from one court to another in order to get family problems straightened out.

Now, we have ideas and recommendations on solutions for the poverty problems as they exist in our lives, and for the first one, for loneliness, we are asking that you help us to develop personal growth in the individual.

This can be done in various ways. Professional counselling, personal development programs, educational and recreational facilities, and then encouragement and opportunity to attend these.

Day care centres so that mothers can go out to work without costing too much, and the security of knowing the family is being cared for.

The additional earning stimulation. Many of these women would like to keep contact with the business world, but this opportunity is stunted because those on welfare are not permitted to earn more than $25 a month, and this is not fair to the personal development of this individual. She should be encouraged to be eventually self-sufficient, and if she loses all contact with the business world, when the time comes and the family is grown, she is unable to do so.

The rejection by society: we appreciate and thank God for the many services that are available, and we are aware of them as most of society is.

We are also aware of the abuses of services that are available, and these are the things you hear about in society. You hear about people on welfare in the beer parlours, you hear about them taking taxis, and so on, and this is true, but they are in the minority.

Don't forget if you lacked self-confidence and the world seemed to be closing in around you and you were so worried or despondent, maybe you would take a taxi to the beer parlour too.

Society must be made aware of the individual and a sincere Christian acceptance must be extended by the community, by the agencies governing these poor people, and the combined governing bodies.

Discrimination must be eliminated. Department stores must be made aware of the fact that these women should be permitted an opportunity to establish their own credit.

Landlords should not be permitted to say if you are a widow or separated or divorced you can't rent a place in my building.

Property taxes: during the difficult years of raising a young family, recuperating from the shock that the world has fallen apart, struggling to make ends meet on a woman's salary, couldn't her taxes be re-assessed? Must she also contribute through her taxes to welfare when she is trying so hard not to be on welfare herself?

And the income tax, is it absolutely necessary for a woman receiving alimony—the husband is exempt from income tax on this money but the mother has to pay income tax on this money. Is this necessary?

And then there are the years when you have a small family and you are earning your own living, when you are income tax-free, your exemptions far out-weigh your earnings, and as the years go on eventually the children become self-supporting but they may still be living at home, at an age when your family should be encouraged to bring their friends home and so on, and finally mother finds herself in a position where her income does exceed the exemptions but there is not any money to fix up a rumpus room, to make things comfortable for these teenagers or young adults to bring their friends home.

Is there not a possibility that this tax might be pro-rated so that they are exempt and allow a little more money to allow repairs to make a family home? After years of struggling there has been no money available for repairs or fixing things up. Everything has been going downhill all these years and now the family is grown.

We are asking you to take a look at this situation, and we are asking you to take a look at the needs of the children.

These children suffer because society rejects them. You hear all the time that Susie comes home and says Janie next door can't play with her because her mother says she is from a broken home.

Mother herself must acquire some satisfaction within herself so that she can give them unconditional love and she has to have a good healthy outlook in order to be able to do this. She must be able to give them a good healthy image of manhood and respect for the absent father.

Now, in order to help us do this, we strongly endorse what is known as the Uncles at Large program here in Edmonton. This is a program which is financially supported by the Canadian Progress Club, and it is sponsored by the Family Service Association.

This is a tremendous program, and we mothers of children without a father recognize this need and the fulfillment of this need from this program more than any one else in the City.

The Uncles at Large program is similar to the Big Brother Program in other cities. But it needs financial assistance. It needs help. Uncles have to be screened and trained. There have to be counselling services with the children and with the uncle and so on, and what they are doing is tremendous, but we need a lot more of it.

As far as the inadequate system of legal aid is concerned, there was an article carried in the Canadian Bar Journal of October, 1967, about the Family Court, and it outlined desired changes as we feel they should be.

Now, basically, what this plan presents is a new family court established as a division of the Supreme Court. In other words, a court whereby divorces can be granted, judicial separations can be granted, which does not exist in our present Family Court.

The exercise of the jurisdiction in relation to all aspects of family law—one court could exercise all aspects of family law. A special judge or judges should be appointed to preside in the Family court and the judge will be required to be appointed by the Governor General according to the provisions of the British North America Act.

Now the second point in this family court program is establishment of department of court services which includes under the jurisdiction of this judge that is appointed by the Supreme Court—he has jurisdiction in the field of behavioural sciences and medicine. He has employees in his court qualified for this position and he has complete control of the whole situation.

The third point in this particular recommendation, as far as the court is concerned, that there should be a committee or advisory board established, including in its membership lawyers, representatives from the field of social work and other influential citizens to assist or advise and coordinate in this court.

This court would also include investigating services, probation staff, referees, counselling services, detention and shelter facilities and clinical services. These would all be incorporated. In other words, anything pertaining to the court, and having all the records and everything available in connection with the one family. This also includes collection of money from husbands even though they have gone to another province, and so on.

This would all be incorporated under this family court system, and presently in Alberta this is under study, and they are anticipating that they be accepted in the Legislature here.

So these are the problems of poverty as they exist in the lives of mothers endeavouring to bring up a family alone. We want to rise up against an economic and social system that makes poverty a by-product of growth. We want encouragement. We want people to recognize us as individuals. We want to be told that we are trying; that we are doing our best. We want encouragement. We want Christian acceptance of the individual who is trying to bring up her family alone.

And we thank you for hearing our considerations and hope we will have favourable discussion regarding this situation, at your disposal. Thank you for listening to our brief.

The Chairman: I am going to start with Senator Quart, but before we start I would like you to know this is not a new problem to us.

Mrs. MacDonald: I am sure it is not.

The Chairman: We have heard it and we are deeply, very deeply concerned because there are 165,000 what we call four D's: deserted, death, divorced, detained, and there are 350,000 children from those.

You should know we are fully aware of the total problem.

Mrs. MacDonald: No, I am sure you are.

Senator Quart: Mr. Chairman, I want to be very flippant for a moment if I may. In looking around you ladies, I really question the men in Alberta.

Mrs. MacDonald: We left them in other provinces.

Senator Quart: If you took a travelling van I am sure you would all be married again.

But I wanted to find out about your organization: I suppose that you are widowed or divorced or separated or what have you. How many members have you in that category?

Mrs. MacDonald: 350. This is a very small portion of the number that really exists.

Senator Quart: If one of your loyal members of the Monica Society gets married, is she automatically out?

Mrs. MacDonald: Yes. Don't forget there are 350 members, but there is an average of five children per mother, and this also goes along with her.

Senator Quart: Some of the bachelors around here who are too old to contribute to the population would have an already-made family.

I thoroughly agree with many of your recommendations, especially the one where the man can deduct alimony and yet when you receive that alimony you have to pay income tax on it. That, for my part, seems unjust. I don't know what I can do about it. However, I will pass up to see what our gentlemen will say.

Senator Carter: How long has your Society been in existence?

Mrs. MacDonald: Approximately nine years. Almost 10 years.

Senator Carter: Your numbers are they growing?

Mrs. MacDonald: Yes, they are growing. Unfortunately. Population is increasing.

Senator Quart: May I have this last question before you go onto something else: how many have you lost through marriage?

Mrs. MacDonald: Well, as we lose, we gain, so we only have numbers.

Senator Carter: Are your numbers growing faster than the population?

Mrs. MacDonald: No.

Senator Carter: You are just keeping pace?

Mrs. MacDonald: I would say approximately.

Senator Carter: What proportions do you think you represent of the total deserted wives?

Mrs. MacDonald: I would really guess—perhaps a third.

Senator Carter: About a third?

Mrs. MacDonald: I am only roughly guessing.

Senator Carter: Now, of the members that you have, the 350, how many of these would be on welfare?

Mrs. MacDonald: I would roughly guess again and say three-quarters. From half to three-quarters.

The Chairman: Let me make a distinction. Long-term welfare?

Mrs. MacDonald: Yes.

The Chairman: There is a distinction, you know?

Mrs. MacDonald: Yes, definitely. I tell you the reason the difference is. When a situation like this exists, a family breaks up, the woman has a choice of going out and earning her own living or staying at home with the family. Some are capable of earning their own living, and some are not.

Some people who are capable of earning their own living perhaps feel very strongly their position is in the home with the children, and they are humble enough to accept welfare in order to be with their children. And I think these people deserve recognition because they feel their place is at home.

Others feel differently. They feel they would be a better person if they go out and work. It depends on the individual.

Senator Carter: Of these 75 per cent that you say are on welfare, how many of these would be part-time employed?

Mrs. MacDonald: Very few, because of the limitations that exist. Many would like to, and I feel we have to encourage them because of the contacts with people, because it enables them to keep up to be out in the business world. It helps them to prepare for the day when they will be able to go out and work.

Presently it almost impossible if a woman decides to go out to work—with the additional cost involved she has to have nylons, makeup, and so on, and she has to have a babysitter.

Some of the social workers vary. Some of them encourage it and help them along and see ways where expenses could be deducted. Others are strict and do not permit this earning capacity at all.

Senator Carter: Those who are part-time employed, what they earn over $25 a week is deducted?

Mrs. MacDonald: That is right.

From the Floor: $25 a month?

Mrs. MacDonald: Perhaps one of the girls having had this experience would like to speak to this.

Senator Carter: It costs you more than that.

The Chairman: There are certain deductions that are permitted. For instance, the social worker will permit normal deductions—perhaps not for nylon stockings but car fare and that sort of thing.

Senator Carter: And babysitters?

The Chairman: Well, you are now getting into another category. They do assist the working poor in this province to a greater extent than anybody else does, but then they do not lay down a rule as to what is deductible and what is not. They leave it to the social worker, and some are good and some are not, as Mrs. MacDonald says.

Mrs. MacDonald: We would like to see these stipulations specified in writing. It would be a big help to those that are trying.

The Chairman: You need more than that. That is not what you need really. These people are just begging for maintenance income that comes in every month. They could do what they like. Live their own lives. Go to work or not go to work. This is the best example I know of.

Senator Carter: I think somebody in the group wanted to add something to this.

Mrs. Hegerat: Well, senator, I work at the school, so I work 10 months of the year.

The Chairman: As a part-time teacher?

Mrs. Hegerat: No. I am secretary, teacher's aid and librarian at present, so I work 10 months of the year.

Now, in the summertime expenses are extremely high with four teenagers whom I love and whom I want to keep around me, so you need to divvy up a lot of money but I don't have it by the time I deduct income tax—I have income tax deducted from my salary, but by the time I pay income tax on the alimony that my husband gives me, that amounts to approximately $150 a year on the alimony. Well, I am lucky that I get that much alimony.

So in the summertime I never have sufficient money for a vacation. I have never had a holiday since the day I was married, not one holiday since the day I was married. But, however, this is just to tell you about costs. And I need some kind of social subsidy. I need to be subsidized sometimes in the two summer months.

The Chairman: How old are the children?

Mrs. Hegerat: 11, twins 12 and the eldest 14.

Senator Carter: As an organized group have you had any success in making any impact on the authorities?

Mrs. Hegerat: No. We have had a great deal of discussion, and I think it takes a lot of discussion. I think now perhaps Mrs. MacDonald and the girls have agreed, and I have not been a spokesman very often or anything like that, but I think that they are beginning to make an impression for once.

I agree with the Senator here who said everybody is an individual, each individual has to be considered and the wants for each individual differ. I wish when I got my separation that I had had one, you know, that was justified, but I didn't get that legal help.

Senator Carter: The first group we had this morning told us about projects and preventive services and about day care centres. Do any of your group have any association with day care centres or any of these services?

Mrs. MacDonald: I do know that if it was more readily available we could take better use of it because I know myself in the past I could have used it had it been available. There is no need for it now, but there was a day when going to work every day was very, very difficult.

From the Floor: Their hours are restricted.

The Chairman: What are their hours?

Mrs. Brodeur: We have to have the children picked up at six o'clock and I work till 5.30 and work is a fair piece from the day care centre.

The Chairman: And delivered when?

Mrs. Brodeur: Any time that is convenient.

The Chairman: Any time before six?

Mrs. Brodeur: Yes, that is right.

Senator Carter: I read in one of the briefs, one of the briefs submitted to us—we haven't had it officially yet but I read it last night—where a group of women such as yours decided they are going to set up their own day care services and going to work out their own program.

Have you people given any thought to doing anything like that?

Mrs. MacDonald: No, we have not progressed to that stage, and being the oldest group perhaps we should have. I don't know. Our concentration as a group is more on the individual, care and encouragement that we endeavour to help and give to one another.

We bring in professional speakers to discuss problems of interest in our lives.

We have socials; we have gatherings, and we have summer camps for mothers and children. Our purpose is to bring people together and meet one another and have associations and have encouragement from one another.

When someone comes into our group and she is perhaps newly separated with three or four children and she takes a look at one of our girls over here with 11 children and she is doing a wonderful job; she has a smile on her face, and this in itself is group therapy. It is helping one another, and this is basically the purpose of our group.

Senator Carter: Your brief lays great emphasis on the children, and the effects of the separation and the type of life they have to live.

How do you manage for your children? Is it possible for them to participate in organizations, normal organizations like guides and scouts and things like that?

Mrs. MacDonald: Yes, and we encourage this very much, especially where there is male leadership. But then you get other activities which our children are excluded from like various companies that have parties and things for their children, which, especially if a mother needs social assistance, she is not associated with any company that does things like this.

Usually the cost is provided for attendance at Cubs and scouts no matter what the circumstances may be. Anything more expensive is out of reach and not inclusive for our children.

Mrs. Germaine Gourmant: My son did go to the Cubs for awhile, but when it comes to father and son supper, he wouldn't go back. His father was not there and there was no place for the mother so he wouldn't go back.

I should have gone to the leader and said "You go with him", but the little guy decided he was not like the others. And the same with daughters that are in Guides. Sometimes they have a father and daughter group—so it goes back to the children themselves.

Senator Carter: Other influences in the home like Sunday School: are your children handicapped with regard to those type of things?

Mrs. MacDonald: I think you will find that each individual case is different and it depends on the mother.

If the mother, through rejection from society, withdraws into herself, her children also withdraw with her. It is almost a natural situation. If she does not participate and she is so depressed and lacking in self-confidence that she doesn't go out and communicate with her children and the community and so on, then she withdraws and so does her children.

Mrs. Lou Hope: The government puts money into the alcoholic foundation, and in Edmonton I guess you are aware of Belmont Centre and Hilltop House, and now I hear they are making centres for the drug children. But what about the straight kids like ours? If you are not affluent you don't belong to clubs. There is no tennis court or badminton. This is just an example. About a week ago I sent my two boys swimming and they had to waste bus tickets because in this big city of 400,000 we have about five swimming pools.

In an hour they were back and said there was no room and the man said you might as well go home. There was a line up.

Now, when straight kids want to swim they can't swim, but if you are a drug addict they will build you a centre. How come the government has a system where they lock the barn door after the horse is stolen?

First of all, you should keep the good people good. These people that are over the hill, there is not much you can do for them anyway.

All these alcoholics that cost all the money, they only rehabilitate about one per cent or less, and yet good kids from families that are not affluent have nowhere to go. Nowhere to go. I don't mean the wee ones that are supposed to be with their mother. There is a real good parks and recreation commission for children from six to 10, but after that where do you go?

Senator Carter: Your children have no access to organized ball games or organized sports?

Mrs. Hope: The little leagues can only accumulate so much and the rugby can only accumulate so many, and if you don't fit in or if they don't have room for you, what do you do? There is no badminton court, there is no tennis court, and bowling alleys costs piles of money. So what do you do?

They have to stand on the street corner. Your mother hasn't got money to hand you a few dollars. Recreation facilities for the 11 to 17 is really sad.

From the Floor: You find your teenagers tend to go towards children that have money, and they want these things so desperately and you have to try and steer your children in the other direction towards children that perhaps don't have as much as your children. You can't provide these things for your children, and after these kids that have everything, they are not the healthiest of children. They have lots of money and they can go where they want but truly they are not the best of children, and you are afraid your children will get in with the wrong group.

Naturally your child looks up to these children that have more money than good and a better family name and yet I take great pride in my family. I think they are wonderful children.

I have a 15 year old son and I find I have to keep guiding him back on the path I want him to go, and he will still listen to reason. I can reach him. I have to make threats but then on the other hand I can also reach him through his heart and through good talking, but how long am I going to be able to do this?

Senator McGrand: How many children have you?

Mrs. A. MacDonald: I have four. I have a 17 year old daughter that is a marvelous help and I have been a widow for eight years. My baby is eight years old now. I have raised these children for eight years. I have lived on my husband's insurance and I find my money is running out.

In the last two years I have gone on part-time work, and this is all I can handle because I feel my children need me because there is only one parent in the family, and my kids need me up to a point. So my daughter babysits for me in the summertime. She is doing a marvelous job. I am as proud as can be of her. And I think my other children are going to be just as good. I want them to be good citizens too. But my money is running out so I am going to have to go on social welfare, and this really hurts. It hurts me, very, very much. I have a pride.

Senator Carter: You are one of the ones that are not on welfare?

Mrs. A. MacDonald: Not yet, but it is coming so close and I am running scared.

Senator Carter: I would like to ask a question of somebody who is on welfare, and because of the special circumstances are your children, being brought up with no father and in a home limited to the welfare income, handicapped because of recreational facilities and opportunities and other things that have been mentioned?

Do you feel your children are developing a different sense of values from normal because of this? Are they developing a different expectation from life than normal because of these special circumstances?

Mrs. Anna Sherman: I have seven children, and I don't tell my children that we are on welfare. They never knew we were until my oldest boy started high school last fall. I figured what they didn't know didn't hurt them.

They go to school. All the children on welfare would raise their hands...

The Chairman: We have been told time and again that that has not happened in Alberta for some years.

Mrs. Sherman: It has. It happened last fall when the kids started school.

The Chairman: We had a complaint. It was brought to our attention and we brought it to the attention of the authorities, and we were assured that it was not being done.

Senator McGrand: Who asked that question?

The Chairman: The teacher did.

Senator McGrand: Why?

Mrs. Sherman: I don't know why. She asked all the children on welfare to raise their hand and stand on the side.

My oldest boy started high school last fall, and on the application for high school it says right on it are you on welfare or not, and he put no we were not, and I said yes, we are, which came as a kind of shock to him. So he went to high school. They had to apply August 14th or something to register for high school and he arrived and he had no voucher. He arrived in high school and they said, "Oh, you are on welfare?" And he said, "Well, I have come to register." "Don't bother. Come back when you have your voucher". Vouchers came three or four days or a good week after school started. He had no books. He wasn't really registered or anything, and later on another set came out, and he was told all the kids on welfare—this is at high school—all the kids on welfare go to a certain part and they bring a little slip to get their text books, and he had no little slip. He had to take it to each individual teacher to get his supplies, and he was so ashamed he said because the classes would start, for the semester all the kids would come into the class and the class would start, and in order to get the teacher he would have to go up during the class and ask the teacher to fill in the slips, so consequently he never got the slips filled in and I bought his gym clothes and running shoes and school supplies and stuff for him and I thought, well, I wouldn't do it myself and I didn't think that he was being wrong in being ashamed to go up.

I think this has had a bad effect on him in high school. And when it came to the end of the year and they were turning books back in and the kids were all turning books back in, he noticed kids were getting caution fees back—you put a deposit on books, and if they are damaged they take a certain amount off—as he was not trying to do anything underhand, and the teacher said oh, trying to pull something swift there. You are on welfare. This goes back to the government. And he said he was so mad he would love to smash the guy in the face. This is a boy in high school.

Senator Carter: This is an impressionable age too.

Mrs. Sherman: It makes him want to quit school.

Senator Carter: You mentioned in your brief being required to line up in a department store in a special line-up marked "Welfare". Is that very prevalent? Is that being done?

Mrs. MacDonald: It happened.

Senator Carter: What department store?

Mrs. MacDonald: Woodward's. Woodward's uptown. I feel they have since been notified and I doubt if it exists this September because this is not the first time that it has been brought to light, but it did exist.

The Chairman: It won't exist after this gets in the papers today.

A point to follow up—these women have said we have already been subject to one rejection. Don't forget rejection is a two way street. You, too, have rejected.

Mrs. MacDonald: I am glad someone is standing up for the men.

The Chairman: That is a right you have. But here are these children, 350,000 across the country being influenced as a result in an environment. What is the effect? What effect is it going to have on these children who we could possibly save?

Senator Carter: Yes what we refer to as our most valuable resources.

The Chairman: So if we can get any deeper as to what we can do to help them out.

Mrs. MacDonald: This Uncles at Large program, there is one basic thing I think which can be extended to our girls as well as our boys.

The Chairman: Aunts?

Mrs. MacDonald: No. Uncles. Girls need the relationship of men just as much as boys do. Almost as much.

The Chairman: It is not quite that easy to extend it to girls.

Senator Carter: You can't have Aunts at Large.

The Chairman: I realize that uncles are excellent, but we have had Big Brothers in some of the larger cities for many, many years. They are very, very helpful.

Mrs. MacDonald: Extremely helpful.

The Chairman: But really they have not replaced a father or mother.

Mrs. MacDonald: No, but it certainly helps.

The Chairman: Your problem is deeper than that.

Mrs. Bernice Dumont: I want to speak on behalf of welfare, I have been on welfare all my life. I have been a welfare child all my life. I have been without a father all my life.

This gentleman here asked what becomes of children that have to be degraded and have to shun away from public people. I know because I went through it, and believe me it is not easy.

I am 32 years old. I have six children. Now when I got married I was so ignorant and so lacking in understanding I couldn't even get through. It took me years. I am 32 now and I am just beginning to see, and I would like to see my kids have a better life than I ever did because I have lost and I have gained, and I lose, and I would gain again, but I would pick up and start all over again, and that was not easy, believe me.

I have been called down to the worst and I wouldn't say that it was my fault. I had to grow. This is sort of what happened in my life. I have six children that I didn't even realize what is going to happen to these kids.

Senator Carter: This feeling of rejection that you yourself feel because you have experienced it, is that communicated onto the children?

Mrs. Dumont: Oh, definitely.

Senator Carter: How does it manifest itself? What is it doing to the children?

Mrs. Dumont: Well, in my case I have a 13 year old son and he has got a chip on his shoulder. He needs help. He needs a bit of counselling. We need to get together because he knows that I was not a perfect woman. I was not perfect. I couldn't do many things because I didn't know how.

Now I got into Monicas about a year ago. Just before that there was a lady across the street from me and I used to wonder how could she make out; how does she do it? How could she go to church and pray and put a smile on and she had just hard times. She lives alone too.

But I kept watching her, and this is how I began, and as I say, it wasn't easy, and along the line with other things—but there is one thing I can really say, that I really tried. I would go down and I would come back up again.

And these vouchers. I told welfare if they were going to give me a voucher they could have six kids along with them, and they said you have to go on voucher because you are not strong enough to handle your own money. I said, here is the kids. I am just about broke up now. I said if you think I can't handle it you can keep it, and I got a cheque for my rent and what I needed.

Now if they could love you, you can love them, and this is all it amounts to. And secondly, when they have to go to school and they have to stand on the side like that and this teacher—again I have seen it and my step father has done this—stand on the side of the grocery store, and they were selling coffee and everything. If he wanted a drink they knew how to get it, and if they want money to drink, they will do it whether there are vouchers or not.

But what about people like us. Why should we go along with vouchers?

Senator Carter: Vouchers are degrading.

Mrs. Dumont: They are very degrading, and we approximately live on a dollar a day. That is to feed the children, clothe the children.

Senator Carter: You mean a dollar a day each?

Mrs. Dumont: A dollar a day for six.

Senator Carter: For how many?

Mrs. Dumont: I have six children.

Senator Carter: You have to skip that dollar for the whole six?

From the Floor: A dollar each.

Mrs. Dumont: I get $8 a month per child, and my kids have to drink water because I can't supply milk.

The Chairman: You have six children and you are one. That makes seven. What do you receive in total?

Mrs. Dumont: I get $69 for groceries every two weeks, and there is my rent, there is my utilities, and my utilities average—I just dished out yesterday $30 for utilities.

The Chairman: Have you any idea what total aid you would get in one month?

Mrs. Dumont: I get it every two weeks. I get more on the first than I do on the second. Here we go again. I don't know anything about this I get my cheque and I do the best I can. If you was to ask me totally how much I have got—I have no schooling.

The Chairman: Well now, wait a minute. You have friends in the Society here.

Mrs. Dumont: I get $116 the middle of the month and I get $206 on the first.

The Chairman: You get $312?

Senator Carter: That is for a family of seven?

The Chairman: She is lucky she is not living in Nova Scotia or Newfoundland.

Senator Carter: Are there any other ways in which the children feel different from other children? You have mentioned discrimination, that they have to present a voucher and they have to line up and they have to present themselves. In what other ways are the children at school made to feel they are different from others?

The Chairman: You mean because they are on welfare or just generally?

Senator Carter: Well, any way, because they are on welfare or because they are from this type of family.

Mrs. Anna Sherman: I find on the hockey teams and the baseball teams, the children that are going to these things have fathers to pick them up. My boy played hockey last year, and every game, every practice, they had to scrounge around and get a ride. A ride there and a ride home. Sometimes they wouldn't phone for a practice. A father would be picking up so many children and he wouldn't be picked up because he had no one to drive him.

I think they feel this. They feel they would like their dad there or someone there to give them a little bit of encouragement. I don't know that much about hockey. He would come home and mention such and such a play. It doesn't mean anything to me.

The Chairman: How many of you girls work? When you are working you are paying under the pension plan. How many of you are paying under the pension plan. What has happened to that?

From the Floor: They keep it.

The Chairman: For instance, let us assume you paid for some length of time. I don't care how long, but you did. What has happened to whatever payments you made? Have you continued to make any kind of payment?

From the Floor: I have never been on welfare, but there is discrimination.

From the Floor: You have to be sure your children are well dressed.

The Chairman: No, no, we are off that. We will get back on. You have always worked?

From the Floor: Someone who has worked and then not worked.

From the Floor: I have worked for a month.

The Chairman: Anybody longer than four months?

From the Floor: I have for seven years. I had to give up.

The Chairman: And during the time that you paid the pension plan for the last two years—you just gave up when?

From the Floor: I gave up eight years ago.

Mrs. Hegerat: I am considering giving up work. What should I do about that?

The Chairman: It is a problem you did not cover in your brief, I was going to try to get at it. For those people who had contributed and then given up, it is almost a total loss unless some method is established to permit a means of continuing to pay for a pension.

Mrs. Hegerat: I had a breakdown last year and was forced to be on sick leave for six weeks, so really I feel that I shouldn't perhaps take on the two jobs again this year.

The Chairman: We will get back to that.

Mrs. Hegerat: So I wondered what to do, just to continue to pay it myself or the Federal Government?

The Chairman: Of course once you are not employed you can't.

Mrs. Hegerat: Then you have lost it, just like I paid 18 years Unemployment Insurance.

The Chairman: No, that is a different matter. That is a different matter entirely. You could have collected it if you had need of it, but this is a matter of pension in which no provision is being made for people such as yourself. It is a new problem. We have to work out some method so that there is some pension for people like you.

Mrs. Pruss: I have always worked to support myself...

Senator McGrand: We cannot hear you.

Mrs. Pruss: —none of which I have ever been able to collect. I would like to suggest there must be some government that can apply these orders to social security members so it is first deducted from the husband's pay cheque?

Why should I have to take money and bread out of my children's mouths to chase him for something that he has responsibility for.

The Chairman: He is available?

Mrs. Pruss: He has moved to another province. Some quarters have criticized me because I do not have the money to chase him. I don't think it is fair that they should just walk away and the government doesn't help me.

Senator McGrand: I have several questions, and I will be as brief as I can, and you can make your answers as brief.

First, how did you choose the name Monica for the group?

Mrs. MacDonald: Senator McGrand, from New Brunswick maybe you should know. I am from New Brunswick.

St. Monica was the mother of St. Augustine, and if you are aware of all of the background of St. Augustine, he was a deplorable boy. He was just impossible. St. Monica was a widow and she was attempting to bring up this boy under the most terrible circumstances.

Senator McGrand: You have answered the question.

Mrs. MacDonald: He succeeded. He turned out to be a saint and she a happy mother, and we pattern our lives after her.

Senator McGrand: You have referred to the lack of father image in the homes where there is no father and I presume it is worse in the home of the deserted mother than it is in the home of the widow?

Mrs. MacDonald: Right.

Senator McGrand: Apart from the misery which these women must endure, can you give me some idea, some example of this, of something that has happened to them? For example, is there an increase in drugs, the children that take drugs in the families of these deserted mothers? Is there an increase in juvenile delinquency, and I agree with the lady who said that every snub does count, and I cannot understand why a teacher would be permitted to get away with insulting a child in school because just this organization with 350 members that seems to have capable leadership, has not been able to expose this sort of thing in schools.

Now would you just give me some idea about the problem of drugs among children of families and is it more so in the families of deserted mothers, or is it common in all children that have no father image in the home?

Mrs. MacDonald: We discussed this with the counsellors at family service, and as far as statistics are concerned I understand that it exists—that these statistics are not higher as far as juvenile delinquency is concerned.

However, a mother has more difficulty with discipline. There is no doubt about that. She is a mother. She is a good mother. She is doing the best she can, but she is not a father. Therefore these children have a very difficult experience in trying to cope with conforming to a mother's discipline when it should be coming from the man.

Senator McGrand: I am well aware of this, but what I mean, does it add up to more drugs and delinquency or not.

Mrs. MacDonald: No.

Senator McGrand: All right. You have answered the question. Now in this problem of desertion, what is the average number of children in the homes of people who belong to the Monica Organization?

Mrs. MacDonald: I would say the average is five. We have a lady with 11. We have another with 12. We have another in the audience with nine. Three, four, five.

From the Floor: Five is the average.

Senator McGrand: Have you got any with just two?

Mrs. MacDonald: Yes. Some with one. We have members of our group with one.

Senator McGrand: Looking back at this thing, what happened to these men that they suddenly took off? Were they alcoholics? Were they too lazy to work? What was the problem?

The Chairman: You are really going to get a blast, you know.

Mrs. MacDonald: I would like to relate it to what it does to the children.

Senator McGrand: Was it just incompatibility?

Mrs. MacDonald: I think it is a lack of responsibility, and which can exist in our children if they are not given a good male image.

Senator McGrand: Immaturity can work both ways.

Mrs. MacDonald: Lack of responsibility, immaturity, and lack of accepting responsibility. Therefore they are unable to cope. They love these children too. I have no doubt but they do. They just can't cope with the situation.

Senator McGrand: You mean these men can't?

Mrs. MacDonald: They can't. And therefore it results in drugs and abusives and so on.

Senator McGrand: Do drugs and alcohol play a factor with these men at the time of desertion, or has it?

Mrs. MacDonald: I think you would find that in 90 per cent of the cases alcohol has.

Senator McGrand: Alcohol; not drugs? You have told me to be careful and not to get in trouble. Now I am walking right into it. Are these frustrated women that we are talking about—they are all frustrated—all their problems, and you know that today people who try to escape reality, they do go to drugs or something else to escape reality.

Is there any tendency on the part of these women, women that we don't see around us, but they are around the country. Is it a tendency of these people to use drugs in order to escape reality?

Mrs. MacDonald: Not that we are aware of.

From the Floor: What kind of drugs?

Senator McGrand: This is important?

The Chairman: You are not talking about 222's?

Senator McGrand: I am not talking about a bottle of beer now. We have an awful lot of people both men and women in an affluent society who just simply cannot face up to the facts of life and they are on drugs.

Now, if these people who evidently do not have too many problems to face up to, if they are on drugs, what is the strength of these women who are frustrated and deserted and yet they do not go and try to escape reality by going to drugs. I think this is something worth investigating.

The Chairman: She will give you an answer.

Mrs. MacDonald: Well, I think probably you will discover that these mothers are going through an experience which in itself strengthens them because they are the sole support of their children and therefore they keep together regardless.

Mrs. Cecile Larocque: I have 11 children and my husband has two of them and I have the others. As much as I would like to have them all.

You are talking about not being able to do things. I have had physical and mental breakdown—that is four years ago and I am still not well. What has happened, my husband took up with the woman that was taking care of my children, and he took her and I am told to get out, and so there you are.

Senator McGrand: I think you have got your finger on it. This problem makes them stronger, so there you are.

Senator Quart: Of course that is right.

Mrs. Larocque: That is what happens with me. I am trying to get well, and I am still getting quite well, but that is what happened, and it is there, and he simply has lost—yet now he has another family. What do you think of that?

So don't think that we are not capable. My goodness. I wouldn't be here now if weren't that I have a little bit of faith to keep me going.

The Chairman: You keep that faith.

Mrs. Audrey Brockman: I feel the members of this Society are not necessarily a true picture of all women who are alone. I think the women who are attracted to this Society are a section who are basically very good and are very concerned about their children and maybe who are not right down to the dregs unless we have found them. I think there are many mothers who are alone in the city who are really down and out. We are not reaching them, and they have not the ability to go out or the courage or whatever it is.

I do not think we can speak for the group that are having drug problems necessarily, and alcohol problems among their children. I think our group is a group who are trying to keep our hopes up and work together to do this, but I know there are many, many people who are not able to do it and are not in our society, and we are not able to get them.

Senator Carter: You have not found any way of rescuing them?

Mrs. Brockman: This is what I feel is lacking in our society. We are pretty well bogged down with our problems, all of us, and trying to keep together.

I feel what we need is somebody in each area, of our own type, who would understand their problems, who will be able to go out and work among these people. I really feel this is what we need in this city. Social workers without having the experience of some of our problems, would not really have that true understanding of it.

Senator McGrand: Don't you think people with this experience could make better social workers?

From the Floor: Definitely. Yes. Yes.

Mrs. Brockman: We have two or three right here who are an aid and understudy to social workers, and I think they are tremendous people.

Mrs. Kirk: I am one of these unfortunate ladies. I am glad there is one lady with me who is getting alimony. I have been getting alimony. My husband is earning $12,000 a year. He has since married to the matron of a hospital—I don't know exactly her wages, but you would know the matron of any hospital is earning quite a bit. They live in a $35,000 home. I don't begrudge any of this. There are no children, though.

I have been getting the whole sum of $3,000 a year for myself and three children.

Now it wasn't too bad three, six or seven years ago. My children were then two, four, six or something, but now they are seven to teenage level. One teenager.

You tell me why I am supposed to pay tax on $3,000 a year just because I am only allowed $2,700. That is all I am allowed. I have nothing against welfare, but oft times I say I wish I was on it believe me because I have got to pay my dental bills, my Alberta Health Care, the children's books, you know, the whole bit.

Now out of that $250 a month...

The Chairman: Let me put it to you this way: we are aware of that $2,700. We think it is entirely unfair. We have taken note of it. But under the new proposal made by Mr. Benson people such as you will not be paying into this at all.

From the Floor: But how quick is this going to go through?

Mrs. Kirk: Six or seven years ago my husband was not earning $12,000. My children were much younger. Why isn't there a stipulation that as his wages rise he should be entitled to pay a little more?

The Chairman: Well, of course, you can always make application.

Mrs. Kirk: My husband is not in this province, and I have employed my own lawyer who, believe it or not, is very kind—not all men are bad—and he has been very good and he has tried, God knows he has tried, but it is absolutely impossible because your B.C. Jurisdiction is not the same as Alberta Jurisdiction, and in no way—he would have to send an agent, and even then we would probably fall over on our faces, and this is something I believe and I am sure he is right there.

The Chairman: That is the law. There is no question about it, the law is deficient.

Mrs. Kirk: If he was in Alberta I could probably get after him. And another thing I want to tell you, I am a great Edmonton Eskimo fan. We are the team that lost—well, as I say, I still support them. They are losers, but one of these days they are going to be winners. They are not all bad. Remember the 57, 54, 55 years. They were good then.

I am behind them. They will come up a winner, but what they are lacking is a quarterback, and this society of ours, we have a good quarterback, and this team is behind this quarterback. We are going to be a winner like the Eskimos. One of these days we will be a winner and believe you me we will work hard to get there.

Senator Pearson: Is this a city-wide organization?

Mrs. MacDonald: City-wide non-denominational.

Senator Pearson: Have you any special place you meet at?

Mrs. MacDonald: In a church basement that is available.

Senator Pearson: Do you have regular meetings?

Mrs. MacDonald: No. We send out newsletters advising them of the activities that are going on. It may be a meeting in a church basement; it may be a picnic in church grounds somewhere. We try to spread it around as much as possible. I understand you are aware we have invited you to lunch, and we immediately contacted a church and the people are very, very good to us. It is a non-profit organization.

Senator Pearson: You talk about loneliness, do you try to develop a sort of spirit, a group spirit?

Mrs. MacDonald: Can you see it today?

Senator Pearson: Yes, I can see that, but you have a lot of members who are not here.

Mrs. MacDonald: That is right, and as Audrey said, all those we don't reach, we don't know about. Then there are members on our membership list who yet have not reached the ranks of being able to break out as much as the girls who are here today, but we keep in contact and keep encouraging them, to try to bring them out to activities, and once they have been out, they seem to pick up the threads and form friendships.

Senator Pearson: Can you go any farther? You have your children. Can you get your children into a group as well because they seem to be rejected by other people?

From the Floor: They want their own friends.

Senator Pearson: From their own community.

Mrs. MacDonald: It is not fair for us to cause another situation of discrimination.

Senator Quari: You mentioned summer camp, and I think it is a wonderful idea. How do you raise your funds for this? Do you charge a fee for belonging to this?

Mrs. MacDonald: No, there is no fee for belonging to the group, but we operate the camp—it is for mothers and children, and as a result it is usually mothers who are not working that attend as a general rule, and the welfare department does provide camp money for any child that is presently on welfare, and therefore they pay us.

Senator Quari: Do they staff the camp?

Mrs. MacDonald: No. We do it all ourselves.

Senator Quari: Talking about your friendship clubs, why wouldn't you extend an invitation some evening to the lonely men to come? There are lots of lonely men.

Mrs. MacDonald: There are lonely men in the city, and the men who are bringing up children by themselves deserve a lot more credit than we do because it is a lot harder. There are other groups.

Senator Quari: No, I am not a match-maker, but they are lonely too maybe.

Mrs. MacDonald: But we are not here to complicate the ladies' lives any more than they are, and our purpose is to help one another in their present state of life. If they want to seek company that will perhaps lead to marriage, there is lots of opportunity.

Senator Quari: I do not exactly agree with you that it is easier for women to bring up their children that it is for a man, a widower or divorced man who has custody of the children, because I think so many times people have great sympathy for men who do have the children and they are lonely, and they get more assistance probably and they think women can cope.

From the floor: The mother's influence. But there are lots of single clubs in the city where men can go, and women can go to these clubs. But boy, you can meet men there who have four or five children.

The Chairman: There is one thing that troubles me. In making up your brief you have dealt with human problems. We are not dealing with that today. That is your private business. We are concerned with your economic problems. Some of you have had four, five or six years of living on assistance. Certainly you have been able to prove that you are good budgeters, that you can make a dime go a long way.

Mrs. MacDonald: I am surprised at your comment that we have human problems but they are none of your business.

The Chairman: Your human problems happened and are your own business. I am talking about the economic problem that is with you now.

Mrs. MacDonald: Are you only concerned with economic problems?

The Chairman: No, but at the moment my question deals with economic problems. I am not entering into human problems because that is a matter for yourself. It has happened.

Mrs. MacDonald: But I think the human element is the most important part of it.

The Chairman: How can we correct that?

Mrs. MacDonald: By creating a good Christian attitude, to help encourage acceptance, encouragement for the people who are trying to do something for themselves, and encouragement for the Uncles at Large program so that our children can develop.

The Chairman: If you have got all that without income, where are you?

Mrs. MacDonald: I don't think that is important for the individual.

The Chairman: You don't think income is important?

Mrs. MacDonald: Oh, I do. I say it is not as important as the individual. Personal development of the individual which means no discrimination against her earnings and her children, and the classroom and vouchers and these things are all involved.

The Chairman: It seems to me the first necessity you need is income; isn't it?

Mrs. MacDonald: Yes.

The Chairman: How is it in the course of the brief not much was made of it?

Mrs. MacDonald: Because we feel conditions as they presently exist deserve credit because there was a time in our country when these things were not available, and there are some recommendations for improvement of the present situation and set up on welfare, but there are many here who are not even on welfare, and we are not asking for economic help, and we are asking for various other things.

For the ladies who are on welfare we are working for acceptance and encouragement and so on so that some day perhaps they will reach a stage when the family is grown and they too can join the ranks of the self-sufficient, and their children could follow their pattern.

But if the mother is so depressed and desolate and isolated from society, there is nothing to do but go to the beer parlour. If her self-image is not improved to the state where she can accept society and feel that society accepts her, then your economic problem exists because the money goes in beer instead of feeding the children.

Mrs. Kirk: May I speak for the Uncles at Large? I have two girls and one boy, and being that I have no brothers nor sisters nor mother nor father here in Canada—all my relatives are in Scotland—and this was the thing that hurt me badly when my situation happened to me. What was I going to do for my son? There was no one that could come in.

I would like to speak up for the Uncles at Large. Maybe the government could help organizations like this, because my son has been very lucky, and he is a lovely gentleman that comes, and I am very happy about it because now he is getting in with a male finally, and as I said, if this organization had not been, I really don't know.

Sure, there are neighbours. Fine, but they have their own family and their own wives and sometimes it is not easy to cram in four children in your own family car.

So I think, sir, if there is something you could do, something maybe in these organizations, because I know a little while ago my son was out with this uncle; they were selling flags or something to help the organization.

I think it is wonderful to volunteer their time, sir, and their help, for these unfortunate boys, leaving their wives and family to go and help our boys. Don't you think they shouldn't have to try to get the monetary value? Why aren't they somehow subsidized from government in a very worthwhile organization like this.

Mrs. Therese Gagnon: My son was always with me or children of his age, and he has matured, and I think this Uncle at Large is just wonderful.

Senator McGrand: You can't write it into legislation. This is something you have to develop, and this is a powerful group.

Senator Quarr: Do any of your boys belong to the Boy Scouts?

Mrs. Kirk: My son is a great hockey player and I love hockey as I love all sports, and I go and watch him play hockey. But the point is he comes home like any other little boy and he says, "Mom, the coach says you have got to get your father to drive." Then, of course, mother has got to go and get hold of the coach and explain the whole situation. It gets terrible to always be explaining it, and sometimes the child does back out because he hasn't a father to drive him. We don't have a car. I don't think they mean to hurt the children, but it happens.

Senator Carter: Could I just ask one question? The lady over there on the end with the daughter growing up around 16. Some of you have youngsters around 17. Teenagers.

Do you sense in observing them because your own marriage has gone on the rocks one way or another that they will not expect their own marriages to last either?

From the floor: No. No. The other way around.

Mrs. Kirk: I don't think any of us have brought our children up to say you have to hate your father.

Senator Carter: No, I was not meaning that.

Mrs. Kirk: We brought them up with the idea that something has happened in our marriage. There is no reason why the same thing should come up in yours.

From the floor: I have a 20 year old daughter and she has delayed her marriage a year according to the adjustment of the situation. It takes them longer. They hesitate.

The Chairman: I must tell you that last night when I read this brief—I thought it was a very touching brief—the committee shares that view pretty well. It is a real difficult situation involving, as I said earlier, almost half a million human beings in this country. Not only are women involved but there are children involved as well. It is not an easy problem.

I do not think the committee knows at the moment what recommendations we will make. Our research people have given it a very thorough study. We put a much emphasis on this because of the problems and because it is out of proportion in Canada. Don't ask me why. I don't know. We have not come to that. There are no guiding rules for us to look at in some other country and see what they did. We seem to have more of it for some reason or other. I do not know where the blame lies.

I think what is very healthy here today is that there are women who are not on public assistance and who are part of the organization and have come here to assist and join with others to see if they cannot help to bring about some solution. That is important.

Senator McGrand: I have one question. May I ask it now?

The Chairman: Yes, sure.

Senator McGrand: What was the average age of most of the women, the deserted mothers, at the time of their marriage? Were they married in their teens or twenties or what was the average?

From the floor: I was 30.

From the floor: I was 23.

Senator McGrand: Tell me this: how many of these people that you know about, how many of those women or their husbands were products of deserted homes?

From the floor: I don't think mine.

From the floor: No.

Senator McGrand: It is not very common. There has been very little research done in this field.

Mrs. MacDonald: I don't think our group can speak for others. The ones we have here are not the ones who are down and out.

Mrs. Larocque: Before you finish, could I just say one quick thing?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mrs. Larocque: There is discrimination on welfare between boys and girls. I had a daughter 18; she was attending university, and they didn't cut her off until her 18th birthday. And when the boy was 16 he passed into university and was going to university in September, and at the end of March I got a letter saying will you please pay back $300 we paid you? We fed your son and clothed your son since September and you are not allowed to, and I said I don't understand it, and the worker came down and he said we keep the boys until they are out of Grade 12 and then they are on their own.

From the floor: It is not fair.

Mrs. Larocque: And in order not to repeat this, you should see that boys should get a good education. He earned his money through the summer for clothes and books, and what welfare was doing was feeding him, and they cut him off.

The Chairman: Well, as I was saying, the problem is a serious one. We appreciate your coming here and joining with the others and speaking to us.

We are taking a very serious and very sympathetic look at something here that is most unusual. We thank you for coming and presenting your brief. It was very well done, and you covered many of the topics that needed covering, and you have our appreciation. Thank you.

Mrs. MacDonald: Thank you very much, Senator Croll, and all the other Senators, and we want to thank you for even taking time out to listen.

We will be delighted to have you for lunch.

(Noon adjournment)

(Upon resuming at 1.30 p.m.)

The Chairman: We will call the meeting to order. We have a brief from The Edmonton Social Planning Council. On my right is Mr. J. Donahue, President, who will introduce his delegation.

Mr. J. Donahue, President, the Social Planning Council: Senator Croll, members of the Senate Committee, starting on the left, Denise Williams, who will speak for the Growing Up Together Society, Mrs. Stacey, mother of four children on welfare, who has something to say, Father Marc Barrier, who will explain the diagram here which is just behind, Terry Hansen from the Future Society, and Denis Bartell, who will talk of the co-op community which was designed.

When we first spoke with your advance agent Michael Clague we could only think of your trip to Edmonton as being meaningful if, in some way, we could make you aware of the uniqueness of poverty in Edmonton.

We at the Edmonton Social Planning Council are becoming involved in the process of change which is affecting all of society today. We would like to tell you about some of our involvement with people and projects related to poverty.

A superficial glance may have you believe that there is very little poverty in Edmonton. Our old buildings are not so old and there are so few of them. The scene is deceiving.

Edmonton's motto "Gateway to the North" can suggest a swinging gate with people coming to Edmonton from the East—Toronto is 1,600 miles away—and through Edmonton to the North, and displaced people from the North—Inuvik is 1,300 miles away—moving into Edmonton. Edmonton is truly a transient distribution centre of people and goods.

Edmonton Social Planning Council recognizes that we have means to solve poverty at our disposal if only we had the wish to do so. What we have described as an ethical revolution is necessary. The guaranteed income and new means of freeing resources is a proposed start. Our own Council has had to make some difficult decisions—will we remain an old style Council doing patchwork and re-inforcement planning? As Henry Ford has proposed, that we take part in this peaceful social revolution. Will we become a leader in this peaceful revolution?

We see our way more clearly now and perhaps are in a better position to take risks and try new techniques that Government itself cannot do.

We have in our presentation developed a design of one poverty cycle. This design illustrates clearly the helplessness and interdependence of both the consumer and the supplier. It also makes clear the futility and danger of repairwork to such systems.

I would like to ask Father Marc Barrier to describe the model to you, and then present some current programs that are attempting to intervene in similar kinds of cycles.

Father Marc Barrier: What we would like to describe first of all is sort of a general diagram concerning the urban centre. This diagram might be very objective, but as a matter of fact it is very subjective of certain kinds of people. I have the feeling especially with transient men who are in the City of Edmonton.

The Edmonton urban centre shows a geographic area which is described in the form of a square. It results in a social system catering especially for certain people holding on to certain values which are described in the centre of the diagram. Those social values are permeating geographic areas but not completely. There is always in the urban centre what we might call the white light zone.

Coming into the centre, we have the phenomena of urbanism right now. People coming into the city who do not hold this idea and values, the majority of ideas and values of urban centres. We have various groups, and one of the groups I would like to describe are transient men here in the City of Edmonton.

These men seem to be quite interesting and because they are perhaps the furthest away and less concern us, just to the values of majority in urban centres, they are most estranged from established values.

These men come to the city from various backgrounds. We have transient men, young and skilled men seeking employment. We have transient men, war veterans, pensioners, non-pensionable men who have been replaced by younger men and machines, men out of institutions such as jail, mental hospital and so forth coming into the city, and they are being controlled up to a point because they have to come to a central place which is called a hostel, the provincial hospital.

From the provincial hospital they receive shelter and food, provided they meet certain conditions. Shelter is provided when the man is not intoxicated; food under certain conditions, which is only breakfast and supper, and there is no lunch offered to them.

The hospital is sort of helped by some other agencies, like the Salvation Army, privately owned rooming houses, and from these few places the men may eventually purchase services that these places are offering. If the man does not conform to the conditions, if he comes to the hospital intoxicated, he has to be punished. He goes to the overnight shelter which is not the best place to be in.

Then in this system the men do not receive all the attention they need, and there are benevolent agencies who have moved in like the Marion Centre and like the Edmonton Day Centre, the missions Bethel and Hope who are trying to provide the sort of addition to their food diet; the Marion centre is providing food and lunches and other places also provide some service provided the men attend some of their religious services.

Now, if he wants to break away from this system, he has to seek employment if he is able to, but what is happening in this case, he is going to the Chamber of Mines and he is most of the time directed to northern work camps, or is going to Canada Manpower and he goes to bush, or he goes to private sub-contractors here in the city, and he gets back almost immediately into the closed system.

Another way of breaking away from the system is the help service. I should also point out that this Northern Works are feeding the men back into the system because there is nowhere else for them to go once they've done their time up north.

There is another way of breaking away: if the man is sick he goes to certain agencies for services that are provided, but finally because he is a chronic alcoholic or he has some other disease that cannot be dealt with by a clinic or some other hospital, such as a man with perhaps psychological problems, he is directed to Oliver which is more or less an infirmary in our system, but from Oliver he has no place to go back except back to the system again.

There is another way of breaking away: going to jail which most of them do enjoy during the wintertime, and especially because it is very cold here in Edmonton, and they prefer to be picked up and go to jail.

Finally there is one more perhaps positive way of breaking away from this system: through certain services that have been provided, recreations, which account for some films, and some educational process in which the men may enter.

Finally, most of the recreation and Oliver that are provided for men are merely ways of killing time and that feeds the men right back into the system again.

The only way of staying away from this closed system is by staying on the river bank, and the men will spend their time, eventually getting so sick they would have to seek another type of accommodation like overnight shelter and they will start over and over again. So this is the system that we have found that we have here in Edmonton with regard to transient men.

We feel these men are very, very much controlled by the established values. These men cannot really get back into society as such.

Mr. Donahue: Terry, would you like to say a few words about your society or group?

Mr. Terry Hansen: I am Terry Hansen of the Futures Society. My main concern is that of the ex-con, and I think the best way I can describe the problems that he has is to take an example. Take a man who has been in jail. In jail he is told what to do, and when to bathe, when to eat, when to change clothes, how much his hair has to be cut, and hence his life is controlled by a mechanical brain. If he tries to use his own and fight this off, in jail he will lose.

The man is released, and on being released has been reduced to nothing. He has been controlled for the last year or two—it could be five years to twelve years. Now he is out with approximately ten dollars in his pocket. He is searching for help. Having been told what to do for so long, he goes out searching for people to tell him what to do, and this he finds. He is told where to live, where to stay, what to eat, where to sleep and this is all found because he is a poor man, in this particular system here. I call this a prison with invisible bars, invisible to John Doe Public, but very real to the ex-con.

The Futures Society—and one of my concerns is being one of these ex-cons, and having made it through this maze. It took two or three years before I finally made it to the other side.

My concern is to stay behind and help those coming out of jail make it through, possibly with our help just make it a little faster and a little sooner. Some guys don't make it and end up going through a concentration camp. They die away. And this is where my concern is.

Mrs. Gloria Stacey: I am Gloria Stacey, the mother of four children, and I am upgrading on a project with the provincial government. This is fun, but some of the pressures we have to undergo on behalf of trying to get educated and getting out of this rut that we have been in, being on welfare is fantastic.

The education does not give any means to us at all for problems with our children. We have to work darn hard to get our education, plus there is financial needs that our children have to have, as my children are all in school, for clothing. The allowance we are allowed is impossible to live on.

These pressures I have too, and other students have to live with in order to get educated. We have to fight with the system of education to get us educated. We have to fight a public to be accepted as a person. We also have to fight to dress and clothe and feed our children and to get to the heads of our government to try and get extra help is impossible. I spend all one day and end right back up at my social worker. Just to get hold of one person it is impossible to reach anyone to get help if you need anything extra at all.

The babysitting service is another thing. It will be available providing you can find it, and not very many mothers want to leave their children with just anyone. We have certain areas to leave our children.

The Chairman: Do the day care centres have paid personnel?

Mrs. Stacey: They have, but most of these day care centres are in the central part of Edmonton. Myself, I live out in the north-west part of Edmonton and transportation from my part at home to the day care and back to school, and back home again. I'm spending most of my allowance on transportation.

The Chairman: That we understand, of course. There is nothing in your area.

Mrs. Stacey: There is nothing, and I am more fortunate. All my children are in school, but I have one in Grade One who is home half an hour before my other children, and as a result he has a baby sitter himself for half an hour, so I can attend school and get educated and get off the system of welfare and provide for my family.

The Chairman: It is surprising how quickly the children grow up. It is a tribute to you that you can do it.

Miss Denise Williams: My name is Denise Williams, and I am going to present a brief on Growing Up Together, and that is a program for small children. I have two children going to preschool that are my concern.

The program began in the fall with a group who came together and we thought it was a good idea to start a programme for children of parents who could not afford other facilities for their children. The group decided that the mothers in the group should have the control of the program, and would also be able to work in the school on a voluntary basis.

The mothers group also wanted to set up a programme for themselves which could take place at the same time as the children's programme. Sacred Heart Parish Hall was secured for the program. It took about six months for a number of groups who were boycotting the program. The program for children began shortly before Christmas. The group however had received no funds when it started the program.

The program: 2 hours from 1:30-3:30 daily. The children were picked up at their homes by volunteer drivers. Once in the play-school the children had various activities, free play time, experience with art materials, music, toys and other equipment such as films and tape recorders. The children also went on field trips to places such as library, museum, university farm, the children's zoo. There were two resource people who were in attendance daily, along with the mothers who came in to the school. The total staff situation was volunteer. And it ran until the middle of last month, and the only financing received at that time was $50.00.

We approached two school boards, separate and public, for funds and the school board was not interested, but felt we were spending public monies and therefore must be responsible for how these monies were used. No money without control.

The Parks and Recreation Department refused funds to the group because they had their own program and could not see the point of giving a grant to a community group to run its own program. The mothers group did not want a park and recreation for their children—there has been a history of conflict between the mothers in the area and the Department.

In June the mothers decided that they would organize the program in a better fashion and become incorporated as a society. New more permanent facilities were required and more people who could be in the school on a full time basis and could devote their full time to the children's program. The mothers would take part in working in the school as well as having their own program. Each mother was to work in the school for two months on a paid basis. The mothers also said that there was a definite need for them to have their own bus for transportation.

At about this time the province put out a Request for Proposal for someone to run a pre-school program in the area in which the group was running its program. The group decided to put in a proposal to the government. This proposal emphasized the fact that a pre-school program was much too limiting and went on to explain what type of a program would be desirable. Once again the proposal was rejected—it is interesting to note the money was given to the schools. At present the school is not operating, and the group is planning to reopen in the fall—hopefully by then they will have received some financial assistance, so that the program can have some stability.

The whole idea of the project was set up to provide educational opportunities for both the parents and the children. This is certainly not done in the school system and is one of the reasons that the school has had a hard time getting financing. Another reason is the fact that the mothers want to have the major say in the control and development of the program for their children and themselves. The program will no longer be unique if it allows itself to be sucked up into the school system.

Mr. Denis Bartell: Denis Bartell, Sturgeon Valley Housing Co-operative. As you probably know, a housing co-operative consists of a group of people who make a down payment on houses, and then own the housing development co-operatively. There is no individual ownership. You might wonder how the concept of a housing co-operative might be related to the problem of poverty.

I think it is related in several ways. For one thing, our co-operative which was just recently formed, with the aid of the Social Planning Council intends to have a mixed community. That means people from all income levels and all walks of life, all ethnic groups and what-have-you.

For example, several church groups have volunteered to buy shares for welfare people. They would be in there with working people, the sort of people who have steady jobs, but who oftentimes cannot qualify for CMHC mortgages. The two groups, when they are in there, might learn a little bit about each other.

Working people are often upset with welfare people because they think they have no initiative, but as we know, oftentimes working mothers, fathers, or ones who are not working, cannot because either they make more money on welfare than they would working, and because of the cost of day care and what-have-you, and this is the sort of problem we have to iron out.

From the outset, we intend to build day care centres in our co-operative. We know it is possible because it is being done in other places. A housing co-operative is a place where the people should live in co-operative control. Actually they control all the entire development in terms of placing of units, type of units and what-have-you.

Now housing co-operatives cannot solve all of the social problems that we encounter but they can make a start, and I have tried to give you an idea of one of the ways that they can come to grips with some of these problems, and what is perhaps most important is that the concept of co-operative housing is not a pie in the sky idea. It is not a Utopian dream. It works down East; it works in Western Canada here. In Winnipeg, they have opened a four hundred-unit one in Calgary.

By stressing the concept of a mixed community from the beginning we think we can, in a sense, break into the cycle that Terry and others who are here have been describing and come out with the sort of community that... where all sorts of people can be represented and where all sorts of people can have opportunities to change their lives and become the sort of people they want to be.

The Chairman: Are these recommendations on the back page here?

Mr. Bartell: No, these are not mine.

The Chairman: Would you like to defend them?

Mr. Donahue: I had better defend them. Denis will back me up.

The Chairman: Well not defend them, but explain them.

Senator Pearson: Can you give us a run down on how you organized this co-co-operative, to build these houses? What sort of people do you get hold of first and how do you get it started?

Mr. Bartell: That is a good question. We had the help of the Social Planning Council from the outset, and we also had some lists of people from the city who applied for public housing. We advertised in the paper for people who were interested in having a place and designing their community, and we got marvellous response from all economic people. We got welfare people; we got professional people, professors, working people, and we got them together and we had a series of nine consecutive evening meetings, and that is a lot of time for people to give up.

Senator Pearson: Are these people with homes of their own?

Mr. Bartell: Some of them have homes of their own at the present time. Anyway, the first thing we did was put down their dreams on paper about what they would like to see in a home and in a community and we had students there who could draw, when they heard these things, could draw what they thought they would look like.

Then we had people from various successful co-operatives, especially one in Winnipeg, and one starting in Calgary, come to talk to us and tell us how we can realize these dreams for the co-operative concept. Then we formed our own co-operative, and at present we are having problems for development because we have an option on a piece of land that we would like to work on. Interim financing—we hope the money can come through credit unions and co-operatives and labour unions.

Senator Carter: How many members do you have?

Mr. Bartell: At present?

Senator Carter: Yes.

Mr. Bartell: We are just starting selling shares. We have sold at least thirty or forty shares, but that is only a dollar apiece. Our mailing list is much longer. That is because we haven't really got the material out to them yet.

Senator Carter: How many do you aim at? How many members do you figure you can get?

Mr. Bartell: We hope to develop 400 units, we hope to put in there, and that will be a lot of members, but at least four hundred members.

Right now we need people to help out developing. They are the people who are interested in concepts. They don't want to live there.

Senator Pearson: What about your land that you are getting? Is this within the city boundaries, or is it outside in a new area altogether?

Mr. Bartell: It is outside. It is ten miles.

Senator Pearson: Not serviced at all?

Mr. Donahue: St. Albert is about ten miles north.

Senator Pearson: Has that got sewer and water?

Mr. Bartell: Yes, but this particular site has to be serviced but it is within the town limit of St. Albert.

Senator Pearson: But you would have to work with St. Albert?

Mr. Bartell: Yes. We have been in contact with the town councillors there.

Senator Pearson: How much do you consider this would cost? Have you got any figures at all?

Mr. Bartell: Yes, we have some idea from the costs that are projected by the Calgary group.

Senator Pearson: How far out are they?

Mr. Bartell: I don't know. The Calgary people have 400 units. They have their land, a large down payment on it and they have the design of their units, and they are talking about $800 to $900 down payment. This is whether it is a three-bedroom or four, and the monthly payment including everything except telephone would be about $160. I think they are talking about units being built around $15,000.

We got a grant to run these meetings from Robert Andres of Central Mortgage and Housing.

Senator Pearson: To open your land, are you making arrangements for parks and playgrounds?

Mr. Bartell: From the outset, this is going to be one of our most important selling points.

I don't really think we can sell shares in this co-operative unless we design, you know, extremely good—that is the wrong word—but community facilities.

In Calgary, they are putting in three day care centres. They are going to be a community from the outset. They are going to run their own affairs.

How many neighbourhoods in this city or any city for that matter can do that? Very few. And that is why we think, and I'm certain the experience in Calgary shows this, with the sales pull they have had, that this concept is going to work. It will be a success. Then there will be people moving out, I predict, moving out of their homes in order to live, especially with growing families. You won't be able to get the facilities of that quality elsewhere, and what is more, you will have a voice in the way they are run.

As I said, we want welfare people in there. We want one-third of the people on fixed incomes. That means pensioners and welfare people. There are church groups who are willing to buy shares for these people.

The Chairman: The Senator is an architect. He is very knowledgeable about these things. Would you like to talk to Mr. Donahue for a minute?

Senator Pearson: Are your units all separate or in block?

Mr. Donahue: This is something that came out of... from it, that there would be a variety of designs for that number of units, and this has been experienced in Winnipeg.

There has been movement within the development that people who have come from a two-bedroom house to a four-bedroom unit, and the reverse of that, so the kind of units, we have not sort of fixed that onto a plan as yet, but from this program that Denis is talking about, you could see many different sorts of design. Some of them could be cluster housing or row housing or terrace housing.

A lot of this, of course, is controlled by the by-laws of the town of St. Albert, although I think the most discouraging one out there in St. Albert is that they are not too interested in this kind of low income housing. This is the way they look at it.

Senator Pearson: They would have to abide by the by-laws of St. Albert. What about your taxation?

Mr. Donahue: That is a problem in St. Albert that to every unit they attach a $5,500 assessment.

Senator Pearson: Joined units would be cheaper than individual units?

Mr. Donahue: No. $5,500 was individual units. The terrace unit was a slightly higher assessment.

Senator Pearson: Per unit in the...

Mr. Donahue: Yes, and this is because of their limited tax base which is strictly residential. For their schools and hospitals that is their only source of income, and they have done this.

I think today they have become quite satisfied that it has given them a very nice middle class residential community. And although I feel it was devised in the first place to solve a real sort of tax problem, today it becomes a little bit of discrimination—if discrimination comes into it in that it keeps them all very interested, and although we were given a welcome to the town when we started our Sharette, I think possibly that the design could be built into the place and the idea of a community, no one would be able to say who was who in it.

Senator Pearson: Single storey or two storey?

Mr. Donahue: Some of each.

Senator Pearson: A full basement?

Mr. Donahue: Yes. This is what they do out here.

The Chairman: What did you say the cost would be?

Mr. Donahue: Well, because it is a continuing co-op, it is an owner-rental type of arrangement, and you make an initial down payment of $800, which is your equity in the thing and then you pay a monthly charge of $160,000 which includes all your utilities, except telephone and this is what you are paying.

The Chairman: Then it is on a rental basis?

Mr. Donahue: It is ownership basis in that you have control of that building and you have your share in the co-op.

The Chairman: Supposing I die and my wife wants to leave?

Mr. Donahue: This is a question that came up many, many times. This is a question, I think, that most people who came to Sharette, one of the first things "what do I get out of this? Who gets the profit?"

First of all, you are on a management committee. You are represented on that because you are a shareholder. You decide whether your equity will be increased, or whether you want to put it in homes for the old aged, pensioners or a day care centre. In other words, whether you get back the first $800.00 that you put into it, or whether there are other benefits, you are the one that is deciding it. No one outside of the development is deciding that for you because you are a controlling member.

The Chairman: You mean I can always get back the $800.00 and perhaps something else?

Mr. Donahue: Yes, and you would decide that for yourself.

The Chairman: But my original principal?

Mr. Donahue: Yes.

The Chairman: The other is rental?

Mr. Donahue: Yes.

The Chairman: No one loses out.

Senator Pearson: In these units what fixtures do you put in?

Mr. Donahue: Because of the advantages of mass buying, you would have also your laundry facilities.

Senator Pearson: Something like an apartment? You would have the services you needed?

Mr. Donahue: The people in Calgary have been able to buy bulk purchasing for their gas and they are having a problem with Calgary Power to get their electricity, but it goes through a bulk meter.

The Chairman: Where is the first mortgage coming from, Central Mortgage?

Mr. Donahue: This is where the Calgary people have been promised the first mortgage, from Central Housing. Interim financing was the Prairie Co-operative Union.

The Chairman: Yes, you have been in touch with Central Mortgage?

Mr. Donahue: Yes.

The Chairman: They are interested and they have some experience. If they give them a loan in Calgary, they will have had some experience on this.

Mr. Bartell: We got the money directly from Mr. Andress. I think the local co-operative doesn't have too much experience with the co-operative concept.

The Chairman: Central Mortgage will have had the experience with Calgary by the time you make application.

Mr. Bartell: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you know whether they will or not?

Mr. Donahue: This we don't know. As yet we have not had any firm promise from Central Mortgage and Housing.

The Chairman: Has the Calgary group had a firm commitment?

Mr. Donahue: Yes.

The Chairman: You know that will be done. What I am saying is that they will have some precedent.

Mr. Donahue: Oh yes.

The Chairman: Precedent is a very useful thing.

Senator Carter: Before you leave that, where do the welfare people set up into the scheme? How does the person on welfare get into this housing development?

The Chairman: $800.00.

Senator Carter: Does he get it into the rental unit or home-owner unit or how?

Mr. Donahue: Say a church group would buy a single parent family a share.

Senator Carter: For one dollar?

The Chairman: Eight hundred dollars.

Senator Carter: You said one share. Are you talking about one one-dollar share?

Mr. Bartell: Say an eight hundred or nine hundred dollar share. This is the kind that would get you a unit. Now welfare is already paying their rent.

Senator Carter: Yes.

Mr. Bartell: All welfare would have to do would be to take over the rental payments to the co-op and usually this can save the city or the province or whatever money because you get more housing for less money generally in a co-op. At least in the experience that co-operatives have had so far. And it seems to me that a person living there has the advantage of community facilities, and also a voice in running the community.

Senator Carter: What I do not see is the economics of it, because while a government is paying rental, that is true, they are usually paying rental for sub-standard housing, and you are going to provide new housing. How are you going to compete in price?

Mr. Donahue: Experience in the city here, I think they could be paying $250 for a slum house.

Senator Carter: Here in Edmonton?

Mr. Donahue: Yes, for a large family, which is very difficult to find in Edmonton. Edmonton's stock of old houses is very limited because building is all pretty well post-war. You go back, say, in two building cycles in Edmonton which are in the twenties in a small amount in the thirties, and then of course the great boom came with the oil industry. It is not like other cities where you do have a backlog of old houses. So housing can be pretty desperate and it can be a pretty high price. Here is a unit of, say, $900 down payment somewhere around $160 a month for the payments for three or four bedroom house.

Senator Carter: This down payment would be a donation from somebody?

Mr. Donahue: Yes.

Senator Carter: From some philanthropic person?

The Chairman: Well, church groups.

Mr. Bartell: They have already volunteered.

The Chairman: I am a little puzzled by the problem, which Senator Carter just raised. When you talk about the three and four bedroom houses, you are talking of pretty large housing. They are not going to run that size? A very small portion would run to four bedrooms?

Mr. Donahue: Three is average, and two for a new family. I am doing public housing in the city and they have five bedrooms.

The Chairman: $160.00?

Mr. Bartell: It is pretty low.

Mr. Donahue: I think you could ask some of the people here that have the experience. I have someone here that pays $300 a month for a house. It is the kind we remember down East. It was a two storey with an attic.

The Chairman: How many families live in it?

Mr. Donahue: Today you might find two families living in it.

The Chairman: But you see housing allowances generally across the country are nothing like that. You should check them here, and you say this is possible?

Mr. Donahue: To pay that much? $160?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Donahue: I think you are going to have to pay that.

Senator Carter: I have some other questions of Father Barrier. I don't quite see how your fellow escapes. How you get him out.

Father Barrier: I think we have not devised a way to get him out of the system. It doesn't seem anybody can get him out of the system. It is not some superior force that will get him out. The only thing that we have to recognize is a certain culture that may be coming in conflict actually with the majority of culture.

The transient member is possibly the bottom of the heap, but we have also the sub-culture youth people and maybe the people on welfare compared with the rest of society.

Native people when they come to urban centres are bringing with them a sub-culture. This conflict, this fight with the urban centre; actually the men on Skid Row or the transient men here in the city of Edmonton seems to be provided for, but as a matter of fact we keep them in this type of situation because we don't really consider their values as being worth considering.

We believe that these men to be able to make it in our society will have to convert in some way or another.

Senator Carter: Society has got to be governed by some values and your problem was that the system they have got into is governed by traditional values.

Father Barrier: Yes.

Senator Carter: And now they bring in different values and you have these conflicts. I don't see yet how these conflicts are resolved. Are you advocating changing the traditional values? What is the solution to this?

Father Barrier: Our solution is maybe reconsidering our traditional values. Are they really values that help growth of every human being? Or are they choking some individuals?

We have a conflict right now in our urban centres and especially where some values are choking some individuals that prevent them really from growing because we consider the person has no value of his own; he is unfit to live within a very good and affluent society. He is not a consuming power but a very well established person is, and yet he is still a human being.

Senator Carter: Well, I can see that, but the values you listed here are not too bad: comparative winner, personal skill, competency, education, financially secure, ideologically sound, and so forth, and they consume; that is credit rating and that sort of thing. The other fellow has got different values. They don't own anything. They don't compete. No basic income. Practically the opposite.

It is not a case of where you can find a middle way between these two opposite sets of values. You have either got to reject them or accept them. You have to accept one or reject one.

Father Barrier: We have to devise a solution, of course, we say that actually we have devised alternatives. We have not devised a solution because we don't think we can. We have possible solutions. We feel that the men, these men, transient men, with different values from the established people in an urban centre, would have to, first of all, be given a chance to be themselves.

I feel that instead of being sort of herded into a centre like a hospital, they should be able to have an open centre where they could go in and where they could eventually be given a chance to express their own personal values, because I personally have been in contact with these people for about three years now, and I think even if they have no ownership they have other human values that are perhaps good and quite profitable perhaps for everybody.

I believe every culture has its own qualities and its own defects and this is the same with transient men. It has qualities, but it has defects also. We reject the whole man because we see only the defects. If he should have some insight into his own qualities, and into his own culture.

Senator Carter: Where would you put him when he first comes in? If you don't send him to the hospital or Salvation Army—or if you don't send him down to the overnight shelter, where he sort of does penance until he sobers up, where would you put him? What kind of a place are you going to put him in?

Father Barrier: I think there must be places that provide for him, that is not merely staffed by people from outside, from the established society, but he has a say where he can devise his own set up, his own policy and so forth, and I believe in this centre he should be able to express himself, to express his own values, which would develop even his own values.

The Chairman: I have values too. Tell me, when you talk of the culture of the groups, of these men, what do you mean by that culture?

Father Barrier: Sub-culture. The positive values. The positive values of each man are human values. They relate to each other. They seem to have a companionship. They have certain rules, by which man does not feed upon his fellow man. He will get in trouble for his fellow man. He has nothing perhaps to lose because he has absolutely no material goods, but he will support his fellow man.

Eventually if he wants to get out, he might get out with another group or other men. If he is caught in trouble, he will never be caught out alone. He will always be caught with others.

Their values are perhaps what we consider gregarious values. As a matter of fact, they are, rather, companionship, mutual understanding and support. They consider each other as neighbours, really.

Senator Carter: They accept each other as human beings.

Father Barrier: That is right.

Senator Carter: And the other people, with all their superior values, they are not prepared to accept them as human beings, as having individual worth. That is the main difference, isn't it?

Father Barrier: Yes, it is.

Senator Carter: So that is what you want. What you want you have got to change the philosophy and not the values.

Mr. Donahue: One of the first things, I think, is toleration. If we could at least tolerate these people.

Senator Carter: Yes.

Mr. Donahue: I find from what little sort of contact I have had, we don't leave them down there, but I think we destroy them at the same time, and you can see this happening. People say that they won't work, but that is not the situation as you are well aware. They are not educated and they are not physically sort of capable.

An example I think of is the cowboy who comes here. He was out on the range, a real adventure chap, that was always admired, and he is going to the city because of health, but he is not allowed to live in the city and you can see the man being destroyed.

Senator Carter: But that is only the same thing that we were told this morning, that the single heads of families are not accepted as human beings. They are rejected by society; their children are rejected. Isn't this the same thing?

Mr. Donahue: I think so.

Senator Carter: The only difference is it's a different group of people.

Father Barrier: I think we should have an examination of conscience and see if the values by which we live are human values, and I think perhaps these people have something to teach us.

Senator McGrand: You asked what were his values, whether he has the same instincts as what we find in the so-called accepted people. Now, it is not inferior but different, and perhaps the weakness (we had this morning and we have talked about other people being unaccepted and snubbed), perhaps the weakness is not with those groups, but with these so-called acceptable society.

Father Barrier: Yes.

Senator McGrand: That is where the weakness is.

Senator Carter: That is where the problem is.

Senator McGrand: Now the problem with those people, they are only caught up in the circumstances. The problem is with the so-called good people.

Father Barrier: It might be. I'm not going to judge myself one or the other. Personally I accept everybody as human beings, and one of the things that I have to consider, however, that a lot of people do not make it in our society, some of them it's because they are incapable of making it because of some circumstances.

Some of us, because of having voluntarily dropped out of society, because they cannot accept our values, and most of the people I met on Skid Row are suffering from one ailment or the other, and I believe that better treatment would help these men, these men which have values, and I am sure they would like to be competitive, especially the men that have been war veterans.

They are men who have spent their life for their country. They put their lives at stake for us, and I feel that these men are still wanting to be recognized as human beings, and that they would like to be competitive.

Senator McGrand: And they have done menial work too.

Father Barrier: Yes.

Senator McGrand: On page one, I think it is, you give a definition of poverty that is a bit unusual to come before our group. You say:

Poverty is a psychological process depriving individuals and families of material comforts, human dignity and fulfilment.

Now, this is a rather unusual definition for this group to get, and I like it because it is different. What I like about it is that it opens up a new approach, what will continue to be a national problem from now on.

Do you see the possibility of poverty in all its aspects, volunteer groups, civic and provincial governments with federal participation, operating under one umbrella, so to speak, to control property in contrast to the piecemeal approach that has existed up to the present time, because poverty is going to be with us? It is not just pockets. It is something that is a national thing.

Do you see the possibility of it being approached and controlled sort of under one umbrella? Now maybe I have not expressed this myself.

Father Barrier: I know what you mean, although I do not think that it would be the solution. I don't think it could be controlled by government, by laws. I think that all of us people must recognize what is happening to all of us.

Senator McGrand: I include the volunteer groups.

The Chairman: He is thinking of something beyond that.

Senator McGrand: We are looking at two different things.

The Chairman: He is a little out of this world. Go ahead, Father.

Father Barrier: I feel the only way of controlling poverty—this is my own personal belief—is by recognizing my fellow man as my neighbour. I have no right to step on toes. I do feel that if the government is making just laws, it will be a step forward. I cannot despise anybody, and if everybody gets into the picture and accepts, he has the responsibility for his fellow man—"am I my brother's keeper?"—and I believe I am, and unless we do that, I do not give a chance to our society as it is now.

Senator McGrand: You don't give a chance to society to survive?

Father Barrier: Yes.

Senator McGrand: I agree with you.

The Chairman: Do you mind, both of you, telling me when it is going to stop surviving?

Senator Carter: I just want to follow up this definition. I am not so sure that I agree with your definition altogether. I agree with part of it. You say that poverty is a psychological process. I agree with that. Depriving individuals and families of material comforts; I agree with that, and of fulfilment, I agree with that. But I'm not sure I agree that poverty deprives an individual of human dignity.

Father Barrier: It does.

Senator Carter: No, I think he has some human dignity. He has some human worth as an individual, no matter. It is our assessment that is wrong. You don't blame that on poverty, though. That is us.

Senator Quart: But is he accepted?

Senator McGrand: That is the same question I raised a while ago.

The Chairman: It is not the man. It is you and I who assess that. That is the difference.

Senator McGrand: It is the so-called affluent society that rejects them.

The Chairman: Let us get back to this. Recommendation Number Two: Tell us what you understand by the guaranteed income concept. That is the question I asked you. Both of you are professors, you and Mr. Bartell.

Mr. Donahue: I heard yesterday a radio programme on the CBC discussing what was guaranteed annual income and there were different people, I take it, who had phoned in and who had given their opinion. One man said he thought that guaranteed annual income was a good idea provided you could screen out those people who didn't deserve it.

So once you put that factor in it, this is back to the same old question.

The Chairman: You tell me what your idea was before you heard that.

Mr. Donahue: I think that today our society is wrapped up enough in material goods, and technology that somehow or other we have to make an equal opportunity for everyone, and we put in our second conclusion here, "a reasonable degree of satisfaction of life for everybody," and we say that in sort of contradiction with the idea of the greatest happiness for the greatest number and we think everybody should have something. Greatest happiness for the greatest number is something that we have read and were taught in school, but is something that still left somebody out of something, and I think this is what the guaranteed annual income is: is to prove to ourselves what is really a fact that there is enough goods in this world for everyone that in some fashion can be shared. Do you mean figures?

The Chairman: Do not give us figures. We can get that ourselves.

Mr. Donahue: Well, the quote I made of Henry Ford which I guess was in this week's Time magazine was something that was stated by him, the President of Xerox and people like that: they see that there is this wealth, and I think they are talking about annual income and I think it is a question of survival as well. Somebody says you begin to worry about your factories in Detroit if there is another riot.

Senator Carter: That is what he is getting at. You can't have social revolution and preserve the basic ideas on which we are operating at the moment.

Mr. Donahue: We were not thinking of guaranteed annual income as being another exchange of welfare.

Senator Carter: Just another change in the system would not be any good. You have to change the whole philosophy; the whole approach.

The Chairman: We will go along with Senator Carter and go along with you; and a change in philosophy, the concept runs something like this: a minimum allowance income, work or no work, worthy or unworthy.

Mr. Donahue: I'm not too sure about the minimum sort of thing. I think it should be reasonable.

The Chairman: We speak of it as a minimum allowance. It is an allowance. Basic income—is that better?

Mr. Donahue: Yes. All right.

The Chairman: Work or no work? Worthy or unworthy? Would that be the concept?

Mr. Donahue: This would be the concept I would say.

Senator Pearson: Would you consider carrying on with all our other welfare programs, plus you guaranteed income?

Mr. Donahue: I am not on one of the agencies, but I suppose this is a question that would bring on a revolution quicker if you cut out all the welfare payments.

The Chairman: I have never known a Donahue who was not for revolution. I am satisfied. Mr. Bartell, have you anything to add?

Senator Carter: I want to speak to this lady, to Mrs. Stacey. You are on welfare you said?

Mrs. Stacey: Yes.

Senator Carter: And you have how many children?

Mrs. Stacey: Four.

Senator Carter: You said something about having to fight education to get an education. What did you mean by that?

Mrs. Stacey: I need an education in order to support my family, the size that they are, and being that requires and will require further education myself as a parent it is my responsibility to see they have financial backing to give them this education.

I am more fortunate because I am quite outgoing. I was able to get into the education by just going and making myself heard and asking, but there are many who are not able to do this.

Senator Carter: Are you studying yourself?

Mrs. Stacey: Yes, I am.

Senator Carter: At night?

Mrs. Stacey: I am taking a night school and waiting to enroll in school the 1st of September.

Senator Carter: How are you going to manage that?

Mrs. Stacey: Welfare is helping me. It is a pilot project in Alberta.

The Chairman: Where did you ever get the idea that education would help you?

Mrs. Stacey: Well, I have worked as a cashier. I am a qualified cashier, and I have found after coming home and having to look after three little babies, four little children, working eight hours a day being on my feet, it was impossible to be a mother, father and help-mate to these children that is necessary for parents nowadays. I was absolutely completely exhausted.

I realized that unless I am in a position where the work was enjoyable where I could mentally be exhausted—at least physically—I was not on my feet eight hours a day or if I was I would not have to strain myself, and the only way a woman can do this is through education, so whether she is a counsellor, a teacher or a nurse, if this is her way of working it is something she has got to do because she wants to do it, not because she has to do it to feed three or four children.

You can do all sorts of things if you are doing this, and if you have an education open to you and you are getting a position at the pay rate. Financially I am much better off having a university education than we are being a waitress in a cafe or being a cashier.

The Chairman: Could you have an education before you were married?

Mrs. Stacey: Quite possibly I could have, yes. I found, as many of our dropouts do, that life was much more interesting outside than it was inside the school.

Senator Carter: You have learned a lot since then?

Mrs. Stacey: Very much.

The Chairman: I think the key answer you gave was that she was not only building up for herself but for her children. That is the crux of her answer.

Mrs. Stacey: Our facilities here in Alberta are very good as far as offering us education, but we don't have enough of it for the amount of men and women who would like to be re-educated to get out of this system. Unless you have certain standards you can't get out of it. I had to take an I.Q. test to see whether or not I was eligible.

Senator Carter: The Manpower Training Program was no use to you?

Mrs. Stacey: Well, to a degree. Well, if I had been looking for a job for three years, fine, I was eligible, or if I had just got fired or something of this nature. If I was disabled. But I wasn't. I am a healthy Canadian girl and I hadn't been working because I had been looking after my children. So it was through my welfare officer. They got me into this.

The Chairman: It is this crazy rule of six months not working. She could not qualify but she could have come under the Canada Assistance Act where they have a program.

Senator Carter: That is right.

The Chairman: And that is what she is under. Alberta is the only province in Canada that has taken advantage of it. The alternative to the Canada Manpower Act.

There is provision in the Canada Assistance Act, and we discussed this, where if they fail to qualify on an educational basis the province can set up standards of their own and the government has to pay. Alberta is the only province that is doing it, and that is exactly what she is doing in her case. She is doing well; she is using it well.

Senator Carter: It is a good case history example.

The Chairman: It is right on the nose,

Mrs. Stacey: Some of the pressures mentioned before. We have to fight this plus raising a family. The financial needs we have.

The Chairman: You could be fighting it as much as you like in other provinces; you couldn't win.

Senator Carter: Mrs. Williams, you started out a little project of playgrounds and so forth, and then the educational people wouldn't have anything to do with you at the beginning and then it turned out you had better ideas and wouldn't have anything to do with them. That is how it worked out, isn't it?

Mrs. Williams: Yes.

Senator Carter: Now what I would like to know is where your ideas were superior that you didn't want to get mixed up and you end up by saying you don't want to get sucked into the educational system because we are interested in the deficiencies of educational systems that produce situations like you describe.

Mrs. Williams: The main reason would be in this program the mothers are included, and the mothers have a say in the program, whereas in the school system they don't have that; where the mother doesn't really have a say. The program is set up by the people, you know.

Senator Carter: How many did you have to start off in your program?

Mrs. Williams: How many children?

Senator Carter: How many mothers and how many children?

Mrs. Williams: There would be 30 children. About 15 mothers.

Senator Carter: What ages of children?

Mrs. Williams: The children were three to five.

Senator Carter: What did you want to accomplish that the regular system could not accomplish for them, or what did you see that you were doing that you could not get from the regular school system?

Mrs. Williams: The mothers, like I say, had a say.

Senator Carter: Yes. You had some control?

Mrs. Williams: And they were included in the program. They took part in the program. They went down to the school and volunteered where we have the school going, and also teaching on a voluntary basis.

The mothers picked the children up and they helped out at the play school. And the mothers were there and could see what was going on. In the new program that we thought of the mothers would be included in a different way where the ones that couldn't speak English—there are a couple of Italian families.

The Chairman: We have your point now. How old are the children?

Mrs. Williams: Three to five.

The Chairman: What you are saying in effect are that these children were learning faster than the mothers.

Mrs. Williams: Well, the mothers that couldn't speak English.

The Chairman: We have had that same thing. We are aware of that, and we have had that problem wherever we have touched immigrants. That problem exists for a little while and the children learn English. The fathers are out working and the mothers are at home. We are trying to put education into the house. That is what you are trying to do?

Mrs. Williams: Yes.

The Chairman: They stole your idea?

Senator Quari: May I ask—it took about six months for a number of groups who are boycotting the program to...

Mrs. Williams: Well, these were groups that didn't like the program that should be included—well, sort of gotten into the school system somehow because it was not part of the school system and they could not see that; but it is still along the same line as the other play schools but they want to sort of operate on their own.

Senator Quari: Were you one of the organizers of the group, of the initial group?

Mrs. Williams: No, I am not.

Senator Quari: Yet you are representing them today?

Mrs. Williams: Well, I have got two children going to that school. I am sort of taking part. Since I have got them into the program I liked it and my concern is that up to now we have not been able to get any funds, and I fall into the category that I can't afford attendance of my children.

Senator Quari: Are you optimistic that this program will be continued next year?

Mrs. Williams: Well, I believe we can get funds somewhere, somehow. The program itself I am optimistic about.

The Chairman: On behalf of the committee I want to thank Mr. Donahue and all the people he brought with him. You all made a contribution. This is very satisfying work. Mrs. Williams has just said something that is really worthwhile listening to: we will get funds somewhere, somehow.

Senator Quari: That is what I like about it.

The Chairman: That has a value all of its own. They are not beaten. They are not defeated. They are not shattered. They are in there putting up a good fight. It is for us to see if we can't possibly help a spirit of that nature.

On behalf of the committee, Mr. Donahue, and your people who performed a labour of love, thank you very much.

The Chairman: Our next presentation will be made by Unifarm, a farm organization in Alberta. Their brief has just been handed to us, so that we have not had any chance to read it. I will ask Mr. Paul Babey, who is the president of the organization, to read the summary and recommendations and this will put the picture before us.

Mr. Paul Babey, President, Unifarm, Alberta: Mr. Chairman, I am Paul Babey, President of Unifarm, which is a unique farm organization in Alberta. I am accompanied by Mr. Elmer Allen, our research economist.

Mr. Chairman, members of the Senate Committee on Poverty, I want to apologize for not being able to have the document ready, but at least you will have the most up-to-date copy that was possible because the ink is barely dry. We both have farms in Census Division 12, and this is where Alberta's poor reside.

Senator Pearson: Whereabouts is that?

Mr. Babey: Northeastern Alberta.

I am going to turn to the summary and you will find it at the back, following page 25.

There were over 29,000 farm families in Alberta who were living in poverty in 1968 on the basis of taxation statistics. The assumption is made that families are living in poverty if their total family income—excluding non-taxable transfer payments—is less than their total exemptions and deductions allowed for individual families under the Income Tax Act.

In spite of the fact that the total physical output of agricultural production and per capita production in farming reached an all time high in 1966, one half of the farmers in the Province were still non-taxable during the taxation year 1966, 1967 and 1968. Net farm income has been dropping since 1966.

If we ignore income in kind, net income per farm dropped over 43 per cent from 1966 over 1969. On the basis of 1969 farm income and outlook for 1970, one half the farmers will continue to remain non-taxable.

Considering the fact that the cost of living has been increasing rapidly and wages and salaries have been rising for many others to keep up with inflation, farmers are actually worse off now relative to the rest of society than they were a few years ago.

There were nearly 1,200 farm families who were receiving provincial and municipal assistance last year. In addition there were some 2,500 farm families who received special provincial government loans for living expenses because of the short-run agricultural crisis that has developed during the last two years.

Life on the farm has changed rapidly during the last two decades. Fewer farmers have excess of farm grown produce because they have specialized their production. This means that their off-farm needs for production inputs and family living have increased considerably. With the decrease in rural population, the cost of many goods and services have increased as farmers have to travel further to receive them.

There has been a significant increase in numbers of farmers reporting off-farm income to supplement their farm income. In spite of the fact that many farmers sell very little farm produce, their total income from all sources is higher, in many cases, than of those farmers reporting considerably more in farm sales. This suggests that many part-time farm operators, if moved out of agriculture would be made worse off considering the higher living expenses in urban areas.

Furthermore, many of the part-time operators have very limited agricultural resources that could be added to those remaining in agriculture for expansion purposes.

The number of young people entering agriculture has dropped significantly in recent years. Other young people who are farming would like to leave the industry for other jobs if they could. However, they have found many barriers to occupational mobility that need to be overcome. Many farmers like their occupation and are so satisfied with farming as a way of life that they are reluctant to move regardless of the economic benefits they would receive outside farming.

Many farmers are caught on the border line. When markets for their products are unfavourable, incomes drop and they fall in the poverty group. Attempts have been made by farm organizations and governments to stabilize and increase prices by various means. The obstacles in this direction have been exceptionally difficult to surmount. Farmers are optimistic—if they were not we would not have any farmers today—that things will improve next year. In the meantime many live under substandard conditions, hoping that somehow, somewhere, things will improve.

Now, if we could go back to page 21, we have a number of recommendations that I would like to touch on. One of the first recommendations that we suggest is Guaranteed Annual Income Plan for migrants.

Some form of income protection is required for those who want to leave farming. The greatest problem facing individuals seeking a new occupation is the uncertainty of security at their new job. If their income was guaranteed at a satisfactory level for a reasonable period of time, it should encourage more migration of young people. This would provide for more utilization of underemployed resources of human capital by creating more output in the economy, on the long run.

Encourage more on-the-job training by employers—employers perhaps have been reluctant to hire unskilled labour because the output of the employee does not warrant the minimum wage they must pay. However, if the recommendation above is adopted, and the government supplemented part of the wages paid while training on the job, more under-utilized human resources could be employed.

The trend towards hiring only those with higher education does not necessarily mean more productive output. Many rural people have hidden talent and ambition that could be developed on the job. Some form of government grant could be incorporated to provide some incentive to the employee to complete the training necessary to improve himself.

Potential viable farmers should receive management and financial assistance. Farmers who want to expand their farm into an economic unit should be given assistance. A program should be developed that would make available to the farmer agricultural extension specialists who would assist the farmer throughout the adjustment period. The Rural Development Credit Agency suggested by the Task Force would provide the necessary credit.

If the farmer upgraded himself and improved his income, he should be rewarded by the government writing off part of the loan. Incentives of this type tend to increase participation and the farmers' efforts to to reach a certain goal. We understand such a program is presently underway in England.

Subsidization of interest rates should be provided for non-economic farm units. Unless low-income farmers are given some concession, many will never be able to rise above the poverty level.

Low-income farmers are presently unable to set aside enough income to invest in their business because most of it is used for living expenses.

Agricultural subsidies should be directed towards the low-income sector of agriculture. Subsidies represent financial assistance contributed by governments toward current costs of production. The objective of most subsidy programs is to increase the earning power of a farmer so that he could expand his operation and thus have less need for the subsidy.

With present distribution methods most of the subsidies go to those farmers who now have less need of them. Unless additional subsidies and assistance are redirected to low-income farmers, the value of assistance programs to the poor is questionable.

A special program should be established to enable low-income farmers to acquire land. Many low-income farmers are unable to acquire land because other farm operators outbid them in the market place. A program should be directed toward farmers who have sufficient managerial ability but not adequate capital, to help them acquire more land. This can be achieved through more liberal loans for land, or by government purchase, and either reselling or leasing the land to a restricted group of small farm operators.

Redistribution of the tax burdens for low-income people would help reduce the number of people living in poverty. Farmers are more receptive to tax reductions than they are to transfer payments that provide the same end result.

Municipal, provincial and federal taxes combined tend to be regressive. That is, the low-income families' tax burden as a percentage of family income is greater than it is for higher-income families. And we go on to indicate an example of the kind of contribution that the lower-income families make. And on the top of page 23, to restate that position, the Carter report states that with exception of income taxes, taxes in general levied on individuals are not equitable.

The report states that property, social security, sales and excise taxes are regressive in most cases. We believe that each citizen should assume a personal financial responsibility for the cost of services commensurate with his ability to pay. The three levels of government should restructure their taxation system to remove the regressiveness with more consideration of the taxpayers ability to pay.

All individuals and families should receive some form of guaranteed annual income. The present social development program—previously Public Welfare—in Alberta does not serve the farm population adequately. Many farm families are living at bare subsistence levels and many do not have enough to cover all family needs.

In many cases children quit school to help provide family needs. This is unfortunate, as it tends to perpetuate poverty in certain rural communities.

A negative income tax plan would eliminate many welfare schemes and help those farm families who are unable to obtain welfare because they own farm assets.

And again we continue on to give you an example of that kind of situation.

Turning to page 24, and recommendation number nine. More industrial development should be encouraged in rural areas. Regional development incentive programs to promote economic expansion are desirable. We are somewhat concerned in Alberta that the Federal Government selected only one "special area," Lesser Slave Lake, and only the extreme southern part of the province was selected as a "designated region," under the Regional Development Incentives Act. We believe more provincial-federal government co-ordinated rural development programs should be developed to utilize the physical and human resource of other rural regions in the Province.

Farmers must have marketing legislation that would provide more stable realistic prices for farm products. On the domestic level with supply management and more bargaining power farmers could receive higher stable prices.

World prices of many agricultural products would rise if foreign governments did not subsidize production one way or another. Removal of international trade restrictions for agricultural products and more two-way trading with those countries who would purchase more agricultural products should be developed. Canadian farmers are very efficient and have done a good job in trying to survive on the basis of being competitive. However, as long as other industries do not have to play the game by the same rules there is no way farmers can compete.

We make the point that Census data on family income is essential. To date the only economic classification of farmers is "gross farm sales". Such data is completely inadequate as a yardstick in the determination of the economic status of farmers.

Total net farm family income should be reported. This would include net farm income, part-time incomes, transfer payments, plus all other off-farm income.

Cross-classification according to family size and age of the operator would be most useful in keeping track of the numbers of low-income farm families in the future. This should be incorporated immediately into the 1971 census of Agriculture.

Then in Recommendations 13 and 14 I think by and large we deal with recommendations made by the Agricultural Task Force as a part of Chapter 16 on the low-income sector, and I think by and large we agree with most of them.

That is our submission. I might add one final point, in talking about rural farm people, I think the effect of what is happening in agriculture is having its effect on the rural urban centre as well.

Senator Pearson: I was just going to ask do you not think that the problem of the farm, particularly in Western Canada, isn't largely of surplus, either a real surplus of products or a particular surplus? One way or another we have got too much and we are going into something else.

I understand now we have far too much hay in Saskatchewan and markets are being lost there. You know that hay from Manitoba is cutting down the high production—not the high production but the sale. Isn't it a question of surplus?

Mr. Babey: I think that surplus is certainly part of the problem, part of the current problem, particularly if you are talking about grain and mainly in wheat. But I also think that it is fair to point out that farmers have been encouraged to produce, and they have been encouraged and are told by production this would be their solution, and they responded in a very favourable way only to find out that we run into other difficulties.

Senator Pearson: They are also responding now in other products. That is, take rape and mustard seed and such like. Flax. They are going into that very heavily. This will cut the market price. We are getting into the same problem only in another line.

Mr. Babey: This is one of the dilemmas in the agriculture industry, and really I suppose it gives you an example of the ingenuity of farm people, of how quickly they can react.

And there have been encouragements price-wise in terms of other commodities such as rapeseed and the meat industry, and I think if we overdo it again we will have the same dilemma, and really the end result of this will be transferring the grain problem into other commodities.

Senator McGrand: What is the answer?

Mr. Babey: I think the answer to part of the problem, No. 1, is that in the past historically we have been a production-oriented group, and when I speak about "group" I am speaking of all the extension agencies, our quest of learning, and the farm people themselves.

We haven't really looked at the market aspects. As a matter of fact most of our export people come to buy; we don't sell them. This has been one of the problems, and I think we have to shift the orientation from the production side to the marketing.

But I think also it is fair to point out that in the domestic situation one of the problems we have had within the farm community is that it is accepted we have certain rules in our nation, but agriculture for some reason cannot play under the same kind of rules as do other industries, and I am thinking of the types of protection that we are extending to some of our industries which in fact interfere with the kind of trade and export position that we could be in.

Senator McGrand: Name them.

Mr. Babey: I will give you an example. Textiles Industry and our trade with Japan.

I think a year ago we had examples but because of our attitude towards synthetic fibre coming in from that country, the Japanese decided they might pick up some grain elsewhere.

And the third point I was going to make on the domestic side, I think if you take commodity prices and particularly food prices, in producer terms there have been hardly any adjustments in prices that in no way have got by with the kind of costs that farmers have had to face, and as a result over the years there has been a continual erosion of income, and you couple that with lack of delivery opportunities (we have a pile-up in the grain industry) and this has depleted any cash reserves that existed in the farm community.

Senator McGrand: I agree with you that perhaps it is a bad deal to destroy a sound agriculture economy in Canada which could sell wheat to Japan because we did not want to have them compete in our textile industry.

But then on the other hand I have been told by two different people in Japan this year that the fields of Japan are piled up with rice that they cannot sell; an over-production of rice.

Here is Japan, a little country, 145,000 square miles, and population of one hundred million. 15 per cent of the land is arable, and yet if they could have an over supply of rice, what chance is there to sell them wheat unless the diet of the Japanese is changed from rice to wheat.

Mr. Babey: It is an established fact I think, and one needs to only take a look at the kind of export that we had to that country in terms of wheat, that their diet has changed, and it is going to make another change from wheat to the foods that have higher protein. I think the potential in red meat is going to be—and this is one shift that might be made in Canada—from grain to meat. That kind of market.

Senator McGrand: Alberta beef.

Senator Pearson: But the rice they are now producing is not the same quality of rice they used to have, and it is not satisfactory to the consumer. That may be one of the reasons why it is piling up so much.

The Chairman: Have they changed?

Senator Pearson: The quality of their rice, as I understand it, is somewhat like a glue when they are boiling it, instead of like the old rice. It doesn't boil up the same way at all.

Mr. Babey: I think the key to this, their preference is probably bread now and not rice.

Senator McGrand: You said that the northeastern section of Alberta is the area where you have the poorest hardest luck farmers?

Mr. Babey: That is one of them.

Senator McGrand: I would like to know why that is. Is the land in northeastern Alberta not as good as southwestern?

Mr. Babey: I think that there are many, many reasons, but by and large the land is not as productive as it is in several areas. Secondly, a lot of it, you run into obstacles such as very small fields in between sloughs, and the question of stones. It is a stoney type of condition in many cases.

Senator McGrand: It is poorer land?

Mr. Babey: And I think the other thing, too, is that this area was probably settled about last. Many people moved from some other areas where they have a very bad farming experience; crop losses of one form or another, and they moved in there because this was about the last place where you could pick up land fairly reasonably, and people had hoped they could start up all over again.

Senator McGrand: What do you mean on page 24, "More industrial development should be encouraged in rural areas." What do you mean? Everybody I talk to seems to feel there should be industrialization in every little town in Canada. Every area that is down at the heels someone says we should have industry here.

Now, there is a limit to what can be produced in a different type of manufacturing. What would you say the industrial development of these areas should be, and then you made reference to Lesser Slave Lake, and a funny thing, I had read about it; I had read that article and I have forgotten the objective.

Mr. Babey: I think basically the point that we are making is that if the government is going to provide incentive we would like to see incentive we would like to see incentive provided but that industry would be located in a rural area.

I have had an example recently where a substantial government grant was provided for a fertilizer plant, but it was built, you know, within driving distance of Edmonton. But because the designated region came up that far, they were able to do it.

Our point is if we are going to provide public funds as an incentive for building an industry, let's get it to where we are; take employment to the people because you have in many of these regions a situation where people would be employed and this would provide a sufficient portion of off-farm income and part-time employment providing the industry was moved in that area.

Senator McGrand: Then you mean a decentralization of industry, and when you say industrial development you mean de-centralization. You have two large centres in Alberta.

Mr. Babey: That is right.

Senator McGrand: Half a million people, and the rest are comparatively small places, and you mean it is just as convenient to place some types of industry 100 miles east or west of Edmonton as it is here?

Mr. Babey: Right. We believe if they should be eligible for our grant, then they must be.

Senator McGrand: You don't go along with this idea that there should be fewer farmers; get them off the land? Put them into larger units? Instead of having three farmers, have one and the other two fellows can get training and live in the city somewhere? You don't go along with that?

Mr. Babey: It is very difficult to buy that kind of position. How do you justify moving people out of one of the most efficient industries that we have got? It is fine to say that we will take a farmer out of his industry because he is under-employed, but where do you put him? Do you put him in the completely unemployed? Right now we have more unemployed people than we have farmers in Canada and I believe society and the people concerned are much better off if these people are under-employed rather than if they are unemployed.

Senator McGrand: I agree with that. I was trying to find someone who agrees with me.

The Chairman: I think every member of the committee agrees with that. But what he is saying, in effect, is let the farmer farm. Let him continue to farm, but on his off-farming season he has got to be near enough to industry to take an off-farm job.

Mr. Babey: This is one approach.

The Chairman: But you are talking about industry, instead of being close to Edmonton have it close to there. That is the concept, is it not?

Mr. Babey: Yes, that is one of them. This would fit the employable age bracket. I think we also have to look at the age level of farmers in Canada, and the average is somewhere around 57, and it is climbing. So, the group that is employable, this will suffice, but there is another group, people getting up in years, but I think we are better off to leave them where they are, even if we have to supplement their income, to live out their years in decency. I do not think we should spend any more money in retraining, because there is not sufficient time left for them.

The Chairman: We around this table share your view. Pearson sold us that view some time ago. You don't move those people out at all. You leave them there and look after them.

Senator Carter: I am a fisherman, not a farmer. How long has this organization been in existence, Unifarm?

Mr. Babey: Since the end of March this year. It is a unique organization. The attitude in Alberta has been...

Senator Pearson: They didn't want to join the farmers' union?

Mr. Babey: I was president of the farmers' union. We had two provincial farmers' organizations, and the attitude of the Alberta farmers has been this: we could do much better by working very closely together, so we put them both into one and called it Unifarm.

Senator Pearson: It is not a co-operative organization then?

Mr. Babey: It is an organization that is made up—part of the structure, 50 per cent of it, is the direct membership just like you have in the farmers' union as it used to be, where you have direct dues-paying membership.

The other half of the representation comes from all the producer-owned and controlled cooperatives and commodity organizations.

Senator Carter: So there is no cooperative management of these farms? You don't provide general services apart from determination of policy maybe? You don't provide management services to any farms or anything like that?

Mr. Babey: Through our organization we have not yet developed to the stage where we are providing management services although we have been looking at this. But we are providing a host of services.

We supply services in the field of accounting, but not to the extent of providing managerial competence. We provide insurance services, practically a complete line, including any personal problems that any member might have. He has the organization at his disposal.

Senator Pearson: Have you any idea in your organization of making it more readily available to get parts for your machinery and that? They are getting so far apart now that you drive 100 miles for a small bit of machinery part to keep going working. It seems to me there should be some agency that has parts for all machinery so that they could be handled from one central area.

Mr. Babey: When we appeared before the farm commission that was looking into farm machinery, one of the proposals that we made was the multiple-agency concept where all the machine companies would use one agency and they would line their equipment up with a price so that the producers would have an opportunity to compare, and this is I think what you are getting at, but I don't think you will find very much enthusiasm as far as the companies themselves are concerned.

Senator Carter: In an organization like yours, is there any way in which you can get together and do bulk purchasing and provide services of that kind?

Mr. Babey: We have our farm supply cooperatives, and certainly our organization encourages farm supply cooperatives to use their facilities, and indeed cooperatives have effected very substantial savings. But I think even cooperatives are limited in how effective they can be because they do not manufacture the product in many cases. In many cases they just purchase it on behalf of the producer, so the only advantage you really have is the volume purchase that you make. I do not think they are the only factor because I think by and large manufacturers that produce the commodity control the prices of them.

Senator Carter: And are most of your members what we call family farms?

Mr. Babey: I would like to think that very few if any are other than family farms. I would think all of them are.

Senator Carter: Practically all?

Mr. Babey: Yes, but they vary.

Senator Pearson: They vary in size?

Mr. Babey: And we have incorporated family farms as well.

Senator Carter: What proportion of the total farms do you represent then?

Mr. Babey: As an organization?

Senator Carter: Yes.

Mr. Babey: I would say since we put together Uniform and the organization that we have, we would represent more than 95 per cent of the farmers in the Province of Alberta. In the direct membership side alone, our membership is over 30,000 this year, and out of 45,000 commercial farmers in the province I think this is a pretty high percentage.

Senator Pearson: Talking about the market, have you made any study of marketing at all? Developing marketing?

Mr. Babey: I think in a limited way. We have been interpreting extension agencies, governments, and indeed we intend to become involved ourselves.

I would not say we have made a complete study because I think our agricultural industry is dependent on exports, and the international field is certainly a big one to undertake for any organization.

I think looking at it from the standpoint of the food industry in this country, unless we can develop international markets and be a factor in selling in the international arena, our small population here would stint the agricultural production to such an extent that there could be very few people engaged in the industry.

Senator McGrand: What is the future of the family farm or the farm population in Alberta holding its own numerically in the future?

There is a glut at wheat in Western Canada. You have just talked here a few moments ago that you could transfer that glut in wheat to a glut in rapeseed and mustard seed and so on. So if you keep production capacity at its present level, whether in wheat or regardless of what grain it is, you can still transfer from one glut to another.

You can't go on forever with one glut after another. Something is going to deteriorate. And in the face of this, what is the future of the farm population of Western Canada if it is going to be faced with curtailing its activities or face gluts?

Mr. Babey: Well, I think the most difficult part about gluts and really, you know, there is a reason why this happens. There are two things that come to mind. One of them is that we have never really sat down and tried to plan, or, indeed, as a matter of fact what is the Canadian agricultural policy besides providing cheap food to the consumer, and who pays the cost of that burden?

I think if we want to continue these kind of policies, very many people are going to get hurt, particularly bearing in mind inflation and costs of production are going up, and agricultural prices are staying at a relatively low area.

But I think there is some optimism for the industry as well because you look at the red meat market in Japan alone and if we were able to provide a promotional campaign that would increase the consumption of meat in the Canadian production couldn't begin to cope with that kind of demand, and particularly bearing in mind that the income per capita doubled between 1964 and 1970, and they expect it to triple over 1964 to 1975.

The Chairman: Japanese income?

Mr. Babey: Yes.

Senator McGrand: And the New Zealand market now. It used to be all Britain. Mutton and wool, but now a lot of that is going to Japan I believe.

Mr. Babey: Yes.

The Chairman: That is, of course, in fear of the common market. They are hedging.

Senator McGrand: There is an opening there for a small market.

Mr. Babey: I did a small study this year in Japan and I find that the red meat commodities from Australia and New Zealand they are not that receptive. Really there are opportunities for high grade Canadian beef, particularly if we can get away from the tariffs and quotas restrictions that they now impose, and I think in order to get away from them Canada has got to change its attitude and remove restrictions that we have for that country.

I think in terms of oil seed, that is another crop that has tremendous potential, and one that farmers could change to easily without hardly any additional cost.

If you watch the production, how we are consequently increasing production of oil seed, and yet it appears we might be able to do so and market a very substantial crop at pretty fair producer prices, so these kind of commodities do offer some optimism. But again I want to stress the importance of real planning in the agriculture industry.

We should know where we are going in the production of food. We should know what the market requirements are, not only on the domestic scene but on a global basis, and then approach this market by producing to meet that kind of challenge.

A problem in the past has been that we have depended very much on information that we would receive of the pricing mechanism to decide what individually we are going to produce, and some time a reflection in price is not soon enough and the production piles up, and this is partly the reason why we have this large surplus of wheat today. And the reason for bringing in a program such as Operation Lift to lower inventory for tomorrow.

Senator Carter: Isn't that because as a farmer you make individual decisions rather than group decisions?

Mr. Babey: I think by and large farmers have made some real good decisions if you take into account all the very limited kind of information they have, particularly the very limited kind of market information.

Senator Carter: Do you depend solely on the Federal Government for that?

Mr. Babey: I don't think so. Many farmers will tell you that they probably have now got to the stage that they do the opposite of what is advocated and they do real well.

Senator Carter: I know, but you were complaining about information. You say you want information. Who do you expect to supply this information? Do you feel you have any responsibility to supply it or to get it yourself?

Mr. Babey: Definitely. And we have argued for years, for 12 years I can remember a resolution of the other farm organizations that I know, asking that a deduction be made off our week and this money be spent in marketing research, and nothing has happened.

Senator Carter: Who did you make that to?

Mr. Babey: The government.

Senator Carter: Which government? Federal?

Mr. Babey: Yes.

Senator McGrand: What do you call the main body, Canadian Agriculture?

Mr. Babey: Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

Senator McGrand: That organization is old and it has got a lot of good men in its organization, and with a little money taken off farmers in dues and so on. I would think they would be able to set up that marketing investigation service on their own. They are a big organization.

Mr. Babey: This has been one of the problems in farm organizations, and admittedly I have to tell you it has been our problem too. For example, our direct members pay an annual fee of $10 a year and I think this will indicate to you how limited you are in financial resources, in trying to do a job on $10 a year membership.

We are hopeful now that we have put all the provincial farm organizations together in one that we will get a legislative check-off, that there is a small deduction made on the product that is sold so that everybody will contribute, and, hopefully, we will come up with a realistic budget where we can do much more product promotion and market development in areas that farmers have not been involved in.

I am a great believer that we can rely on assistance as long as we want to, but the final solution in agriculture is going to come from within the farm community itself.

The Chairman: In Ontario we have a farmer's check-off.

Mr. Babey: Not really. Not in a farm organization; you have a check-off through many commodity organizations using marketing legislation.

Senator McGrand: Such as milk?

Mr. Babey: Yes, milk.

The Chairman: No, it may be on milk but there is check-off in marketing areas.

Mr. Babey: Well, the Hog Board have, the Tobacco growers and the Beef Board and so on.

Senator Pearson: It doesn't go to one central fund. It all goes to different commercial groups.

The Chairman: He is suggesting that is exactly what they do, they use that fund for marketing purposes. Isn't that it?

Mr. Babey: Yes, but there is one difference, and I think the difference is this: if you approach that on a commodity versus commodity basis, you can get into conflicts, and let me give you an example right now: I think there is probably a conflict that perhaps the rapeseed producers in this country would like the tax removed on margarine, and the dairy people would oppose it. I think the advantage of a general promotion in terms of the development of a market, that you take into account the total food basket because really one food is in conflict with another.

Senator McGrand: I just want to ask one question. I don't know whether you are a cream man or whether...

Mr. Babey: I am a mixed-up man, mixed market.

Senator McGrand: What is the future of the dairy industry? I mean the milk and butter. We know fluid milk is pretty safe, but for manufactured milk and butter what is the future of that when you are faced with the competition of synthetics, margarine, and the possibility of making margarine from things grown on the land?

Can the dairy industry in Canada survive as it is at the present time? We have synthetic butter and you are going to have synthetic milk, and the possibility is you will have some synthetic beef.

The Chairman: Some synthetic farmers.

Mr. Babey: When we get to where we have synthetic people we will have the thing resolved, but I am never worried too much about synthetic replacing total food. They may be a factor and they may be useful in terms of low income families in Canada, but I think the fact you have to colour margarine before people will buy it is an ideal example. It really can't compete with butter when you have to deceive the public, you know, in order for people to buy it.

I think there may be some room for synthetics, but I don't see how you are ever going to produce synthetics that will match really good beef steak.

The Chairman: Senator Carter wanted to know—you said farmers were prepared to permit the market organization, government or otherwise to take something off the top for the purpose of marketing and advertising and whatnot. That was the question?

Senator Carter: Yes.

The Chairman: He asked you how long had it been advocated and you said 10 or 12 years. So that is quite a long time to make an impact. Why is it refused?

It seems to be a sensible sort of thing. Is it because you people want to control marketing and the advertising and the government won't let you, or is there some other reason?

Mr. Babey: I am not sure I can answer what all the reasons are. All I have said is I do believe that in this type of involvement—and really we didn't spell out in any way that we would control the funds—if producers are going to pay for the research, we should have some say in what is going to be researched and the areas that will be looked into, but we were not even specific in that area.

All we said is we would like to see a deduction made that would be an infinitesimal amount in terms of per bushel deduction, and yet I think we could have done a lot in terms of marketing research. I am very much afraid that the fact we cannot guarantee proteins under our rating system has been a very significant factor in Canada's sales of wheat to the UK.

Senator McGrand: And they are all demanding higher protein content; isn't that right?

Mr. Babey: It is not essentially a higher protein content in every case, but I think what they want is a guaranteed level.

The Chairman: Do you mean that is something new?

Senator Pearson: New for us.

The Chairman: Why new for us? What is new for us there?

Senator Pearson: Grading on a different system altogether. We really don't worry about the protein at all. If it looks good, good colour and good weight, that is about all we think about. Dry.

The Chairman: Then all we can require is just a change in grading?

Senator Pearson: Change in grading is opposed by a number of farmers who don't live in the Palliser Triangle. The Palliser Triangle is what they call a higher protein content. Those outside that area don't have that same kind of content and they feel the protein content will solve a Palliser Triangle wheat and leave them out in the cold to the last.

The Chairman: I thought maybe it was a different type of wheat.

Senator Pearson: No.

The Chairman: But it is simply grown under drier conditions?

Senator Pearson: Just in a drier area.

The Chairman: What has brought the change about in Britain? Is it the eating habits?

Mr. Babey: New baking technology has changed it. I think it is new baking technology where they can buy a lower grade wheat at pretty low prices and buy a guaranteed level of protein and mix the two together and come out with real good bread.

The Chairman: And cheaper.

Mr. Babey: Yes.

Senator Carter: On page 22, I have two questions on that page. You said:

With present distribution methods most of the subsidies goes to those farmers who now have less need of them.

And coming from Newfoundland I can say the same thing about fishermen: types of assistance to fishermen go to the ones who need it the least. You don't spell out very well what your answer is. You say "Unless additional subsidies and assistance are re-directed to low-income farmers." In what way? What have you got in mind?

Mr. Babey: I think the point that we were making here, and I want to be clear that we are not saying that farmers don't need subsidies—as a matter of fact we feel that in some areas if we are going to be competitive with the kind of protection that is offered to producers in other countries of the world it would be essential that we are, but our point is we have many of the low income farmers, and by and large the low-income farmer will probably be one that has limited volume of production, and if you are subsidizing on the basis of output, it simply means the lower the output the lower the subsidy that this person gets.

And when the amount that he earns, a significant amount is consumed in terms of family expenses and cost of living, it leaves no capital for these individuals to fall back on and build up his enterprise so that he can get up into a higher earning bracket.

Senator Carter: But you see the whole purpose of a subsidy is to work itself out of existence. If it is successful it is only a temporary measure. If you had a guaranteed annual income for low-income farmers would that do away with the need for subsidies?

Mr. Babey: I think it would do away with it in terms of the social problem that these people face, but I do not necessarily think it would do away with the subsidies for agriculture because I think it is dependent on what you do in terms of Canadian industry, and it depends on what some of the countries, what the European Common Market does, what the American grain farmer is going to get for not producing.

Senator Carter: I am interpreting your words literally because you said with present distribution methods most of the subsidies go to these farmers—you are talking about farmers?

Mr. Babey: Yes.

Senator Carter: Not about agriculture generally—go to those who have less need of it. I am thinking in terms of farmers, and I am asking you the question in that context, of individual farmers rather than agriculture.

Mr. Babey: I think if you had a guaranteed annual income you would not have to worry about providing subsidies for the low-income farmers.

I might make you another point: it is one that is probably unpopular for a farm leader to make, but I think it is essential because this is the way I see it. By and large as we have developed much of our agriculture policy in Canada, we have really done it on the basis of trying to develop commercial policy for commercial farmers, and at the same time try to solve the social problem that exists within that industry.

It seems to me that if we continue on that course we will fail in both. I think what needs to happen, we have to separate the two and develop the kind of agriculture policy that will ensure the survival of commercial operators and where we have social problems, deal with them with social programs that will meet the needs of those people, and this applies not only to the agriculture sector but to other areas of Canada as well.

Senator Carter: What you said in your brief is that subsidies as they are now distributed are not working, and if you do not have subsidies and do have guaranteed annual income certainly the farmers would not be any worse off, if the income was at a reasonable level.

Mr. Babey: Well, I think that in any change I think that probably we would end up better off, but I do not want to leave the impression that subsidies are not required.

I think the point we are trying to make, the low-income subsidies are not really helping to any great extent because of the conditions these people are under.

The Chairman: You remember when Munro the president of...

Mr. Babey: The president of Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

Senator Carter: He made the same point? I think I was at another meeting.

The Chairman: He made the same point dealing with the low-income farmer: you need something more than a subsidy. That is the point.

Mr. Babey: On page 19 I think we make the point, Item 60. We explain the kind of policy, and really the point that we are trying to make, you have the information there.

The Chairman: I have been in Parliament for 25 years and I have never heard an agreement on agricultural policy, no matter whether the Liberals are in or whether the Conservatives are in. No matter what they do.

Of course I know too little about it to pass any judgment but there are some very able people in agriculture. I don't know how they all missed the boat.

Senator Pearson: Guaranteed income on a farm is a difficult proposition because you have different qualities of land. Just as you say in the northeastern part there it might strike the government that they are wasting money. I am not saying yours in particular, but someone further away in the bush where the land is not of any real value, and you are subsidizing him with a guaranteed income just to sit there. And he will do nothing but cut a few trees down and burn some wood in the cottage, and that is it.

The Chairman: Remember the suggestion we had before the Committee: leave these farmers in just such circumstances as you suggest. He can't make a living on the farm, and this came from Dave Kirk, and the suggestion was that we are far better off to buy the man's farm, pay him for the farm and let him sit there throughout his days. They are doing that in Scandinavian countries. If I recall it correctly the Prime Minister got on the bandwagon about a month afterwards and thought it was a first class idea. Dave Kirk made the suggestion.

Senator Carter: Yes. You talk about taxes: "Farmers are more receptive to tax reductions than they are to transfer payments that provide the same end result."

I am thinking of low-income farmers. They wouldn't be paying much income tax. The greatest part of the tax burden, does it come from provincial? What constitutes the tax burden of a low-income farmer?

Mr. Babey: I think the largest portion they pay would be municipal. Local government. And this is taxation on property, for example. It is the same regardless. It is not geared to income or the earning power or the ability to pay, and it is there and it is fixed.

If the property tax is fixed and his level of income is very low, you will find a situation where tax is a very significant portion of his income.

Senator Carter: You talk about tax reduction. The municipality is not in much of a position to cut them out either.

Senator Pearson: Municipal tax is school tax. Take that off and it would relieve the farmer a great deal.

Mr. Babey: I think the education tax is about two-thirds.

Senator Carter: Can you find a different way of financing education?

Mr. Babey: I feel very strongly that education should not be financed by property taxes. I feel property taxes should be used to pay for the services for that property.

A much fairer way to finance education would be income tax because through education one increases his earning power and when you increase the earning power then you get a larger payment in taxes. Personally I feel it would be much fairer.

The Chairman: Of course the Provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are both doing that now. Newfoundland has a different system, but the other two are using that basis of general taxation.

I don't know what direction they are going to take, but it seems to me one of the things they can look forward to is that particularly older people, those we will say receiving the Old Age Security, will be probably the first who will be relieved of school taxes. They have no children in school; paid taxes all their lives, and will probably be the first to be relieved of it.

I think they will do it gradually in the larger cities because they can get industrial income. Whereas in New Brunswick he can sort of combine the two very well, and Prince Edward Island too.

Senator Quart: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I have been absolutely useless this afternoon in the farming.

The Chairman: Oh, no, no.

Senator Quart: But I remember on one of my first trips out west I was told to avoid any discussion about wheat, and I was misquoted and got in the paper when I did, and they said if you want to get out of it don't discuss wheat at all out there, and I can always remember if you want to get out of hot water—well, I don't know about it, but I remember a little jingle and I hope I am quoting it correctly: birds say tweet tweet; lovers say sweet sweet, but the darndest word I ever heard is wheat wheat wheat. And I was able to get off the hook.

The Chairman: You are off the hook today because you represent the consumer public.

Senator Quart: I love farm products, as you see.

The Chairman: If there are no further questions, may I say Mr. Babey—and Mr. Allen too for he worked on the brief and we thank him for what he did—that it has been a pleasure to have you come before us. We are impressed by what you read out. We had not had an opportunity to discuss it or read it completely, but your knowledge and your method of expression, and the general impression that you make on the committee is a very good one. It impresses upon us the seriousness of the problem that is faced, and the very fact you have been able to express it so knowingly is very helpful to us.

On behalf of the committee who have problems of their own to struggle with, we say thank you very much for sharing.

The Chairman: The next presentation is from the City of Edmonton Social Service Special Project. On my right is Mr. Harland Magneson the director, who will introduce his delegation.

Mr. Magneson, Director of the City of Edmonton Social Service Special Project: On my right is Dr. George Kupfer, and beside him is George Diadio who looks after research.

Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, ladies and gentlemen, before I go ahead with my summary of the brief—I am not going to read the brief—I would like to mention that we did have other staff who were involved in this demonstration project: Lucille Châtelain, Marlene MacIntosh, Rod Kolbus and Margery MacLean.

The resource mobilization for employment, "Special Project" as it is known, was initiated two years ago for the purpose of helping unemployed employable people out of a status of dependency upon welfare. The service was experimental, and the achievement of psychological and financial independence for these people was the goal.

The reason concern was expressed for this group was the number of unemployed employable persons on welfare rolls was increasing and also there was need for more knowledge about the most effective approach in meeting their needs.

A grant was received from the Department of National Health and Welfare, grants division, to study the problem for two years, and since then a follow-up period was financed by them as well to conclude with the report.

Currently we are looking at the information and data that we have gained through that two-year period, and are writing that report so we are pleased at this time to be able to fill you in with some of our impressions even though our report is not at this time written.

The staffing of the demonstration project and of social services generally has been somewhat of a problem. This particular project was staffed by people from different professional backgrounds. It included social work, psychology, adult education and sociology. In addition we had consultant staff that included medical, psychiatric, psychiatric and psychological personnel.

The thing that happened was that a team emerged to render service and to research the question of what are the most effective ways to assist the unemployed employable person.

A group of clients chosen consisted of married males under 45 years of age and their families. This group was selected for two reasons, first, they were high priority in terms of cost of social assistance, and second, this group of men appeared to be healthy, physically, and mentally, and therefore it was assumed that they would be good candidates in terms of the mainstream of society and work.

Cases were referred to us from the regular system of social services by welfare from the city and provincial services, and the thing that we identified rather quickly was that most of these people were living in conditions of poverty.

All of the people dealt with in our project in two years were in relative states of poverty. They were poor to the extent they had exhausted all of their own financial resources and had become dependent on the welfare system.

We took a look at this question to try to identify it more closely. We identified two different kinds of poverty which are very closely interrelated to one another.

First there was poverty involving simply lack of money. Second, there was poverty characterized by demoralization, despair and hopelessness. These individuals were lacking in the spirit of life, and had simply resigned themselves to a vegetative kind of existence.

Then our task became one of confronting the despair we were witnessing and experiencing in meeting these people.

In reviewing our service it seems the greatest perceived benefit was the opportunity for personal confrontation. Clients tell us they had a healthy experience where we were willing to tell them exactly what we saw as their responsibility to others and to the rest of society.

Hope was restored; plans were initiated; aspirations were sound goals allowed the development of self-worth again.

During all this experience an active core of clients formed a participants organization and fed back information that improved our services as we continued our research. You will have a chance to hear from some of these people this evening. Therefore I won't say much more about them at this point. I want to tell you a bit about the experimental transactions that took place during the two years.

Quite frankly, I personally took this position, having come from a private agency, because I felt that the public sector could render services as effectively as we could in private agencies, and I felt there was a need, perhaps a greater need for good service, and for service, that we meet needs of these people in the public sector.

In keeping with this philosophy we emphasized an experimental creative kind of thinking. We emphasized flexibility to meet individual circumstances, and the outgrowth was several innovative approaches. These concentrated around several of the concepts, and you have this before you in the brief. I am not going to read them. If you have questions we would be glad to respond to your questions on them at a later time.

First, the informal operational procedure. We felt it was necessary to be able to treat people as personally and as warmly as we could.

Second, client involvement. We felt we must help these people become part of the solution to the problem we were studying.

Third, was staff development, and we had a creative kind of staff development policy that we have freedom to implement, and it takes money to develop staff that can competently deal with problems of confronting despair and help people who are in the situation they are in.

Utilization of community resources, development of group experience for people so that we could cut down on the alienation they were experiencing.

So this is a psychological measurement. We have a lot of data and professional knowledge of how to assess the individual. This knowledge is not being well utilized in my opinion at this time in many of the services across the country. Also it was necessary for us to go out and develop jobs for people to take when they were ready to work.

Included in this was a research component on an on-going basis. We had feedback from another professional perspective, and this fed back information into our service that was vital for us to make improvements as we went along.

Out of this experience we were able to identify two sets of dynamics. The first, individual personality. It is very clear that many of our clients are personally inadequate to meet demands placed on them in our modern labour market. And secondly, the complexity of our society.

The lack of job opportunities contribute to competitiveness that force people to the bottom of the ladder. These dynamics combine an inter-act and cause people to lose sight of their objectives, give up hope, and our clients found themselves in a situation where they were compelled to apply to welfare to survive.

Once they are dependent on social assistance for livelihood and a client finds himself reinforced for failures in his life, and because he is still not accepted by society but is rather stigmatized, and he finds it increasingly difficult for him to extricate himself from this situation.

Out of our experience we have been prompted to make some recommendations and that of improving social assistance services in the public welfare system.

While there is some talk about scrapping the present public welfare system in favour of some form of guaranteed income, our experience indicated that there is more than a need of money. Guaranteed income alone is not enough.

Our clients indicate a need for more services, competently staffed and geared to help them straighten out their lives.

These facts prompt us to make recommendations that we have made which are basically aimed at improving the present delivery of social assistance services to people who find themselves in these circumstances.

We therefore recommend that facilities and services be organized in such a manner as to permit a general informal personal procedure.

We recommend that diagnostic service be available and utilized in a planned and disciplined manner so as not to become bogged down with chronic cases that take most of the time of professional people.

It is recommended that clients' voice in control of public assistance funds be implemented on a cooperative and organized basis. It is recommended that assessment or goal planning meetings be held with teams of staff with clients participating to implement goals and facilitate involvement.

We had a very positive experience with respect to this in our two years of demonstration. We were hesitant at first to bring clients in who were downtrodden and who really probably lacked much of the strength that you and I have as individuals, and yet we felt the only way we could help them was to provide information, that we allow them to make good decisions for their own future, and we found it to be very useful to bring them in to our staff meetings and to help them, and to help explain the technical information that we had had so that it made sense to them.

We also found it takes a team of staff to do this because it is necessary to gain a prospective and have several people tuned into the needs of an individual.

It is recommended that assistance programs build in outside consultation aimed at improving consultation techniques and provide individual and up-to-date knowledge, and to gain a better prospective of the task at hand.

It is recommended that social assistance departments across the country set up on-going demonstration staff units exploring innovative approaches, and acting as training units, working with difficult cases, and reporting regularly to staff operating social assistance programs.

It is recommended that social assistance administration be done flexibly, keeping in mind the unique and differential needs and the level of the potential of different clients.

In my mind it is unreal for us to develop a categorical program that treats everyone in the same manner.

It is recommended that in social assistance units intensive services involve teamwork. This concept involves the assignment of a case to one primary worker but the case then becomes the responsibility of the entire team rather than a single individual.

Here I think we can learn something from the people who are involved in putting men on the moon. They have had many systems inter-acting and working together in a systems way, and I think in the human services we can combine our services to help people in a more realistic manner.

It is recommended that the task of postulating problems inimitable to research be assigned a higher priority in the job performance of staff and social assistance programs than it is now receiving.

It is recommended on-going research be implemented by social assistance departments in order to develop up-to-date and relevant programs that will meet the needs of individuals who are poor.

In concluding my remarks I want to mention that to date nearly 75 per cent of those that have been intensively involved with the special project services are at work or are in school preparing for work, and it seems as though they are gaining a niche for themselves that has some meaning, and integrity and worth has been restored to some degree to them.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would be happy to have questions from the Senators or from anybody relating to the brief. I didn't go into much detail on the brief; I felt we should use the time for discussion.

The Chairman: Do you mind if I just ask one question: are you American, Canadian?

Mr. Magneson: I am Canadian-born and I was trained in the United States.

The Chairman: How long have you been in this field?

Mr. Magneson: Just in the last two years.

Senator McGrand: What part of United States were you trained in?

Mr. Magneson: I took my graduate training at St. Louis, Missouri's Washington University.

Senator McGrand: Did you see any difference in the American problem and the Canadian problem?

Mr. Magneson: In what respect?

Senator McGrand: Just in that respect? You have seen it in the others and you have seen it here.

The Chairman: He didn't see it in the States.

Senator McGrand: He studied down there; he had to see it.

Mr. Magneson: I think in this respect we are much closer to better solutions than they are in the United States. They have many more problems that are complicating their situation than we do, and I think we have a much more comprehensive kind of legislation already in force, and this was I guess one of the reasons that I was anxious to come back to Canada and take on this responsibility of demonstrating a useful kind of service.

The Chairman: You rather agree with the committee's view on the problem up to date. We have to go along way. Everybody in the Senate wouldn't agree with you.

Senator Carter: I think this is most interesting because you have branched out on your own, looking for a new approach, new philosophy, and adopted the systems approach and copied from NASSA down in the States, and you developed a program that is voluntary, I understand, and personal and individual, tolerant to individual needs.

Now, apparently one of your first problems: you talked about this confrontation, and I presume that is one of the devices you have used for changing this attitude because basically you had to change the attitude of your clients. What was the most significant factor in accomplishing that? Was that the confrontation part?

Mr. Magneson: Well, Mr. Chairman, Senator, I really think I should ask you to ask that question of the clients tonight, but I will take a stab at it too.

The response that we got was that clients were asked to come to our project. They were not told a whole lot about it. We have a comparison group that remained in the system, so these people didn't know much about us. They came willing to take another chance; I guess essentially to hear what was going to be offered, and when we met them with an informal kind of attitude in the waiting room, they become a little suspicious in terms of what we were after now.

But we were able to back this up with service which meant something to them and to their needs, and they were able to continue with their involvement on an on-going basis to start to plan goals.

So I can say it is a process of restoring hope to persons who feel there is no hope left for him, and as this evolves, as a professional person you get satisfaction from your work as well and you become rather intimately involved with your client.

Senator Carter: These people came to you from welfare agencies? Did you just take them as they came, or did you make a selection?

Mr. Magneson: No, we took them as they were referred. We did have a specific criterion of being married and under 45. We arbitrarily chose these criteria for reasons I stated.

We took them as they came, but if we felt there was psychiatric problems to the point where it would be detrimental to them to be involved in a system that would be in existence for two years and we didn't have an opportunity to help them, we felt some obligation to level with them and told them this was the case. There were very few cases we rejected if I remember right.

Mr. Kupfer: There was one in the sense people were identified with general characteristics. One was sent to the project and the other was left in the existing system, so that we tried to get groups that were fairly comparable.

One was left in the regular welfare system of the City or the Province and the other exposed to this project. Some did choose not to stay.

Senator Carter: When you got them they were down and out financially? At least they had lost all their self-esteem and had no hope; they saw nothing ahead of them except welfare for the rest of their days. Then, what was the first thing you did for them?

Mr. Magneson: The first thing most of us did was try to get to know the person individually. Through conferences about two or three times a week. We wanted to set aside as much time as possible, up to as much as five hours, and during that period of time we insisted they look at their own budgeting situation to see where they were financially.

We wanted a complete account of where they stood financially. All their debts; all their liabilities no matter how old, and we also wanted them to bring in their own budgets stating how much they felt they needed in order to have a decent standard of living.

It was a rather interesting experience because many of the people brought in budgets that they expected were similar to the system, and we could tell what the system was granting. If a person was smoking a cigarette and didn't have it in on his household budget, we said where do you buy these, and it was a very direct kind of approach and we wanted everything listed.

We didn't want him buying cigarettes out of his grocery money. Just as an illustration. And so we insisted they bring in a statement of what their own needs were, and from there we worked in terms of assessment of potential where the person we felt might have skills that he was not aware of, where he might develop and where he could grow and try to point a direction.

Senator Carter: Now the Canada Assistance Plan was based on need, the very thing that you people did to get this fellow to find out and assess his own need.

Did you find much difference in what the actual need turned out to be than what would be assessed, say, by the Provincial authority?

Mr. Magneson: No. I can't say it is a significant difference. Last fall we did a survey on the cases we had active at that time, and the difference in terms of what was being granted before they came to us and what we were granting them on a flexible basis was about $50.

It may be significantly different from case to case because we treated them on an individual basis, and then we took another look at this later on, and we found these people were requiring financial assistance for shorter periods of time, so on the overall, I don't think it has taken more money but it has created incentive and hope to meet their needs more realistically than in a short-sighted way.

Senator Carter: Did they continue to get their welfare assistance or were they cut off altogether from welfare and you financed them, the whole budget?

Mr. Magneson: We handled the granting of assistance from our project.

Senator Carter: And they had no contact with welfare? They didn't get any social assistance from any other source?

Mr. Magneson: No. The bill was picked up on a cooperative basis by the City and the Province and the Canada Assistance Plan.

Senator Carter: They didn't know it?

Mr. Magneson: It was arranged through the Provincial authority.

The Chairman: The client didn't know it?

Mr. Magneson: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: Why would he know about it?

Mr. Magneson: We felt he should know about it.

The Chairman: About what?

Mr. Magneson: That his assistance was being paid by the Provincial and Federal Governments.

The Chairman: It is always paid by them so in what respect is it different?

Mr. Magneson: None.

Senator Carter: Except that you gave them a little more.

Mr. Magneson: We did grant assistance on a flexible basis giving more or less as they requested.

Mr. Kupfer: I thought your question might have been did your demonstration money separately pay welfare costs. It did not. It was regular welfare assistance.

Senator Carter: Oh, I am sorry.

The Chairman: It was the regular welfare money. All they did was they passed it through to them and it was really government money.

Senator Carter: The government really agreed to pay the extra money?

Mr. Kupfer: They agreed to more flexible budgeting.

The Chairman: That is a professional way of saying they gave them more money.

Senator Carter: I don't want to monopolize the questioning.

The Chairman: Go ahead, you are on the right track.

Senator Carter: Having done this now, how long a period did elapse before his attitude began to change; he began to have some self-esteem; he began to have a different outlook?

Mr. Magneson: With your permission I will refer that question to George Diadio.

The Chairman: Your position?

Mr. Diadio: Research. I think in order to answer this question I would like to talk around it a bit in that what we found by doing some surveys on social assistance bodies—not necessarily those that we were directly involved with—we found that the first six months or so of experience with social assistance seems to be a sort of re-organization or timing period where, after financial difficulties and so on, the person finds that there is suddenly a predictable amount of money coming in; she has therefore an opportunity to plan for the future. She doesn't have to worry about where the next loaf of bread is coming from.

Senator Carter: When somebody decided what his need was, say it was $300 a month; he was assured of that $300 a month for how long?

Mr. Diadio: Well, within reason for as long as necessary.

Senator Carter: But the man himself, did he know he could count on this $300 a month for six months or 12 months or what?

Mr. Diadio: It never really got to that point, but I assume so, yes. He knew as long as it was necessary, as long as he was in this situation he would not go hungry.

But the point I wanted to make, we found people who had more intensive involvement and perhaps slightly higher assistance payments: this reorganization period I talked about was cut in half. Instead of for three months they looked around for jobs, they planned, and so on and got the family re-organized, and then they seemed to be in a better situation to get out and get back into the mainstream of society.

It cut this in half by the fact we were in a position to help them help themselves.

Mr. Kupfer: If I might comment, this budgeting is kind of interesting. It is not just more money. It is the fact that people sat down with their worker and went through a realistic appraisal, realistic from their prospective, but challenged and questioned, and debate would take place and a budget was prepared.

Also if there was disagreement, the client knew he could have his budget considered by another group besides the worker.

Senator Carter: I am thinking before you had all that. You didn't have the clients' consultation group until your experiment was fairly well advanced?

Mr. Kupfer: Right.

Senator Carter: And you had a number of clients that could do this now at the initial stage?

Mr. Magneson: I think in order to answer your question, what we insisted on was intensive involvement, and we told them this level of assistance would continue as long as they were consistently involved, but if they cut off their relationships so we didn't know where they were or what they were doing, we would have to take another look at this.

There is a certain element of re-evaluation in here. I don't think it was all that sure a thing. But as long as they were continually involved and taking psychological testing and getting services we were ready to provide, I think they were fairly well assured this was forthcoming.

Senator Carter: You told us before you got down to this business of budgeting you got to know each other over a pot of coffee and called each other first names, and you established a rapport with each other, and you got them to tell you about problems, and you got to know them as persons.

Then eventually you got around to talking about what each needs to get out of it. Of course he needs a job. Now he needed something else while he was looking for it. Something along that line in this period. This is what I was trying to get at in my original question. Something happened to this fellow. His outlook changed. When he came to you he was down and out. No hope, no money and no outlook, but along the line somewhere they change and I am trying to pinpoint just about where this change comes and what brought it about.

Mr. Diadio: I think again this would be something that would be better asked of the clients later on, but I would like to give you an idea: what I have heard from the various clients it is that they felt people were willing to listen to them, were willing to spend time with them and willing to treat them as another human being.

And in general it wasn't a file number or address idea, but trying to find out who they were and what their aspirations were. And, as I said, trying to treat them as human beings not as dregs of society. And this is not my words.

Senator Carter: But you were conducting the experiment and I am not asking you something secondhand from this. I will get that from them tonight. But conducting the experiment you must have been looking for changes, and you should have been able to spot it along the line.

Mr. Magneson: I see what you are aiming at. I don't know that I can give you a satisfactory answer because it varied in each individual case.

Senator Carter: Yes, Mr. Magneson.

Mr. Magneson: But I think what really happened, when they saw that we were really levelling and would follow through, they would start to respond, and I think it was that testing period that in almost every case was experienced until we established this testing period where they were really testing to see if we would stand behind what we were talking about.

I think it was that kind of relationship that has to develop before the tide turns.

Senator Carter: How long did it take to establish that kind of relationship?

Mr. Magneson: I think our experience would say about three months.

Senator Carter: Yes.

Mr. Magneson: It varied, but I think a safe estimate would be about three months.

Senator Carter: During that three months you had pretty close contact? Several hours a week?

Mr. Magneson: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Kupfer: It is more than just a kind of dispassionate humanism. It involved also going through the whole process of looking at yourself as an individual and getting them to be willing to face the kind of problem they saw they had, and all the kinds of psychological testing and all the kinds of test materials were shared with them, and they reacted back on them, and in a sense some could face themselves very quickly. Some never did and some disappeared. They didn't want this kind of exposure or for various reasons didn't care for this kind of program, so it largely depended on how quickly the man, his council and the team could really see where his hang-ups were, and they were not necessarily the fact he just was out of a job. It wasn't always employment that was the problem.

Senator Carter: For example he had debts and you found some way of consolidating these and some way of distributing them over a longer period? Was he able to deal with his debts out of the allowance you made him? Was that a part of the rehabilitation process?

Mr. Magneson: Mr. Chairman, Mr. Senator, in some instances we did allow for debts. If there was imminent seizure of personal property. In other instances we were very fortunate in this province to have the Debtors' Assistance Board which is a government agency which you probably know that can deal with debts in a reliable manner and is respected by the creditors in the community. So together we used these resources.

Going back to your previous question, I think you were heading on something. We didn't have a good idea of what to do with these men when they came to us.

At first we started to place people in jobs indiscriminately, just sending them out for the sake of getting them work, but we found rather quickly this is not the correct approach because we were spending a good deal of our time keeping that person on the job, and if he was not motivated for a particular job that we were able to place him into, we found he soon became absent or there was one excuse or another, and we were really repeating the cycle that had gone on many years before we got involved.

We changed our approach after a short time of trying this, holding off on the job placement and getting him to know us better. This was trial and error.

Senator Carter: Could you tell us anything more about the trial and error?

The Chairman: To what do you attribute your success?

Mr. Magneson: That is a good question. I would have to say the fact we had the time and resources available to use on an individual basis with people created a milieu that made success possible.

If we had certain policies that would have restricted us in terms of how much money we might have been able to grant any individual situation, we might not have been able to create enough incentive to give him hope to allow him to move back into the mainstream of society.

The Chairman: Did you read the brief that the social workers presented to us?

Mr. Magneson: Yes.

The Chairman: Isn't that exactly what they said? They did not do what you did in an experimental fashion. You as social workers were given a task, were given a fair load to carry, and were worth three or four times more than you are being paid, and can do a real job.

Mr. Magneson: That is essentially it. Actually what seems to have happened in the welfare program is that social workers have not had freedom to make decisions. They must go by prescribed policy over which they have no control which puts them in a double bind because on one hand they are trying to face the individual who needs help, and on the other hand they are accountable to society which says you are no good if you go over or under the policy.

The Chairman: In short, they have a load that is impossible to carry.

Senator Quart: On page 8, I am sure these group experiences you have mentioned here, all of them on that page, I am sure you feel yourself that by this retreat for married couples—I want to come back to what you mean by "Retreat" or where—I am sure the man who is unemployed at 45, he loses respect for himself and probably his wife feels he is a bit of a failure, and I think he probably would.

I think for them this retreat for married couples—have you a special place to put them—is to improve communication between husband and wife, and I am sure that must have succeeded. At least for the wives to realize more and more this is not a hopeless husband, and I think also this wives group here in similar difficulties, and it gives the family focus and to have these wives understand their husbands' unemployed status, and then work together as a team, I am sure that must have been a great success.

As well as sending the men out to assess their own potentialities or whatever it would be. And probably then, as you say here, you experience satisfaction and move from a state of immobilization to action.

Where do you send them on this retreat?

Mr. Magneson: Mr. Chairman, and Senators, this was really an experience we adopted from a sort of fad that is going in industry in terms of training management and sending management to sensitive work shops and what have you, and we felt it would have some merit to these people in these kinds of situation.

For my own part I must admit I was rather skeptical, and we hired outside persons to come in as resource personnel for this purpose. It has proved to be a helpful experience in that it has allowed them to back up and do some thinking about their personal lives.

We did it as cheaply as we felt we could. We actually secured a church camp that was not being used in the wintertime and rented those facilities and hired a cook and to be billed in this manner through our project funds, and we brought in an outside resource person who happened to be Dr. Paul Cozy of the University of Alberta as the person responsible for leadership.

Then our own staff was involved in going out there at the camp and spending time with the clients.

Our experience with the married couples group was not all that positive, and we have to take another good look at this approach because it may have been a bit too intense and they may not have been right for this kind of communication with each other.

On the other hand, our evaluation at this point indicates that probably bringing the wives and the husbands separately in an individual situation may be a more realistic approach.

The wives group came as a request of the wives themselves who said they were not involved in our services and I personally took on the responsibility of working with a group of wives, and I think it was a very useful experience because they were able to help one another when they got together and were able to communicate on a weekly basis.

The men's groups were oriented towards treatment of personality hang-ups; things that might turn employers off or turn other people in society off. As I mentioned, we have identified the fact that a large percentage of these people had definite personality problems that do not allow them to fit in well. Whether our society has got problems or these individuals have problems is a debatable question. Nevertheless we had to accept what is here, and we have this kind of society, and we felt this was the kind of task we need to expand and look at.

Senator Quart: About how many couples did you bring together?

Mr. Magneson: We brought 14 on that particular experiment.

The Chairman: For how long?

Mr. Magneson: Three days. And we did pay the expenses for a baby sitter.

The Chairman: Was that fair, 14 couples for three days, and you wanted results?

Mr. Magneson: No. I think I should explain we did follow up with a group, and Lucille Chatain had a group of married couples that grew out of that experience, and we look at this now as a way of launching a group experience that is probably helpful in getting people together.

Senator Quart: And the number of wives brought out together and husbands in separate groups, were about how many?

Mr. Magneson: The wives' group met in town. We never took them out to camp. I sort of had a rule of thumb. I would never meet with them unless there were at least six women because I felt it was not a good use of my time.

Senator Quart: You didn't get them away?

Mr. Magneson: The number of men we took away was 19 or 20 and they were there for three days.

Senator Quart: They got a break?

Senator Pearson: On your staff development, is your body a unique body in the country?

Mr. Magneson: In terms of the amount of money we spend and in welfare programs in the country, I think it is unique that we spend as much money on staff development as we did. I don't think it would necessarily be a good expenditure of money to have this on a broad scale, but what my point is, more money needs to be spent on staff development to meet the needs of staff so that they can continue to render competent service than is being spent at the present time.

Senator Pearson: Just to go a point further on that, how do you choose your staff now? You are put in charge I presume, and you had the job of building up a staff. How did you choose the staff?

Mr. Magneson: Well, actually the staff selection took place before I came on the job. Mr. Wass who you heard this morning was instrumental in recruiting the staff, and I am not sure exactly what criteria he used, but he did select the staff from outside the public welfare system as it were, and Mr. Diadio happened to be the only person who had been in the public welfare system previous to this.

The rest of us had all been employed in the field of welfare or human services previous to coming to this experience, but were new to public welfare.

Senator Pearson: My own feeling is your idea is something the whole service or the whole establishment needs very, very badly. Not only just welfare but in other departments. You are developing this thing as you go along I imagine?

Mr. Magneson: That is correct. I want to mention we paid quite a bit of attention to the needs of staff during the two years of the project in that we knew their work was very demanding and we needed to work together as a team. So we had to accept one another even though we didn't always agree with one another all the time. So we had weekly sessions where anyone was free to describe their problem or bring it to our attention so that we could work it out.

Another thing I mentioned in the brief is the very simple technique that was employed was the location of the office. We had a very small office, and the offices were located in such a way that we must come in contact with each other and collaborate with one another, whereas in many departments across the country it is easy for staff to avoid one another so you don't have a team approach.

So I think much can be said in terms of facilities and the layout of office space.

Senator Pearson: When you work with a client, do you work as a team together or do you usually individually discuss a problem with the client?

Mr. Magneson: We work actually both ways, and we encourage introduction of staff to other clients and vice versa so that the clients actually become acquainted with all members of the staff and usually the staff knew the names of most of the clients.

Senator Carter: How big a staff?

Mr. Magneson: Our unit comprises people who were listed here in the brief. There was three counsellors and myself and the research personnel. This is the size of the unit.

The Chairman: You said there were some others that you wanted to thank.

Mr. Magneson: They were the consultant staff.

The Chairman: How many consultant staff were involved?

Mr. Magneson: We had a medical consultant at the University of Alberta. We had a psychiatric consultant by the name of Dr. John Hancock. I think it is about four or five.

The Chairman: In addition to this staff of six?

Mr. Magneson: Right. We had the consultant staff on a retainer basis for awhile, and we found this practice was not utilized so we changed our modus operandi there and bought the services of consultants as needed.

Senator McGrand: I would like to ask you a dozen questions, but I will limit it to a couple.

In discussing this budgeting and helping people to spend their money, and these people who have lost their self respect and so on, do you believe that even in low income families that they can and do get by without this psychological breakdown with a loss of self respect and so on if they follow good budgeting methods with their money?

Mr. Magneson: Yes, I do, Senator.

Senator McGrand: We start with that. Even a small amount of money. With proper budgeting and cutting a few corners they could hold their self respect and they stay up until finally they find better times?

Mr. Magneson: Mr. Senator, and Mr. Chairman, I would like to respond to that by saying I think there are many people who are working poor and we are not necessarily talking about these people in this brief, but we are talking about people who have gone beyond that stage and have broken down completely in their independent functions.

Senator McGrand: That is right. Now on page six you talk about upgrading. You talk about upgrading yourself, and on page 8 you talk about getting to know yourself. On page 10, how to cope with consumer and credit resources. This is all part of the question I have asked you.

Do you mean, though, that if you prepare these people that have lost their self respect, and they have lost confidence in themselves to do anything, if you can rehabilitate or reorientate them so they have confidence in themselves, they are able to cope with the system and they are able to sit down, I don't say in a bargaining position with their employer and so on, but they are able to be in a position where they can at least bargain with their environment, with their own resources against the resources of those with whom they would be working.

Mr. Magneson: That is correct. In fact I can cite many cases that we have been involved with, and one case in particular, and may I just mention this case because I think it illustrates what the Senator is speaking to.

This particular fellow really didn't think that his previous employer would ever take him back on the job because of the attitude that he had when he left the job. He hadn't been fired but he left, so I argued with the fellow. "Look, you never know until you try. Let's go and see the guy."

He said, "I will agree to go if you make an appointment." I made the appointment and the guy said, "Yes, bring him over."

I had to argue with the client again. I told him this fellow was willing to talk to him. He said, "Oh, he can't be willing to talk to me." It is a state of mind of the person. He puts obstacles before him that are so real to him but are not necessarily real in reality, but we went over and the result of this situation is that this person has been able to bargain for himself, and I have had very little contact with him the last six months, and he has now been promoted and is doing well in this particular industry.

Senator McGrand: On page 3 you mention there are approximately 4,000 people unemployed, employable unemployed, and then you go down in that paragraph, in Alberta the number of people seeking social assistance is increasing.

Then you mention it is hard for persons who have been in the poverty cycle to get out of it. Now, if there is an increase in the number of people seeking welfare, and there is an increase in technology that causes unemployment, so at the present time it is going to increase?

How do you suggest that these people who are in the cycle of poverty now and those who will be in it 10 years from now, how are they going to break out of a cycle of poverty which comes from an increase of technology and all that sort of thing increases? What is the future? How do you look at that? It worries me.

The Chairman: What worries me was his answer to your question that all they need to get by on is good budgeting practice. I was astounded to hear that answer, that that was the biggest need, and that was what I thought your answer was.

Mr. Magneson: I must have misunderstood the question.

Senator McGrand: Here is my question: in other words, the emphasis is on therapy and on independent spending and even people with little money, with not much money, can get by and don't break down, while some people earning a lot of money can throw it away on a second car and a swimming pool and end up awfully poor in the long run. And his answer suited me that the first principle is good budgeting methods. That is one of the first things.

Mr. Magneson: I don't know if I would put it first or not, but what I can say, it is part of making your dollars work for you.

Senator McGrand: I put it first.

The Chairman: That is what puzzled me, that he should agree that it is first, that he should agree it is part of the package deal, which is a different thing entirely. But go ahead with the last question.

Senator McGrand: Increase of technology has added something to the unemployment, and it is one of the things that has added to the rising cost of living, and these people are caught in this rising cost of living and caught in this unemployment thing, and they are in the cycle of poverty.

It seems to me that 10 years from now those in the cycle of poverty will have a harder time to get out of it than those that are not in it today.

Mr. Magneson: I think I agree with you, Mr. Chairman and Mr. Senator. I would like to refer this to Dr. George Kupfer. He is our man who has a broad scope in this project, and maybe he has a vision here that he can express.

Dr. Kupfer: I think we are in the area certainly of ideological values and beliefs, and to some extent I can tell you what my prejudices are, and I think they are founded, but you might not think they are founded.

This is one of the frustrations we have faced in the project. We think in limited terms of reference we have been successful, and you can define success certain ways.

However, if society has to or insists upon continuing using high unemployment rates to combat inflation, we could not possibly cope with as many men that would be sent down on the street. Some of the men will survive because of certain of the inner resources they have within themselves and in the community, and others will not.

Just the fact that we rebuild some of their resources is only part of the answer.

So I think you are right to a certain extent under the present system. Even if we make the welfare system function better or revise certain laws about it so that it goes more smoothly, it will probably not answer the question of poverty.

We get to the whole question of redistribution of income. This certainly has to be grappled with. The basic ideas of society are pre-faced on it.

I do not think the future looks too good right now. I think we are going to have a great many men unemployed seeking social assistance. Records are growing up in Alberta and the amount of money is insufficient. The City will have to go for some more money to cover the needs of a great many men who are knocked out in hard times.

Many of these men could function quite well. If they have a job they function quite well. We are not in that group. We are down a few notches lower, and I think what this project shows, the present system can be more effectively applied, but you have to deal with the whole man and you have to deal with a fairly flexible system which gets out of some of the traps that the system we presently have has developed.

That does not answer your question but it is the only way I can answer it.

Senator McGrand: You sort of agree with me this problem is going to grow in magnitude regardless of what we do?

Dr. Kupfer: I can't accept that fully because then I have to become a sort of cynic and then perhaps take some other attitude. I think we have the intelligence to cope with what looks like...

Senator McGrand: Perhaps you did not understand my question. We have seen people today and we will see them tonight. These people were down and out and somehow you got them on their feet and you got them going again. This is going to be harder to do in the future with this increase of technology and so on and the increase of unemployment. It is going to be tougher to do in the future.

Dr. Kupfer: I would agree with that. I think the other statement you made which says we cannot do anything about it, I think at that point, I think we must take a view that we can do something about it. The point is where do we strike?

The Chairman: What do we do about it?

Senator McGrand: He doesn't know.

The Chairman: You have as much right to your opinion and to your prejudices.

Dr. Kupfer: I guess I am too prejudiced based on my experience with this particular project. One is the existing system can be run better and can be run more sensitively and more equitably than it currently is being run. The other is that we have to have a basic restructuring of society. Now, on that point we are going to get into ideology.

Senator McGrand: What do you mean by basic restructuring?

The Chairman: You mean redistribution of wealth?

Senator McGrand: It means more than that.

Senator Carter: A different set of values.

Dr. Kupfer: You are talking about a kind of capitalistic society that we presently have, and I leave that word in quotes. There are certain things about it that seem to me to generate certain kinds of problems just as in efficient functioning certain kinds of problems are produced.

Senator McGrand: I often think about the Scandinavian way of doing things and they interest me enough that I drove 3,000 miles up and down Scandinavia looking at everything I saw, and it seems to me that thrift is the basic thing they operate on. They make use of everything, all natural resources of the community.

Now, this continent grew up on the great American dream that we had manifest destiny over the continent.

Thirteen colonies along the Atlantic Seaboard said we have the whole continent to look at as manifest destiny, and they get by that so in recent years it seems to be that our way of doing things is to use and to throw away. You use it and you throw it away. It is cheaper to have something new than to use something that is only partly worn out. It is not thrift and it is used and thrown away.

There are a lot of books written on it. Consumer Complex. We are in a consumer society. We must use it and buy something new, and when you talk about restructuring society, this is the thing I think about it.

The Chairman: Are you in favour of stopping consumer credit every place?

Senator McGrand: I didn't say every place now. I said thrift.

The Chairman: Let us get back to this for a minute before we restructure society and let us see if we cannot do some restructuring here. When you gave this man $50 more in the experimental stage, you gave him less than he would have received if the Economic Council recommendation had been taken into account?

Mr. Magnuson: Probably.

The Chairman: Not "probably". I have the figures in front of me and I have lived with them a long enough time. You gave him something less than what we call a poverty level. How could you experiment with something below the poverty level? You were carrying on an experiment, and rightly so, and you had free use of money—not too much; I appreciate that—but in experimenting, wouldn't you have experimented with something above the poverty level and/or at poverty level and say, "We tried this?" Why didn't you do that?

Mr. Magnuson: Well, I think that that came to us quite early. We saw that we have got to weigh advantages and disadvantages and then you make a decision and you go on course.

We felt it was far more responsible for us to ask the people what they thought they could get by on rather than arbitrarily saying to them you can have this much.

The other end is in our research and reading we ran across a document where President Kennedy had paid off some of the debts of some of the overseas service men who found themselves non-functional in terms of credit and wiped out their indebtedness entirely.

On follow-up, it was found these people were not managing their resources in any different way than they were previously. So our feeling was it was more responsible to make a decision to have them set their own goals and requirements upon themselves.

The Chairman: If you have been reading our briefs, do you remember reading a brief of the Health and Welfare Council—a thick one? Do you remember the two examples put in there?

One of the examples was what it would cost for a family of four in Montreal and what it would cost for a family of four in Toronto. Those are nothing like the things that you are concerned with, with the things you gave out in addition to that.

Let me just say in the presence of this committee that we have had some very responsible inquiries from across the country—perhaps you call it a Gallop poll—asking people, “How much do you think you require?” And you would be surprised at the kind of figures they come up with. They were honest-to-goodness figures and nothing like the figures you gave us here at all that you experimented with.

Dr. Kupfer: These figures—you have averages. Averages don't mean every single person is getting anywhere near that.

The Chairman: We are not talking about averages. You broke it down to the extent of about $50 or so difference. According to my figures you were way out in the amount of money you had available.

Let me give you one more example. On page 12, recommendation 4, you go for the demogrant.

Tell me, and either one of you can answer this, can you think of any good reason why I who have a public salary of $12,000 a year—and draw old age security? Is there any particular reason you can think of why I should be drawing old age security?

Dr. Kupfer: We might make provision for you to give it up.

The Chairman: You recommended the demogrant, and demogrant means everybody gets a cheque who is over 20 years of age or whatever you want. Do you think the public would accept that? You have accepted it now. They send me a cheque for $79. Can you think of any good reason why they should send me that cheque? Do I need it?

Mr. Magneson: No.

The Chairman: Well, why do they send it to me?

Mr. Magneson: I think it is easier for them to send it to you than to screen you out in terms of administration.

The Chairman: That argument was all right when it was used 15 years ago on the day we put it into effect. I was there so I know. We said it was the easiest way. We said that about the family allowance too, but is it easier today when you have these figures available or you can make a return or apply easily? Haven't we changed our course on that, on old age security when we said “Put in a return” to see whether you have or you have not enough money? Then we changed our course at that time. Justifiable? You agree with that.

Now, can you think of any good reason why I should receive old age security?

Senator Pearson: Supposing you were not in public service and you were getting $12,000 a year and your business went to pieces and then you would have to start again and work on old age security and try to get some money.

The Chairman: But that would change with the people who are paying it. Anybody who is getting over $10,000 a year, he may come down one year, down to $5,000, in which case he will make application later on.

People on a pension plan may work part-time one place and part-time another place and the income is broken up a bit, but these gentlemen are social service people who are intelligent, and they recommend demogrant.

Now, we have had no recommendation for the demogrant before our committee since we began. It has always been the negative income tax. These are intelligent people, I want to know how they could justify giving me a pension of $79 a month when they know I receive $12,000 a year.

Dr. Kupfer: You pay it back in taxes.

The Chairman: We don't retrieve that $79.

Senator McGrand: Not all of it.

The Chairman: Not half of it. That bunk has been passed around. You don't retrieve half of it back in taxes. The researchers should know that.

Now, tell me this: what is the purpose of paying family allowance to a man who earns $10,000 a year in his present state? Is there any reason for that?

Dr. Kupfer: Not that I can see.

The Chairman: You are still talking about the demogrant. That is a demogrant. That is the thing I got from reading that. Of course there is not any reason for it. If you are going to use money where it is useful, then you have to take it away from some of us who don't need it.

Mr. Magneson: Correct.

The Chairman: Then you will have to change paragraph 4.

Mr. Magneson: I still defend it on the basis of administration. I don't know of another way at this point, maybe you do, Mr. Chairman, of taking and redistributing the income in an efficient manner. Perhaps negative income tax will work more effectively than this proposal does, but those that I have read to this point seem to me quite cumbersome.

The Chairman: The demogrant is the most simple method of doing it. Write a cheque and send it out and hope to retrieve it.

In the first place the Canadian public will not stand for sending out a massive number of cheques, and secondly, it is not true you retrieve it, so forget about that.

Negative income tax has administrative problems that are real. That is what you are here for. That is what we pay you for, to work out these problems and see that the thing works. I know of no problem that we have had in politics over many years that we have not been able to work out some way or another, so it is not insurmountable, but we have got to make some realistic approaches.

The experiment that you people have been carrying on is a very useful one. I started out this morning by saying you were the experimenters. I said that before you ever came here, because we know something of what is going on, but I did not realize you did it on the cheap. You are qualified people. You are experts. We ask you to do something and you do it right.

This committee is going to write a report but not until we have heard people. Then we are going to sit down and think about it and then we will write the report.

I merely point these things out because I have a great appreciation of what you are trying to do and what you have accomplished. I think you have proven one thing to the members of the committee, something I have always believed in, that if we get a basic allowance and we have good services by trained people like yourselves, we can beat this whole problem of poverty.

We can do it. I have always been of that view. To help us we are having a special study made by social service people.

We had a brief from the Social Service Council of Winnipeg. They really have a story to tell, and they tell it well. It is one of the very best. I do not think you will see it in our printed proceedings because they merely sent it to us for our own reference purposes, but you can write to them and ask for it. And look for the one from Vancouver. That is a dandy.

We are delighted that you came before us and talked to us. We appreciate what you are doing. Your presentation has been very useful. We have listened very carefully to what you have had to say. On behalf of the committee I thank you very much.

(Upon resuming at 7:30 p.m.)

The Chairman: The Special Project Client Committee, whose chairman is Mr. Bob Jones will present the next brief.

You will recall that the brief we heard before we adjourned at four o'clock was presented by experts who had put on a special project. Now, these are the "guinea pigs" who are before us. They were the people who participated and made the project a great success in its own way. Mr. Jones will give us a short statement, and then he will in time hear any one else who has something to say.

Mr. R. B. Jones, Chairman of Special Project Client Committee, Edmonton: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of our group I would like to thank this committee for taking the time to see us and hear our views, for this is very important to us, and to very many other people.

On my right is Mr. Donny Hoogewaniuk who is vice-chairman, and on my extreme right is Mr. Dick Williams, chairman of our delegation and action committee.

What I would like to say, first of all, is that if it was not for the Special Project I don't know which end of the river my body would be floating on, and that is a fact. I am not saying that to be sarcastic, and by no means am I exaggerating because two years ago I was in one heck of a mess. Unfortunately even with the Special Project I was one of the fortunate ones to have been put in the Special Project as a referral.

When I was first there I was wondering where in hell am I going, what is going to happen next, because after being in the regular world with all the stigma, you don't know what is happening next. I found it was very informative. These little groups are a great asset. It was very informal and there was no stigma there. The secretary who was hired by the Special Project was very beneficial because of the fact that she also could relate to clients. She offered the client a cup of coffee when they first came in, and got them relaxed. It was automatically a relaxed feeling when you walked in there, and we found the Special Project staff, when introductions were made, after awhile the client and worker were known on a first name basis, and this was very good because there was no inferiority complex between the worker and his or her client.

Now I think to begin with, in order to summarize this to a point where you will understand clearly, I will use my own personal experience of how it has helped me.

At that time I was in bad shape. I didn't know who I was or where I was going and had a lot of hang-ups. My biggest hang-up, I wanted to be a singer and it didn't materialize. It was a big dream.

There was intensive counselling that was given to me which I am thankful for. Through extensive counselling I was brought back to a realistic situation. This helped me because I was really bad off. I used to quit jobs and go and sing and suffer, and that is why I was classified as unemployed employable. Just personality problems. Also I had an inferiority complex because I was Negro, and with this it broke the barrier, and as a result now when anybody offers me a cup of coffee I really don't mind drinking out of white mug.

I feel very much that this intensive counselling benefits a lot of people and not necessarily everybody need extensive counselling, but in order to gain more insight into the individual, which the Special Project Staff has done, they are able to find out just how much the individual needs, and his needs and how to get to them.

There are many things that have helped me. I only have a limited amount of time. I will try to get it across the best way I can.

There are fellow colleagues here who have a lot of concern to express. At the Project, I feel one of the assets was because the project had a variety of professional people. They have a psychiatrist; they have a social worker; they had a researcher and educator and director which all came from different backgrounds, and if you can tell me, for example, how we can relate this special program for the regular system—this is what I am fighting for—as something better and the Special Project had better service.

How can a group of social workers have an assessment made of one individual or individuals and his wife and family and come out with actually different results.

On the Project with a variety of staff coming from professional backgrounds, it was found that the staff disagreed with a lot of things, and the purpose of this assessment meeting was to provide a better way for the individual, namely how to function in the future, and I believe there was a lot of value in the assessment meeting.

I believe that the truth always hurts and the truth comes out because you are behind a glass door with different people and listening and talking and bringing everything out. I believe it gained a lot of good results.

Also as a client on the Project, as a client gone through the mill, I felt that individual group meetings that the men had and the meetings that the couples had, I found a lot of value in them because I found that a lot of problems I had like many others, many are psychological, and they are not all bad as it turned out when you are talking with somebody else on the same level as you and they have the same problems as yourself. You open up and have friends and you talk about everything, and this really helps.

The same goes for married couples. It is an asset to talk with married couples, talk about several things, anything, because you are helping each other and you are accepting ideas and you are giving ideas, and I think both of these were very good things that were implemented into the Special Project along with the fact it had flexible administration which works according to the individual needs.

I feel that this was really an asset because you have just one straight rate: you know, you are in a heck of a mess because people's lives change accordingly. They change accordingly, and this is where finances have really fit in quite well.

Also I found through the sensitivity group exercises it is bringing out a lot of characteristics, these different skills, at the meetings, that the group has, and a lot of things that you wonder why a human being does this and he does that, and I found out all this helped tremendously.

And best of all, was the intensive counselling, you really get to know yourself and know yourself better.

And what happened, from the Special Project, the client committee was born, and that is why we are here this evening presenting a brief to you, and it was first initiated by the staff and later became self-governing. This was an asset in so many ways. We were able to make decisions for ourselves. We were able to talk out to the public, to the news media and all the different levels of government and talk to people in a logical manner.

New clients coming onto the Project—as you know, there is an inferiority complex between clients and workers at all times—or most of the time—and if the client has trouble relating a problem, he can therefore go to the client committee, discuss the problem, and therefore we would take this problem or questionnaire, whatever it may be, to his worker and out of the client committee a budget committee was born consisting of three members, clients, which there is always a money problem because this is a problem with most people, and if people felt they would need more money they would go to the budget committee. They would sit down with three members, and they would work everything to the forefront and mark everything down and discuss it.

Therefore there are three members on the budget committee and they discuss it, and the majority rules. They will increase his amount or decrease, and believe me it has worked both ways. And in turn take this decision to the Project director, Mr. Magnuson, and we would explain to him that we feel this person should get more or less, and therefore the results would be implemented.

I feel many of these things have been a great asset. It has really brought me out to look at things realistically, and now there are a few things I would like to stress: for example, the news media. I found now that I have been straightened out the Project has put me in school and they set me out so I see a path. The Project works slowly, the client has to work hard also if he wants to get ahead. We are not God. We are only human beings.

The thing is I just finished my 12 and at last I see a goal ahead and I am working for it, and right now I am working with the social department up in the CN Tower and I am trying to implement some of the things myself, forming a clients' committee which I thought was of great value and now I see both sides of the fence.

Something I want to stress is this: the news media, the radio and TV, it seems to me that every time the only thing that is printed or said on the radio is when some idiot says clients are bums and when some idiot says that social workers are lazy.

There is something that people don't know, and that is this: clients are not all lazy. If they are given a chance they will work. They have the potential. If they are given a chance. On the other hand, the social worker is not lazy. I am working up there now. It is hard. If people would understand the system, those poor people have a lot of work, and when you get 140 clients on a caseload how can you do justice to a human being, and this is the thing that people have to understand.

They don't seem to know this, and maybe this would be an asset if people knew both sides of the fence because right away it would take a burden off the client and the social worker.

The fact that I am now working up there, sometimes I see young kids that I am counselling, and I see myself just two years ago, and my God, I was helped. There is no reason that they can't be helped.

And many of these people I see today has more potential than I had and it is pretty sad when you are a 22 year old boy and the only alternative is for him to go to the hostel. I think that is really sad.

The only thing I have to say is that I was fortunate. I had a chance, and I took it, and I am glad I did. And there are so many people who need that chance and we would like to see them have that chance.

Mr. A. R. Hoogewaniuk, Vice-Chairman of Special Project, Edmonton: Actually I don't have to recite too much any more because the only thing is that I really want to emphasize the difference between the treatment we get in the Special Project and the treatment we have had before on welfare.

I see that is a system which is really doing the things that they are preaching, and I think that under the circumstances it is impossible to do so because there are too many caseloads, as Bob already mentioned, too many caseloads and not enough workers, and there is nothing we can do about it.

We are really trying to fight for the continuation of the Special Project, and if that is impossible, to have it implemented in a social welfare system.

The Chairman: How long has the Special Project lasted?

Mr. Jones: It has been two years. It is folded right now.

Mr. Williams, President Action Committee: September 1st.

The Chairman: Have you anything to say?

Mr. Williams: Not a great deal.

The Chairman: If not, silence is golden.

Mr. Williams: Other than there is a change that has to be made in the social system. We know this is not the full answer when they said, the welfare department said we might incorporate part of it into the regular system it would be so much trouble. I agree wholeheartedly because we could take good out of the welfare system today and incorporate it into this system and then it could go the other way because there is so much that is written up, traditional old law, and when you consider the world as the world is today, it has moved from long skirts to moon rockets in 50 years, and on this base of travel the old system is falling far short, and this is why the project was founded and used as an attempt to open these doors.

Senator Pearson: Can the Project be continued or are you continuing the Project?

Mr. Williams: We are endeavouring to keep the client committee alive because funds are not set out for the continuation of the Special Project.

Senator Pearson: The two years are up?

Mr. Williams: The two years are up, and until I took over in the committee, it has been a lot of study and a lot of learning to walk, you might say, and by the time we were in a position to voice or show anything as a factual base and a finding, our two years were up. It should have been set up as a 10 year project and not a two-year.

Senator Pearson: Has the City considered it all? Are they activating it?

Mr. Williams: We spoke to Mr. Wass about it, and he thought it was a great thing. Mayor Dent thought it was a very good thing. Mr. Speaker thought it was a good thing, and a chap from Ottawa was out and he agreed wholeheartedly. But it came to the old army buck-passing. One has to do this before we can do that, and they have to do this before you can do that, and it was a bunch of baloney and a lot of buck-passing.

Senator Pearson: You said you were working in the CN Tower there. What particular thing are you doing there?

Mr. Jones: My job is to provide a link between the client and the welfare system. I guess you would say it is almost as a public relations man in an advertising firm.

Sometimes I may be able to communicate in each case better with a client than a social worker because I know what it is like. I know what it is like to be on welfare. I see these people, and it really concerns me. It is not money. Money helps anybody, sure, but the thing is if you have respect and understanding and concern towards a human being, this is so much more, and I am trying, and it is a new position and I am just trying to do what I have learned.

Mr. Williams: I think you should let them fire to us and we will do our best to answer in as short a time as we possibly can because there is a considerable amount I would like to get at.

Senator Pearson: These people that are all sitting around here now, have they all been through the program?

Mr. Jones: Every single one has been through the program.

The Chairman: Are there any aspects particularly, Senator Pearson, that the people here might cover?

Senator Pearson: Yes. Personal experience. I would like to hear some of the personal experiences you had. Why did you get down to the position you did to start with, and how did you manage to meet these people and get to where you are now?

Mr. Williams: I will relate that to a question that the Chairman was finding it difficult to understand, Mr. Senator, why do we accept this kind of money on the Project.

The Chairman: I never asked you that question. Senator Pearson's question should be answered first.

Mr. Williams: Yes, and I will have to come back to yours to answer his.

When you haven't got education to start with and you have grade 7, and the City demands Grade 12 to handle garbage cans, what kind of living do you think you earn on the street with a man and wife and four children.

You are drawing maybe $250 or $300 a month. If you are bloody lucky you are making three bills. You have got to survive on that, and when they come up and you get $350 or $400, this looks like a gold mine to you, and you certainly can get by on it because we have known corner-cutting.

One thing we did not have was management, and this Project did give us help, and with this I think you will find your answer in this.

The Chairman: Did your wife participate?

Mr. Williams: Yes, very much.

The Chairman: If anything embarrasses you, you don't have to answer. What were you doing when you got married?

Mr. Williams: I was a logger for part of the year and the season closed down and I went mining. My previous background to that was farm labour and construction which is all seasonal work, a farm employee, and all our big leaders there decided it was the big farmer that needed ten or twenty thousand a year help and not the small farmer, and chase the small farmer out. Now these fat big farmers are sitting idle too, so touche to Mr. Dieffenbaker on that one.

Mrs. Williams, Client: I am his wife. There was just no communication. He was up-tight and there was no communication. Consequently I got up-tight and that is where the counsellor in the Project helped us. Somebody to sit down with, and you have got to go some place. It is not a case of whether you are right or he is right, and I think that helped us, just the fact there was communication.

The Chairman: There is no question about it, over a period of two years you have both been helped.

Mrs. Williams: Both of us.

The Chairman: And that is the answer.

Mr. Williams: Industry and farming has continued to be the main unemployed, and who goes, the fellow with the poorest education, and even a trucking company—there is something I did for five and half years and could stop one on a dime. Well, I could go for a job driving a semi again, and the first thing they want is my Grade 12 diploma. It doesn't matter, that five years on them.

The Chairman: How old are your children?

Mr. Williams: Our oldest boy is 21, and 14 and 13.

The Chairman: the 21 year old boy, what education has he?

Mr. Williams: Grade 11.

The Chairman: What is he doing?

Mr. Williams: Electrician's apprentice.

The Chairman: And the others, what are you doing with the others?

Mr. Williams: In school.

The Chairman: How far up?

Mr. Williams: Nine, and the young boy missed this year, so he is in seven, and five and three.

The Chairman: You are not losing sight of the fact that lack of education is what handicapped you. You make sure it doesn't handicap your children.

Mr. Williams: If I have to butcher half of the department they will get their education, and I feel just that strongly about it because when I sit back and I read in the paper there is some premier or some official has gone on pension of twelve or fifteen thousand a year, and he is you might say an old crow up in the eighties, and I am sure he needs that kind of money to live on, plus he draws old age pension on top of this—something has got to be done about it.

The Chairman: Don't get upset over these things.

Mr. Williams: It is easy when you are at the helm, but when you are lower on the totem pole...

The Chairman: There may be very good reasons for a man who has probably earned it—let's stay with your problem.

Senator McGrand: Did you say you have to have Grade 12 to drive a truck, and your son with Grade 11 is an apprentice electrician?

Mrs. Williams: And he still has to go to school so long every year.

Mr. Williams: He is schooled to what an electrician requires. No more. Just what they want you to know to be able to become a qualified electrician.

Senator Carter: Are you working now?

Mr. Williams: No, I am not. I am at school.

Senator McGrand: What grade have you got to? Manpower...

Mr. Williams: Manpower won't put you in school unless you want to become an educator.

The Chairman: It would be well to answer the question.

Mr. Williams: No, not Manpower.

The Chairman: Just answer the question, the side effects we will look after.

Mr. Williams: Well, this is my own personal feelings.

The Chairman: I know, but just Manpower. Where are you taking this, under the government?

Mr. Williams: Special Project and ADC is paying part of it, and the Special Project paying the other part.

The Chairman: How long have you been in the Special Project?

Mr. Williams: A year in August.

The Chairman: That is the project that the province has especially undertaken. No other province has taken that?

Mr. Williams: I don't say they are all bad.

The Chairman: I was not trying to impress you with how good they were, but to indicate the Government of the Province of Alberta is alive to the situation.

Mr. Williams: Yes, I realize that they have got a lot of things going, and if they do what they say they have started, on the employment effort which I think is a great thing because the Manpower should not be separated from welfare or unemployment insurance.

The Chairman: There is a problem there.

Mr. Williams: Because both run hand in hand.

The Chairman: We have had that before.

Senator McGrand: On page 10 you say, "As mentioned above, at the latest counting about 70 per cent of the Project clients have gained access in work..." 70 per cent of those who have gone through the mill have now gained success in work or upgrading? 70 per cent?

The Chairman: Or upgrading in high school.

Senator McGrand: That is a pretty good record, isn't it?

The Chairman: As against 40 he says in the next line.

Mr. Williams: Yes. I think it is a very good percentage, and I doubt without the counselling that we have been given we would have this kind of percentage.

Senator Carter: I would like to ask a question of the vice-president. I have forgotten his name.

Mr. Hoogewaniuk: Tony Hoogewaniuk.

Senator Carter: Tony, how did you come to meet this Special Project?

Mr. Hoogewaniuk: I was jobless and I was on provincial welfare and my social worker told me that I had to go to the Special Project. I didn't know anything about it.

Senator Carter: Who told you?

Mr. Hoogewaniuk: My social worker. You are going for provincial welfare and you are going onto a Special Project. I didn't know anything about the Special Project, and I thought well I might as well.

Anyway I met the people there, and to be honest, you know, I told my social worker that, too, that I felt like a guinea pig. But anyway, the first couple or three or four weeks I guess I was quite reluctant, and then by talking with the staff and by doing psychological tests, et cetera, I got more aware of what was going on and what they were trying to do with me.

Senator Carter: How long did that take? How long did it take for you to realize just what it was all about?

Mr. Hoogewaniuk: I think a month, five weeks or so. Maybe some people were more quicker than me, but just what I said, I felt like a guinea pig.

But I rapidly changed my mind. When I realized what they were going to do and what they were trying to do for the people on Special Project, and from there on I got more interested.

I might say from there on I am really fighting for this Special Project. It is not only that I have benefited myself, but I think they can do a lot of good for other people who are in need of it.

Senator Carter: At what point, Tony, did you realize that it was something good? What triggered off in your mind? I mean your attitude at first was that you were a guinea pig.

Mr. Hoogewaniuk: That is right.

Senator Carter: But you changed. What caused you to change?

Mr. Hoogewaniuk: Well, I read the manuals from the social department, and there is one sentence, the objectives for the services of this department are to stimulate within each person to know his ability, to gain or regain or maintain a sense of self respect and personal worth.

I say that they really did what they preach because I mean I had always the feeling when I was on welfare, you know, I felt I was a good for nothing and I was down. I mean it was degrading.

As soon as I came on Special Project, that feeling was over. They made me gain my self respect again. You had to set yourself a goal to work to or something, and they were really interested in the individual.

Senator Carter: That is what sparked it off? You felt their interest in you as a person?

Mr. Hoogewaniuk: That is right.

Senator Carter: That is what brought about the change in you?

Mr. Hoogewaniuk: Yes.

Senator Carter: What in your opinion is the main element in this project as far as you people are concerned that has been successful? You are all praising it and you want it to continue. What in your opinion is the main element in the success of this thing? What has contributed most in your opinion to its success?

Mr. Hoogewaniuk: Because being on social welfare I have not met anybody who got an opportunity to upgrade himself, to go back to school and take Grade 9, 10, 11 or 12, and we have the opportunity here. I think this is a very great asset.

The Chairman: Is your wife here?

Mr. Hoogewaniuk: No.

The Chairman: Will some lady answer that question that Senator Carter asked as to how she is affected?

Mrs. Burr, Client: You mean our feelings towards what they were doing?

The Chairman: Yes, and when did you realize and when did it affect you? When did you enter into it wholeheartedly?

Mrs. Burr: When you first start out you are reluctant. You have been on social service. Myself, I have been on it a long time and I have a family of 10 girls of my own and we were really down and out, and when we got a chance to go on Special Project, we were told what could happen, and what couldn't happen, that they would try for us, and they did.

There has been many an argument, and we thought things were wrong and we could go to them and tell them we don't like it, and they were willing to go along with us on many things, and after awhile you get self confidence and you get these things back. You seem now a real good person. You are not a poor person any more. You are the same as them. You are treated the same. And even though they are in a higher class, and I think this is great, you are in such a rut when you are on welfare you need someone to come and shake you to get you going again. And this is what they did.

A lot of times you go in there and you don't know what you are going to be greeted with. You can always fight back. They give you two minutes to say what you want, and it is usually "I will give you a cheque", and you go out the door. We don't want all that. We want a feeling of being wanted.

The Chairman: How old are your children?

Mrs. Burr: 14.

The Chairman: The oldest?

Mrs. Burr: Yes. And 13.

The Chairman: And then down?

Mrs. Burr: 11, 9, I have two 8.

The Chairman: All right. What effect did this have on the knowledgeable children; on the 14 year old?

Mrs. Burr: It was great.

The Chairman: Explain that to us, will you? What did you expect with your change in status? In your own view you have had a change of status?

Mrs. Burr: Right.

The Chairman: Did it or did it not affect these knowledgeable children of yours? You know, not the babies.

Mrs. Burr: Yes, it did.

The Chairman: The 14 year old child, did it or didn't it?

Mrs. Burr: You know even the older children get to a point we don't tell our classmates that we are on welfare, but I told the girl any time to go and see the social worker. If our children had problems we could take them to one of the social workers that was working with you. He would gladly sit and talk to that child.

My girl was hanging up on a lot of things. Being on welfare she knows that she was no good in the first place. She went down and she talked things out, and there were many children helped in the Special Project. You know, in a family that has been on welfare a long time the children get an inferiority complex.

Not only the parents, but the children too, and after awhile the children feel different, and you see them starting in school better. My two older girls—one is going to school this fall to a trade school and the other one has come from modified 8, which is slow up to unrestricted Grade 9 this year, and this has happened this year, and she was way down too. And even the other children are doing well.

Senator Pearson: Do you still get your welfare cheque?

Mrs. Burr: No.

Senator Quart: Your husband is working?

Mrs. Burr: Yes. He drives a truck. $101 to licence the truck. He is out bailing hay or cutting hay, whatever there is, until he can do better and get better. Until he can get his truck on the road again.

The Chairman: This other lady's children are small. Who has children that are impressionable; 14, 15 or 16 years old?

Mrs. Williams: I have.

The Chairman: Can you add anything?

Mrs. Williams: I think basically in the Project...

The Chairman: Excuse me. How old are they?

Mrs. Williams: 14, 15, 11 and one girl 8. Well, they vary to the point the parents are on welfare and you do feel it, but with the Special Project, after you start looking at yourself, you get your pride back and the family gets it pride back and you too and they gain pride from that.

You take away a man's pride and he has got nothing. You get it back in a bit and the children sense this. If you are not ashamed they are not going to be so ashamed, and I think that is basically how it worked with me.

The Chairman: Mr. Danyluk, you have seven children?

Mr. Danyluk, Client: Yes.

The Chairman: How old is the eldest?

Mr. Danyluk: 17 and 16.

The Chairman: Boy or girl?

Mr. Danyluk: Girls. And then I have two boys 13 and 14.

The Chairman: Let us talk about the two girls, impressionable young ladies in that they were 14 and 15 when you started in this project.

In your own words—you don't have to use our words—can you tell us anything that you think had an effect on your household, and particularly on the children? Perhaps your wife too?

Mr. Danyluk: Before I came on the Project there was a lot of bickering and a number were running away from home. A little old for that, but anyways, in other words, during the period of time I was away the kids finally realized that their father just was not able to provide so they went on welfare.

During the five months I stayed on the regular system my children cried and used to walk around and sneak around and they never had any friends. Their marks were down. Their school work suffered and I guess it was shame of being on welfare, and most of their friends knew about it, and then when I went on the Special Project in January and they sent me back to school—now my kids, I am proud to say, that the two oldest ones that I was having so much trouble with, one of passed with quite a few honour marks, and they are all high marks, which means that through help in the Project and counselling, and through my own—I went back to school and I am going to Grade 12 now and I will be finished and on my way to university I hope in September if I can get a loan—and it has improved. The whole family has improved. They can walk down the street now and hold their heads up with anyone.

Senator Carter: Tony told us how he came in contact with the Project, and it took him about a month before he caught on what it was all about, what they could do for him.

How long did it take you?

Mr. Danyluk: It took me almost as long as Tony in the sense that we all now—I don't know, through my own experience I knew something about it. I had read a couple of articles of a new attempt and new concepts that social welfare people were trying to improve, so my social worker in the old system recommended that I try this Special Project in a way, and the only way they could help me any further she felt was through the Special Project because the old system just won't give you an education.

Senator Carter: What education did you have to start with?

Mr. Danyluk: I had Grade 9 and I had gone through ATV before, but I reached Grade 11 and then I went to work for a couple of years, and during that time I got quite sick and I couldn't continue. I was a carpenter by trade. I couldn't continue the heavy load of heavy work and I got sick. I didn't know what to do and I went back on the regular social welfare.

Senator Carter: Can you answer the same question I asked Tony? Would you agree with this or could you add more to what he said about what is the most single important thing about this that helped you?

Mr. Danyluk: Self-respect.

Senator Carter: To get you on your feet?

Mr. Danyluk: The single thing was the self-respect; the fact that I could walk with my head up and being treated as a human being. Not as a number. And through the old system they have so many of them there that most of the time if she didn't look at the card she wouldn't even know who you are.

They give you self-respect and they give you a goal. With me an evaluation committee were able to talk with the wives and the family. We planned all this as a group.

Senator Carter: How long did it take? Did it take you a whole month before you began to regain your self-respect, or did it take more than a month to realize it?

Mr. Danyluk: It takes longer to gain self-respect, but they give you a feeling that they are helping you as a human being.

Senator Carter: Did you start right off, right at the beginning? That is the thing that impressed you first, is it?

Mr. Danyluk: Yes, the fact that you are not a number; you are a human being. It has a singular effect. You know, filing a report and have the social workers look at you and they get that sneer in their voice and get, you know, well, it is too damned bad; you are on welfare but you are not going to get what you think you are going to get.

Senator Carter: You are not regarded as a person with need? They think in terms of what the law will provide rather than what the human being needs.

Tony only wanted to supplement what he said.

Mr. Hoogewaniuk: Yes. I wanted to say something that is very important and I almost forgot about it. On the regular system you have vouchers and now we get cheques, and that is something that you feel more like a human being if you can go with the cheque to the bank and cash it than going on vouchers to the store and getting your groceries like that.

Senator Carter: It doesn't mark you at the beginning.

Senator McGrand: You are in Grade 12 now and you are trying to make university?

Mr. Danyluk: Yes, sir.

Senator McGrand: What are you going to take up in university?

Mr. Danyluk: Education. I hope to be a teacher.

Senator Carter: Why don't you go in as a social worker?

Mr. Danyluk: I have been asked by a number of people why I didn't choose social work, and I have a very good answer for it. I was under the regular system, the old system, too long to be able to take a job like it and hold my self-respect.

Senator Carter: You are under a new system?

Mr. Danyluk: Not yet.

Mr. Jones: An experimental system.

Senator Carter: You don't think you can operate under the system as it was?

Mr. Danyluk: No, I don't think I could operate.

Senator McGrand: Enough people like you in it would make the system better. Remember, a lot of these social workers have never been on welfare themselves, and their knowledge of social work was basically taken from a book.

Mr. Danyluk: I have discussed this with my wife. But we model some of our ideas from the Special Project—I feel personally the Special Project has dealt with it in such an unusual and humane sort of way that a city hall would say we might accept and try to change, I might try as a social worker, but they don't want to commit themselves.

Senator Carter: It depends I suppose on what the province will do, and the province has got to depend on what somebody else will do. The system does not begin and end at city hall. City hall is only just one cog.

Senator McGrand: Who is going to change his attitude towards the city?

Mr. Jones: Why is it that the Special Project being born for only two and a half years and could produce a program with such good results and services, why is it that something like a project and various other things that have come along in different areas of work, that they have been good and is an experimental thing, and yet when they introduce new policies, it is never an experimental policy.

The policy goes on for centuries. Why can't they introduce policies for experiments for two and a half years, for example?

Senator Carter: Why can't you do it? You say "Why can't they?"

Mr. Jones: I mean the government.

From the floor: Any government.

The Chairman: We are concerned with the government of Alberta.

Mr. Jones: I am not speaking specifically in the social sphere. I am speaking of policies, any kind of policy. It is hardly ever an experimental thing to see how it is going to work out.

It seems to go on an awful long time, and what I am trying to stress, I believe there is a point there, that the Special Project was an experimental thing and it was good, and I don't know, in the two and a half years, it really takes about six months before the client really starts to get involved, to get going, and that half a year is gone already.

The Chairman: Listening to the people who carried on the Special Project, listening to you, you have all said it was a tremendous success. If it is a tremendous success it is good for everybody as well as yourselves?

Mrs. Williams: This is what we want.

The Chairman: One of the reasons they may well give for not carrying on the Special Project, as far as you are concerned, is that it involves additional expenditure. I don't know what it is exactly in figures, but it involves additional expenditure, and it may be some of the things you consider were a success, on examination they may not agree totally.

They may accept some and not others. We agree that the Special Project proves something of great value, but that great value now has to be passed on to all the people who were in your position before you came on the Special Project. That is the government's dilemma and the dilemma of the people who are there. That is the problem they have got to face right now.

Mr. Jones: After two years, did they look at the referrals—the last referrals were as of December 31st, 1969. Did they look to see where the clients are going to be standing in September?

The Chairman: That is a question I don't want to ask because it is a toughie as far as we are concerned. This is something you are going to have to work out. You just can't come and say, "Get off the roller coaster while it is moving." You have been used to something, you have cooperated and you have helped, and now you are used to a little different standard than you had before.

Now, is it possible to bring this up to the desired standard? They have a real problem on their hands.

Senator Carter: I don't think, Mr. Chairman, they have properly assessed the problem that faces government. You people have had success and you yourself have said that you go in for two minutes and your file is out and you are gone. Now you haven't been treated like that. You have been given weeks, and weeks and months, and that takes a lot of staff.

Mr. Jones: A lot of staff.

Senator Carter: Yes. Look at how many staff you have had for your group, and when you multiply that by the whole province.

Mrs. Dahlberg: It might require a lot of staff at first, but as Bob pointed out once people get going they can form their own committees and help one another.

Senator Carter: But you still have to provide psychologists and sociologists and all the other expert opinion you people had.

Mrs. Dahlberg: Yes. Initially.

Senator Carter: We have to plan on a larger scale too. These people, you know, they don't grow on trees.

Mr. Danyluk: We have used outside help for what we call our sensitivity groups, familiarity groups. We have had this help from outside sources like the university. You have the psychologists there and you have psychiatrists and you have a lot of help that could be used without too much expense.

The Chairman: But you had a staff of eight and a call on about six experts here and there. It is a matter of expense. These people are not available at every corner, and your total group is what—97?

Mr. Jones: 109.

The Chairman: One for every ten or something like that, but anyway there are how many on welfare in here?

Mr. Jones: 18,000.

The Chairman: 18,000 people on welfare and you were 109 on welfare.

Mrs. Williams: Can't you get some kind of social aid to take a lot of the welfare worker's load? People on welfare are getting that money whether they earn it or not. Wouldn't they get a certain amount of pride if they could earn it? It is being paid one way or another. Would that build the expenditures up that much?

The Chairman: Don't forget on top of everything else, in assessing this, yours is the only experiment of its kind in Canada. Give credit where credit is due. You have proved something to the rest of Canada.

Mr. Hoogewaniuk: That is the end of it?

The Chairman: I didn't say it was the end of it.

Mr. Hoogewaniuk: This gentleman just mentioned that it would cost too much staff, and there was mention of 18,000, but of the 18,000 at least 50 per cent old age and disabled persons and mentally ill persons. Maybe five or six thousand people left who are maybe eligible for this Special Project.

Senator McGrand: No generation of people have ever been able to conquer the problems that rose during that generation. It takes two or three generations of people to develop techniques to overcome the problems of yesterday.

It is just that people often say why haven't they got a cure for cancer. Don't expect them to solve a problem in a generation in which it arose.

The Chairman: These people are all saying to themselves, Doctor, you created the problem in your generation and we are the people who are living in it.

Senator McGrand: But very few people of the older generation believe that they created this problem. True we did. True we did, not in my generation but the generation that preceded it.

The Chairman: I belong to your generation.

You see, what has happened is this: what we have been hearing in our meetings is that good social work can rehabilitate and pay off. The second thing we have been hearing is that if you give these people enough money to live decently they will live like decent people.

Two things we have been getting across the country, without ever knowing that it has been proven except from the experiments we have had in the United States. Now we hear it from our own people, in a small way, but it confirms what we have been hearing across the country. To that extent it has been a most valuable contribution that they have made here today.

I don't know that I can say anything more because it is not within our scope.

Senator Carter: I don't want to give the impression, Mr. Chairman, that I feel this is discontinued or should be discontinued. I have no feelings about it. This is purely a problem for the city and the provincial government.

The Chairman: Yes, but you realize, Senator Carter, you have always been a great advocate and supporter of those things I have mentioned.

Senator Carter: Yes.

The Chairman: As have other members of the committee. These things have come to us, and this is the first brief.

Senator Carter: My own regret is that this experiment was not set down for five years instead of two. Two is almost too short.

The Chairman: I think something will have to be done. In my view it can be too great a shock for these 109 people. You can't pull the rug out from under them just that way.

Perhaps the other was not a great shock when they came into it, when they were given personal attention, but to suddenly pull the rug out doesn't sound reasonable to me.

Senator Quart: May I just ask a question, please? I am very much impressed with your group and with the brief this afternoon too, and I can certainly feel that this has a report.

All right. Now let's say it has folded up. Have you any plans to get together as a group?

From the floor: Yes. Yes. Yes. We are meeting regularly.

Senator Quart: And you keep meeting? Please hang on. Something is bound to happen if you do. Some people are going to be very interested in that in the city or government, and if you let yourselves slide back you are not going to get anything. So keep together.

Senator McGrand: You have to have a project to work for.

Mrs. Burr: We have went to many people. We have had many people to our meetings, and Mr. Wass and Mr. Motherwell or Mr. Speaker have asked us to really stay together and it would be very disappointing to all these people if we don't. And this is what our chairman and vice-chairman or whatever you want to call him, they are all trying to do really hard, and there are letters whenever something comes up, or they phone and they will phone and pick you up and make sure you get there.

Senator Quart: Why don't you appeal to the service clubs?

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman and Senators, can you tell me how I can go about to get a lousy coffee pot on the regular welfare system? That is one giant step for mankind, to serve coffee to the clients, you know. This is in the CN Tower.

Senator Quart: I am sure you can get a coffee pot.

The Chairman: Well, a coffee pot is important.

Mr. Williams: I feel one of the greatest things and yet it is the saddest of it all: it is only a two-year project. If it was a five-year project it would come to the same type of day again and it would be this much further away because it takes time for staff to evaluate it and present it and get it edited in a manner that is acceptable to the people, as well as the government, and therefore possibly with good grace we are going to be the two years ahead instead of two years further behind.

The Chairman: That was the attitude that I had in mind.

I am closing now, you see there had to be an end some time. You knew it and everybody knew it, but the value that came as a result of two years of experimentation displays itself here today.

The understanding of what you have had, you can't tell what value that will bring within any reasonable time to yourselves and to others.

In this business, one has to make a contribution beyond himself. You have done that and you have been helpful. There cannot be any doubt as to what the future holds in store.

We don't know the answer ourselves. We are impressed with your committee. It expresses the view we had on behalf of this committee. We want to thank you for coming and explaining to us exactly how this experiment was carried on because we want to take very serious note of it.

Thank you very much.

The Chairman: We have a brief, Senators, from Edmonton and District Council of Churches. The president sitting beside me is Reverend Edward M. Checkland, and with him, Mr. David King, Researcher.

If you would like to proceed, sir?

Reverend Checkland, Chairman, Social Action: I would like to read certain selected portions from the brief which I think make the major point that the brief is designed to draw to your attention.

I would like to draw to your attention and the attention of this Committee to the paragraph at the bottom of the page:

We should like to draw to the attention of your Committee that even as ripped from their context, the words "The poor you have always with you" are a fundamental comment upon human nature and upon human society.

Concerning human society these words say that poverty is a function of civilization. Never in the history of mankind has any civilization been able to eliminate poverty. Poverty, indeed, has been the stone upon which every civilization has been built. The poor are always with us because civilization as men have created it requires that they be. No other conclusion can be drawn from human history as it has been lived on this planet.

Civilization has been built upon the backs of the poor. The classic examples of this are the slave, the serf and the coolie upon whose tortured muscles and tormented minds the glories of the past and even of the present were built. The wealth, power and comfort of the North Atlantic world are established upon the depressed conditions of people in Asia, Africa and Latin America.

And dropping down a few lines:

In short, poverty, in our world has become a function of development. And now as the pollution of our air, our water and our land, becomes the evident and inevitable consequence of our pursuit of development the visage of poverty is assuming a grimmer and grimmer aspect and is becoming more and more the face of the future.

To recognize that development has become the source of poverty in our world we have only to recall the comment made in the 1850's by an English visitor, Lord Carlisle, that it was the blessed good fortune of the United States that they had among them, as a class, no poor; and to note that the existence of the poor, as a class, in North America has become the central problem of our society.

A case in point in Canada is the fact that N.H.A. mortgages originally designed to help lower income persons have in fact benefited them but little since money for mortgages was subject in the market to the power of the highest bidders who, of course, could not be persons from the lower income brackets. To understand that through the destruction of nature development has become the source of poverty for all in our society we have only to read our daily newspapers. Our predicament was succinctly, though probably unconsciously, put in words on a roadside sign in the Banff National Park which describes that park as "A museum of nature."

The point to be taken from these comments is simple and direct; namely, that it is men who make other men poor. Poverty is neither the consequences of the Acts of God nor of the operations of a self-adjusting, automatic system. Poverty is the consequence of the acts of men operating their society.

The words "The poor you have always with you" have become, therefore, a comment, in the twentieth century as they were in the first, upon human nature.

Civilization and development are the work of men and the prevalence, persistence and extension of poverty is a fundamental comment on the kind of people we actually are in our civilized and developed world.

We create poverty for other men because we are moved and directed by a mind that has become impersonal and mechanistic, more concerned with maintaining and operating the system than with the effects of the system upon human beings.

Men are being made for the system and not the system for men. Much of the unrest in our society comes from the recognition of this fact and from the refusal to accept it any longer.

It would seem, for example, we are being told just this by the refusal of the native peoples of Canada, to embrace wholeheartedly the possibility of their being absorbed into the "white man's civilization". We have, it seems clear, become the kind of persons who in the name of development do such things to other people that perpetuate and extend the rule of poverty in the world.

Defining poverty as a problem becomes, then, a matter not merely of scrutinizing the structures of our society to discover their inequities but methods of removing or lessening them.

Fundamentally, it resolves itself into a willingness and capacity for self-examination and criticism individually and collectively to discover how, in private and societal relations, we are failing to be persons to one another and to those beyond our own Western culture. Poverty is a manifestation of that failure at home and abroad.

We need to examine our ways of life to discover where and how they place unequal burdens on the backs of the poor. For example, we have to become aware of the fact that the rate of return on investment, which is the fundamental factor governing the development of our cities and our natural resources, is not an adequate foundation for a human habitation.

This probably more than any other single factor contributes to showing that 30 per cent of our population below what the Economic Council of Canada and others have described as the "Poverty Line".

The attitude which dominates our society as reflected in our concern for the rate of return of investment shows itself in the administration of our social assistance and welfare programs. They are designed to prevent starvation and destitution rather than to provide the opportunity for a reasonable and responsible human life.

They are so designed because to our mind the only fully human beings are those economically productive. Consequently the elderly, the unemployed, the handicapped, the poorly educated, the emotionally impaired and the otherwise disadvantaged are given assistance but little position in our society.

For example, the established fact that retarded children are capable of showing affection to a degree considerably beyond that usually exhibited by the so-called normal person is given little consideration by us.

In less developed societies such persons are often regarded as the chosen of God. It is not unfair to say that they are regarded by us merely as misfits because they do not fit the productive mechanisms of our economic order. It is of little consequence to justify ourselves by pointing to what is done for those on the fringe of our society.

We have to face the fact that they are on the fringe of our society and to inquire what that says concerning us. We need to see and treat them as persons whose very disabilities provide for us the opportunity of being persons in ourselves in ways denied to us by the domination of economic interests over our society.

The fact is, moreover, that the majority of people in this world are on the fringe of human society. It is probably true to say that at the moment there are more people in the world living in misery than have ever lived here at any one time in human history.

During the sixties the poverty-affluence gap between the underdeveloped and developed nations became a truism. In that decade the gap was not closed but rather widened and largely because of the domination of investment over our minds.

To establish a human quality of life for those on the fringe in our world should become the basis of domestic and external policy for Canada. The world in the next thirty years will become an increasingly managed world. Under the growing domination of economic consideration vast new powers have arisen in the form of global companies whose interest is in investment opportunities rather than in the quality of human life.

At present these powers are not very amenable to control by any of the existing political and social structures of our world. Management of the world's resources as conceived by them is likely to emphasize exploitation and manipulation in the interests of investment with the benefits accruing to people being largely incidental to those interests.

The interests of people must become the concern of governments not only within their own borders but throughout the world. Democratic governments rest upon the consent of the governed and if they do not become the champions of the interests of the dispossessed at home and abroad they will lose their credibility for people.

Democratic governments must accept the responsibility of ensuring that human life is given an economic foundation that allows men and women to become free and responsible persons. An economic floor below which no person is allowed to fall must be established. But a floor is of little use if the sky is the limit for those whose main interest in life is in over-reaching their fellow men.

Consequently some kind of ceiling will need to be established to keep income differential within bounds. The unresolved problem of the industrial order has been income. The so-called wage-price spiral is evidence of this and witnesses to the disruptive effect of the lack of a ceiling which lack causes concern for the money and economic interests to be paramount among men in their anxiety to maintain their comparative positions in the economic scale.

Were we to be facetious we could suggest that the model for the future should be an elevator in which all travel together. Certainly, if we do not travel together, it is very probable that we will all go down together.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, we have not been concerned to define for you precisely the ills of our society which create poverty nor to recommend to you specific remedies for those ills.

For that you have available to you the advice of those whose expertise far exceeds ours in these matters. We have been concerned, rather, to raise for you, and for us all, the more fundamental question of the perspectives and values pursued in our society because we believe that something other than the logic of the attitudes expressed in our present aspirations and ambitions needs to be brought to bear upon the problems of our society.

Those problems need to be seen as functions of our present attitudes and it is our hope that we may have made a modest contribution to that end.

The Chairman: Would you like to express your view on the work ethic?

Rev. Checkland: You are referring I suppose to the protestant work ethic?

The Chairman: I gathered you were protestant, Reverend, yes.

Rev. Checkland: Well, let me reveal, very briefly and cursorily what I think is the history of that ethic. It starts, of course, because of the statement in St. Paul, in the New Testament, if a man will no work, let him not eat, and that has become pretty much a catchword in our society.

Under the impact of a certain form of protestantism, Calvinism, it became very powerful, and, as one of the great European sociologists of a couple of generations ago, pointed out in his protestant epic, "Spirit of capitalism", and to go back to what St. Paul said, what is not said in the New Testament, the writer of that particular letter did not need to draw he attention of his people to what they already knew, that the reason, the moral reason by which St. Paul was able to make that statement, if a man will not work, let him not eat, was that the church at that time accepted responsibility for providing work for a man, and if a man had no work or could not work, support was given to him out of the funds of the church.

But if he refused work in that very much simpler society than ours, he was regarded as being simply an exploiter of the bounty of the church.

However, in our society this is far different. As I am sure Members of the Committee realize, we now have a possibility at least where the work load as such can be reduced to a very small minimum of time and effort from that which it once demanded of man.

But I think we cannot simply pursue thinking in terms of the past at this point. That work equals good was certainly true when I was a teenager in Canadian society, but I think we do have a problem with this leisure, and it is the ability to accept full responsibility for ones own time which is not a low order of ability. It is a very high order of ability, and if we are going to rule out the work ethic or if it is being ruled out for us, then work as it has been conceived has to be translated into some form of constructive effort and the use of leisure time, and this will pose its own problems, but I do not think it is possible to move a society in that direction where it doesn't really grapple with the kind of problems, with the existing aspirations, ambitions. What I have called in this submission the logic of our present mind set has been pretty radically changed. It will not be enough simply to allow leisure to come upon us if we have not been prepared to see it as an opportunity which overrides economic considerations in our society for the development of human beings.

But if we allow economic considerations—which is the other side of the word ethic—if we allow investment to dominate our programs and policies, then we will buttress that by falling back upon the work ethic.

Senator Carter: You blamed it on St. Paul, but I thought it went back to the Garden of Eden.

Senator Quart: I suppose you are trying to blame it on the women now?

Rev. Checkland: I don't know what it is precisely you are referring to?

Senator Carter: Wasn't there Christ's pronouncement, "By the sweat of his brow"? He had to earn his bread.

Rev. Checkland: There is a clear distinction in the Bible between work as constructive effort and toil as unrewarding and unremitting effort.

Now, the early Calvinists, and St. Paul, thought of work as something quite constructive, and so long as men had a fair degree of control over their condition of work, and so long as craftsmanship was the dominant expression of work, it was constructive.

But it seems to me this problem, for example, that Karl Marx raises for Western society—I think he raised the right question. His answer is an entirely different matter.

But in that situation something changed overnight but our attitudes towards work did not change overnight and we are very often reinforced by going back to the past, using the Scripture as a logistic way of reinforcing those attitudes.

This is, I say, how the work ethic developed and got us in our bind right now.

Senator Carter: What does your Action Group do?

Rev. Checkland: We are largely involved in engineering community techniques, involved in the matters of social action and do not run social action projects as such.

We haven't funds for that, nor have we got personnel. But it is an attempt to keep denominations who are members of this Council in contact with public issues.

Senator Carter: How wide is your Council? Is it confined to Edmonton or to the province?

Rev. Checkland: No, it is not the province. The district refers to the immediately contiguous community, like Sherwood Park, St. Albert, LeDuc. Other than that it is the Metropolitan area of Edmonton.

Senator Carter: How many denominations do you have?

Mr. King, Researcher: Nine members, three affiliates, including the Roman Catholic Church and Greek Orthodox.

Senator Carter: They are all Christian denominations?

Mr. King: They belong not as individual congregations, but as denominations.

Senator Carter: As denominations they extend beyond the province?

Rev. Checkland: No. The membership of the Council is the Church court of the denomination in this area. For example, the Presbytery of the United Church; the Synod of the Anglican Church. I have forgotten what the parallel body for the Roman Catholic Church is, but it is the Church court for this area that are members of the Council of Churches.

Mr. King: Local level of the United Church belongs, but neither the Conference which encompasses the whole province nor General Council which is a national body belong to the local Council.

Senator Carter: How do they carry out their function? How do they extend your ideas? What do they do?

Rev. Checkland: I am not sure I follow precisely what you are getting at.

Senator Carter: You said you do not undertake any specific projects as a Social Action Council, but the members do.

Rev. Checkland: We don't undertake any social welfare.

Senator Carter: No. No. I am trying to get at what is Social Action. Just what are you trying to do?

Rev. Checkland: We have been involved in public issues in the city, civic elections, provincial election. We have also been involved in what is known as the coalition for development, which was set up as a result of the Canadian Conference on Poverty through the Canadian Council of Churches. We have been the local arm and have endeavoured to set this up here.

What that meant is not so much specific social welfare projects as an attempt to involve churches and their congregations in studying the area, where they are, an area of the city where they are, finding out what their problems are, what resources can the church help bring to bear on those problems.

Senator Carter: You are a pretty influential group, and you are here with this project, the Special Project?

Rev. Checkland: Yes.

Senator Carter: So you are aware of this, and if you were here earlier you notice the concern of these people that this project seemed to have terminated quite abruptly, and they are wondering what is going to happen.

Have you taken any action? Have you thrown your weight behind this project?

Rev. Checkland: We have not been directly involved in this project.

Senator Carter: But you realize it was a good thing?

Rev. Checkland: Yes.

Senator Carter: You know what it has done and you would like to see it continued?

Rev. Checkland: Yes.

Senator Carter: Could you put that on your agenda to do something about it?

Rev. Checkland: Well, it is something to which we would need to be invited. We can't thrust ourselves on a project. That is not our design. It is not something we can do ourselves. That is something we have to be invited to do.

Senator Carter: Well, to my simple mind it would be a very good social action if you could impress upon government or city hall, whoever is mixed up in this, that this is something that just should not evaporate in thin air. It is something worthwhile pursuing until it gets momentum.

Mr. King: At the risk of incurring my boss' wrath, I would be on your side. We have done this thing before.

So far as I myself am concerned I must confess I did not know the Special Project was going to end, and if I had been aware of that I might well have suggested that pressure should be brought to bear.

I don't know how influential we actually are, but we have been to see government ministers before and we probably will be seeing them again, and this would be as worthy a cause as any.

Rev. Checkland: In this case he should have known because he is research director.

Senator Carter: Coming back to the churches, you put a lot of wisdom in this, and when you boil it down, what you have said, it is that we have become governed by materialism.

Rev. Checkland: Broad form of materialism. Not materialism in the general concept but a particular form which expresses itself through investment.

Senator Carter: Well, I think if you analyse it you will find that is just one manifestation of it, but the roots of it are in other forms as well, because you think about return of investment and you go back to somebody's concept of greed.

Rev. Checkland: Right.

Senator Carter: And that is materialism too.

Rev. Checkland: Yes, I would agree entirely with you there.

Senator Carter: You can't separate materialism out into little compartments.

Rev. Checkland: But one of the points we perhaps did not make as clear as we might have: what we were concerned in this brief largely is reflected in the quote, the comment, made by Lord Carlisle where he said of the United States it was so blessed with good fortune that they did not have any poor as a class. As a class. He didn't say they did not have poor people, but the significant fact is in society it didn't have a class of poor.

We have got it and it is increasing, and that is what we meant by saying investment. It is the working of the investment policy. It is not that the people who invest and were directing investment policies and that sort of thing were necessarily ogres in themselves, but the system works this way to create a class of poor, and that requires, we feel, a kind of radical re-thinking.

Senator Carter: Are you saying the fault is in the system and not in the man who operates the system?

Rev. Checkland: No, I am not saying that. I am saying the reason we have a class of poor, the man may be poor by his own single action, or there may be individual poor. But it seems to me that that is not the problem North America society faces today.

Senator Carter: I think it is quite true what you have said, that poverty has become a function of development and more technology, fewer jobs, more people out of work and more poverty. But it does not have to be that way.

The system we have can be operated in a much better way, don't you think? It is the person who operates the system that we have got to look at.

Rev. Checkland: I would have to ask you what you understand "system" to be. We have referred in the brief to the fact of emergence of a new set of power in our society.

Senator McGrand: They are not new.

Rev. Checkland: I am not an expert, as anyone can observe. They escaped the control of national government.

Senator McGrand: They are not new.

Rev. Checkland: Yes, they are new I think in the fact the anti-trust laws of the United States do not apply to conglomerates so far as they can discover yet because the trust laws were designed for a situation where it was a vertical economic organization and not a horizontal one.

What I think we have, and some of the major economists like Galbraith and a few others are saying, is a new series of world power which are not very amenable to political influence.

Senator Carter: If your Social Action is going to come to grips with this situation you have got to transform society. That is what the Church was organized to do, wasn't it? That is really the function of the Church?

Rev. Checkland: Now you are getting into a theological discussion. I don't know whether you want to pursue it.

The Chairman: I advise you that he is very capable. We are all listening.

Rev. Checkland: I would say the life of the church has some change on society, but when the church got to the point where it became a power of society by the patronage of one of the emperors, Constantine, I think I would agree with the great German historian that that was the fault of the church.

Senator Carter: Oh, well...

Rev. Checkland: Now I warned you that we were getting into a theological argument.

Senator Carter: That is just the history you are talking.

Rev. Checkland: But it is also theology.

Senator Quart: Get back to the poor.

Senator Carter: If we are ever going to lick this problem of poverty, we have got to have better attitudes in the public. There has got to be some sort of transformation in society and in the public mind and in public attitude, and that is one of the functions of the church.

Rev. Checkland: Yes, I would agree with that.

Senator Carter: Yes.

Rev. Checkland: But I warned you or what I would draw to your attention, this is by no means a unanimous opinion of approach.

Those of us who think this way in the church have a battle to fight in church. There are many people in the church who think that the church ought not to be concerned with some of the things we have dealt with in this brief. I do not agree with them.

Senator Carter: Can you transform society without transforming the individual that makes up society? Where do you start?

Rev. Checkland: I don't think it is "either/or" question. It is almost like the chicken and the egg. People live in society. They are born by the society. Looking at the problem in the theological way, the reason the church has the doctrine of original sin, it is not that the sin originates with me, but it is there when I originate.

I am born into it. I am born into the world that is like that, so you have to work at it from both ends, the church has very often failed to work at it from both ends.

Senator Carter: I am trying to relate it to your Social Action project.

Rev. Checkland: We try to be—I am not quite sure I am grasping what you are getting at.

The Chairman: He is grasping at your statement that people in the church, people that go to the church, part of the church, are not concerned with the poor.

Rev. Checkland: Well now I think I would correct that slightly. It is not that they are not concerned with the poor as individual persons as those lives happen to impinge upon theirs. It is that many of them withdraw from the consideration of the social implications of the poor existing as a class.

What creates this class? Many of the people in the church withdraw from them. I am not telling any secrets out of school when I say that.

Mr. King: There are some people in the church who believe in a doctrine of individual conversion, and that when a person's soul has been saved by conversion to Christianity, that that is the issue of prime importance, and that their existence here and life is secondary to the salvation of their soul, and that having saved their soul you don't need to worry about their individual—I mean worry particularly about their individual position in society or about the relationship of other people in a similar position.

That the soul is the important thing, and that what the church should concern itself with, and having concerned itself with the soul of the individual, it need not concern itself with the physical position of the individual.

Senator Pearson: Then why worry about investment people? Let them go ahead and drown themselves and save the soul of the other people.

Mr. King: What I was expressing was the opinion of some people and some churches, but I would not say it was my own.

Rev. Checkland: In fact I would describe that attitude as an opinion.

Senator Quart: You mean the ministers in various churches or just parishioners?

Mr. King: Some ministers and some congregation.

Senator Quart: I would think they would not be majority?

Mr. King: In certain small groups that is the doctrine of the church. That is a generalization of it.

Rev. Checkland: Denominations are being cut across by this very issue right now. There is no denomination in which this is not a very powerful issue either under the surface or coming up to the surface.

The question of what stand the church will take or if it should take any stand on what many people regard as purely social and political problems is a fundamental decision within the church today.

Senator Carter: What is your own personal idea on what the function of the church is, assuming we have one?

Rev. Checkland: The function of the church is to bring—I have to use religious language now; I cannot use any other—is to bring life individually and corporately under the scrutiny of the word of God as given to us through the Bible. Very briefly that is the function of the church.

That does not mean that is not to be taken too narrowly in the sense that all we do is worship God in a particular way. Worship has to be expressed through specific acts of service individually and corporately.

Senator Carter: What you are saying is we should live by the moral law?

Rev. Checkland: We should, yes, but the church rests upon the fact that we do not or we would not have a church if we did.

Senator Quart: I wouldn't be necessary to have a church.

Senator Carter: I can't say that. The first church they ever had was born of the moral law.

Rev. Checkland: This is the difference in Christian perspective, and I have to speak now through this perspective. This is the problem St. Paul had.

What he law could not do, and it was weak through the flesh and he was talking about the law when he said the strength of sin is the law. It is not just a question of moral law. You have led me far astray from what we started out with. It is a matter of recognizing that we do not live by the moral law.

Senator Carter: St. Paul did He didn't at the beginning, but he was converted. He didn't when he was Saul and he later became Paul.

Mr. King: You mean he always attempted to?

Senator Carter: He always tried, but there was a transformation in him. He was a different person. He became a different person.

Rev. Checkland: That is true. That does not mean...

Senator Carter: He committed sin, sure, yes. He didn't become God. Nobody is going to become God, but he was changed.

Rev. Checkland: Yes.

Senator Carter: And he had a different outlook on life and he had a different quality of life. Isn't that what the church is supposed to say to individuals that belong to the church?

Rev. Checkland: Yes, but what that means is an expression of that quality of life in terms of concern and commitment to people outside the church and society.

Senator Carter: It has got to happen inside first. Something has got to happen inside before you can express it outside.

Rev. Checkland: Not necessarily.

Senator Carter: How can you...

Rev. Checkland: Let me give you an illustration. Henry George XX once said I love the people and therefore come to love God. Cardinal Manning put it the other way around, "I love God and therefore came to love the people." But you see there are two poles to this. The kind of problem that James foisted on the church when he said, "You say you have faith without works? Show me your faith without works. I will show you my faith by my works."

Senator Carter: These two poles you are talking about, aren't they both sides of the same coin?

Rev. Checkland: Yes, they are. That is one way of putting it.

Senator Carter: You can't separate them. They are inseparable.

Rev. Checkland: Yes. We would agree with that.

The Chairman: Now, have you both agreed that is the end of the argument?

Senator Pearson: I just wanted to say before one of our colleagues said if this lasted much longer they wouldn't have to go to church on Sunday.

The Chairman: When people who read our record take a look, I wonder if the thought will come to them that we are better at philosophy than poverty.

Thank you very much for your contribution and thank you for coming her. Your answer with respect to the work ethic is very important. You no doubt appreciate our problem. The discussion that took place was enlightening. Your view will be very helpful to us. Thank you.

The committee adjourned.

Special Senate Committee

APPENDIX "A"

BRIEF

To the

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

Submitted by

The City of Edmonton Social Service Department
6th Floor, C.N. Tower, Edmonton

Presented by

His Worship Mayor Ivor Dent D. K. Wass,
Superintendent, Social Service Department D.
R. Milne, Social Service Planning Director
Social Service Department

Prepared by

D. R. Milne and D. K. Wass

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That the Senate Committee on Poverty recommend support in principle of integrated, community based social services which provide access to a wide variety of public and private services on a local basis.

2. That the Senate Committee on Poverty stress the importance of flexible, imaginative preventive and remedial services which are developmental and supportive to individuals and families.

3. That the Senate Committee on Poverty commend the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan that provide federal cost sharing for locally based social services; and that the Committee urge the inclusion of broad preventive programs presently excluded by the requirement of problem definition.

4. That integrated planning centres for social services be established at the level closest to the consumers of services and involving participation of consumers of services.

5. That federal and provincial social service planning provide for constant communication with and involvement of planning centres at the municipal or regional level directly providing service.

I. INTRODUCTION:

1. The main focus of this submission is two fold: first to emphasize the need for reorganization and coordination of social services to citizens, with particular emphasis on effectively serving low income families or the poor; secondly, to outline attempts to provide flexible, innovative family support services that include a high level of client and volunteer citizen participation.

2. The assumption is made that other submissions, particularly those from client groups, will adequately reflect that poverty is a concern in Edmonton, just as it is in other cities. Despite the fact that Edmonton has gone through a period of rapid growth, that has contributed to a high level of employment, there are still many families and individuals who are not in the economic mainstream, and who experience poverty and all its' consequences.

3. Some of the major factors related to the poverty problems in Edmonton are: the influx of Indian and Metis families seeking a better life, but ill prepared educationally and socially for urban life; the high cost of housing which presents particular problems for the poor, and takes too great a proportion of their income; the seasonal nature of some areas of work, leaving many workers unemployed during winter months; the lower level of education and training of many citizens, that limits their ability to find employment in an increasingly technical job market.

4. The answer to these problems obviously require sound policies derived from economic, educational, and social planning. However, neither time or ability permit commentary on such a wide scope, so the decision was made to focus on the issues outlined in the first paragraph.

II. HUMAN RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT PLANNING IN EDMONTON

5. In 1967 a small task force was established by the Mayor to study human resource development in Edmonton. This led to the publication of a report "Developing Edmonton's Human Resources" which is appended to this submission. The report emphasizes the need to adopt a more comprehensive approach to the provision of social services in our communities. It decried the array of uncoordinated services from all levels of government and the private sector, that fragmented the family, and frequently failed to meet need, and effectively serve the citizens most in need of services.

6. The report envisaged the establishment of a corporation to deliver a wide range of services at the community level. Hopefully the corporation would receive funds from all sources public and private and provide the following functions: the provision of a wide range of family centered programs; the effective coordination of services; evaluation of programs; examination of gaps in services; the provision of leadership, particularly in poverty areas to develop maximum involvement of residents in self help and decision making.

7. The Board of Directors of the Corporation was to include representatives from the City, the Provincial and Federal Governments, the School Boards, and the private social welfare sector. An inter-disciplinary professional team would be established to provide service in sectors of the City.

8. The report was accepted by City Council with recommendation that follow-up detailed planning be undertaken. An inter-governmental advisory committee of elected representatives under the chairmanship of the Mayor was established. Also a task force was appointed under the chairmanship of the Chief Commissioner with representatives from all levels of government, the school boards, and the private sector. These groups have been meeting in an effort to obtain a high degree of involvement and to move the concept forward.

9. The Advisory Committee commissioned a four month study which is presently being undertaken by "Leisure Consultants" a human resource consultant firm to outline details related to a possible pilot project in a specific area of the City. An area of the City containing approximately 40,000 people has been selected and the final report for the consultants is expected in September. The anticipation is that this report will lead to a three year trial of a flexible, comprehensive, coordinated, service centre integrating many services presently provided by a wide range of public and private services.

10. The hope is that this pilot project will prove effective in meeting the social service needs of our citizens and provide a model for implementation on a city wide basis. Our experience may well be of interest to other cities in the country. The support of the Special Senate Committee on poverty for this concept is solicited.

III. DEVELOPMENTS WITHIN THE SOCIAL SERVICE DEPARTMENT.

11. The agreement made by the City of Edmonton to participate in the Preventive Social Service program with the Government of Alberta under the provisions of the imaginative Preventive Social Service Act in 1966 has created an important new dimension in service. Under this Act the province will share up to 80 per cent of costs of services accepted by the Minister of Social Development as preventive in nature.

12. The key elements in this preventive program are local determination (municipality based) and universality (preventive programmes are not focussed on casualty, rehabilitative services on specific population groups.)

13. The municipality is empowered to operate or to purchase services.

14. General guidance is afforded programme development through the Social Service Advisory Committee, established by city bylaw. Committee representation includes representatives of the United Community Fund, Social Planning Council and City Council, specialists in the fields of health, education and recreation and citizens at large.

15. Preventive service development has led to the establishment of a planning unit in the Social Service Department, a new dimension in the municipal planning field. This, in turn has led to effective relationships with physical planning personnel in the municipal service, particularly in respect to urban renewal and public housing developments. Municipalities have had planning departments for many years but until recently scant attention was devoted to the social implications of their work. Co-operative relationships have been established with other public and private service delivery planning groups (city, provincial and federal government departments, Social Planning Council and United Community Fund.) The planning unit has developed several reports detailing service arrangements in the community (services to the elderly, housing needs of low income families, services to persons with drug problems, self-help groups). The department has co-operated with the Canadian Welfare Council in conducting studies on the housing needs of public assistance recipients and the employability study of persons in receipt of assistance.

16. Preventive funding has enabled the establishment of much needed services and the augmentation of others. The following summarizes developments:

(A) Day Care: Day care, an important preventive service enabling mothers in sole support low income situations to obtain high quality care for their children while they work, convalesce or secure vital release from stressful situations, has been a principal focus. Substantial support was extended to the existing non-profit day care agency. Two additional non-profit centres are now being supported with a third due to commence in October 1970. Two of these utilize existing community facilities (churches) modified for the purpose. The first publicly operated day care centre was opened in 1969, the Glengarry Day Care Centre, which serves as a centre for public education, research and staff development for all day care centres. The number of non-profit day care centre pre-school placements now numbers 228.

17. Under the Director of Day Care educational opportunities for day care staff involving a two year certificate program have been established in co-operation with the Extension Department of the University of Alberta. The effect of this has been to improve operational standards in all day care centres (public, non-profit and commercially operated), and to provide upgrading for staff members.

18. Day Care is an important service to persons in poverty in that (a) it permits sole-support mothers to re-enter the work stream improving their economic status and producing important psychological benefits, (b) it permits essential employment of mothers who must work to supplement family income (c) it provides significant benefits for the children exposed to trained child care staff in well-equipped centres who assist children to develop adequate relationships with others, to understand and cope with the community at large, to develop creative and manipulative skills and to become accustomed to schedules, routines and group functioning, significant in relations to preparation for school.

19. A family day care placement program has been developed to provide care for children under three years of age. In May 1970 forty five children were cared for in 29 homes, each of which was assessed prior to placement.

20. The demand for day care services continues to exceed available facilities. Consequently all non-profit and public centres have given priority to families most in need, determined by a social assessment. Fees are scaled according to income. Maximum costs subsidized are $4.25 per day with substantial numbers of families paying token contributions.

21. Several centres offer care programmes for school age children on a part-day basis.

(B) Family Support Services.

22. (i) The Family Life Education Council of Edmonton is a private agency offering program to groups of citizens, institutions and services on any aspect of family life. The program is almost entirely supported by preventive funds. The Council has made special efforts to reach families in low income situations, single parent families and special problem situations (illustrative is the series of sessions on family life conducted at the Fort Saskatchewan Goal). Emphasis is on group programmes specifically related to the needs and interests of persons involved.

23. (ii) Emergency Homemaker Service: substantial support has been extended to the Family Service Association to permit expansion of emergency homemaker service. Qualified homemakers are available on a nine hour and twenty four hour basis to assist families through periods of crisis due to absence of the mother arising from illness, desertion, or death. The service is made available on a fee scale geared to income, generally on a short-term basis until adequate alternative arrangements can be made by the family.

24. (iii) Family Aide Service: Department operated, this service provides experienced, practical family aides who will enter a home and work with the homemaker to upgrade family and household operations including budgeting, money planning, purchasing, child care, home management and the like.

25. The heavy involvement of family aides with one parent families led to the establishment of a number of group programs for mothers on their own with children, conducted mainly in church facilities in various areas of the city. Through these groups, socially isolated and alienated persons have been enabled to build friendships, social contacts and have shared methods of coping with their special needs. In recent weeks the employment of a member of one of the first groups formed as a part-time family aide has taken place. This was a long-term objective for this program.

26. Family aides work on a team basis with a referring social worker on a team basis. The service is available to community agencies without charge.

27. The experience of the department indicates that this is a most useful service in improving the ability of low income families to organize their resources and manage their financial affairs and household operations effectively. The team-work approach involving the social worker and family aide in a mutually supplemental role has produced worthwhile results.

(C) Other Community Services:

28. (i) Welfare Information Service: A community information and referral service operated 24 hours daily, under the Social Planning Council and funded jointly with the United Community Fund.

29. (ii) Volunteer Placement: Preventive Social Service funds supplement the funding of this central volunteer recruitment, training and placement services providing volunteers to a wide variety of community agencies including welfare, recreation and health services.

30. (iii) Community Psychiatric Service: Preventive services funds a significant proportion of the costs of this diagnostic and assessment service operated by the Edmonton Board of Health and including psychiatrists and psychologist clinical staff. The consultative service is available to accredited community counselling personnel including schools, welfare agencies, family agencies, medical and health personnel, clergymen and youth workers. A complete range of testing is available to clientele on referral, including aptitude and vocational testing.

31. (iv) Readiness Centre: A neighbourhood based community project operated in the north central area adjacent to the city centre by the Junior League, National Council of Jewish Women and University of Alberta utilizing preventive social service funding support. A school readiness program for twenty five four year olds and twenty five five year olds operates five days weekly on a half-day basis. Selection of children was based on need, assessed by home visits to all homes with children of the appropriate age in the area.

32. Readiness centre is a neighbourhood house providing program activities to adults and children of the area. Parent education and creative recreational activities are sponsored. The house is run by a board strongly representative of residents of the area, a transitional area housing persons of a wide variety of ethnic origins, many low income families and recipients of welfare.

33. (v) Means-on-Wheels: operated by the V.O.N. with preventive funding support, the service provides a hot meal delivered daily Monday through Friday to homebound persons either unable to prepare meals for themselves or without adequate meal preparation assistance or facilities.

34. (vi) Community Counselling Service: The long term planning for the department calls for decentralization of services into seven area offices. Two such area centres now existing: Jasper Place and Glengarry Community Service Centre.

35. The Jasper Place office is located adjoining the area health clinic operated by the Board of Health.

36. The Glengarry Community Services Centre consists of the area recreation centre for the City Parks and Recreation Department, The Glengarry Day Care Centre (city owned and operated) and a departmental staff unit.

37. Intent of the decentralization is to render more effective preventive and statutory services by making services readily accessible to citizens, developing relationships with community resources including professional personnel, institutions (schools, churches, community leagues), and services (health clinics, recreation programs), and developing citizen involvements in service delivery.

38. The Glengarry Centre was designed to respond flexibly to the needs of the community. It has developed a variety approach that shows promise. The centre has been operative for only a year. Consequently significant evaluation is not yet available.

Program Services Include:

(a) Family life Education—conducted with the resources of the Family Life Education Council and Home Economics Branch, Department of Agriculture.

(b) Employment Placement: a staff member and two volunteers actively seek jobs for persons with whom the centre is in contact. Heavy emphasis is placed on securing jobs related to skills and interests of clients and on follow-ups with employers.

(c) Youth Services: (1) Phyltorz—a recreational/service youth group comprised of young people who have had contact with probation services. (2) Couth Youth—Teenagers, some of whom have been involved with drugs. (3) Informal Drop-In Counselling with teenagers after school at the centre. (4) The cooperation of the Alberta Service Corps has been enlisted in providing volunteers to work with youth groups and alienated youth in the area. (5) Teen Drop In Centre on a large scale basis in a High School in the area. (6) Probation Service: Juvenile probation services are provided from the centre.

(d) Public Assistance: Short term assistance for employable unemployed is made available through the centre. Two churches are used as outreach centres for this purpose and applicants may be seen there at scheduled times.

Group programmes for recipients have been held involving social work, family aide and home economics resources. A family aide (teaching homemaker) is assigned to the centre and does individual home visits as required and assists with group programming.

(e) Volunteer Services: Extensive use of community and university student volunteers in group programmes and on a case basis, particularly with probation cases. Use of volunteers who are themselves on adult probation as counsellors for juveniles has shown some promise as an effective means of communicating with selected young people.

(f) Community Resource Usage: Substantial effort has been made to work closely with area resources—school principals and counsellors, public health nurses, recreation staff and clergy. Group programmes for mothers raising families on their own have been developed using church facilities and church volunteers. (g) Day Care Services: Family Day Care placements, regular preschool day care and before and after school supervision are available through the day care section.

(h) Special Services: Drug seminars have been held under centre auspices. Substantial use is made of portable videotaping equipment in selected situations.

(i) Preventive Counselling: Short term family and individual counselling is available at the centre, with longer term cases being referred where possible to appropriate agencies. Stress has been placed on the usage of all types of community resources including agency services available in the community at large and community groups in the area.

39. The Glengarry programme is a tentative prototype of the approach it is hoped can be developed in other decentralized units.

SOCIAL ASSISTANCE:

40. The provision of financial assistance and rehabilitative services is the subject of another brief that is being submitted by staff members of this Department. Otherwise we would have been remiss in not emphasizing the central role of an adequate financial assistance program to the whole question of social services. Unless peoples basic needs are met, and met in a manner that permits preservation of dignity and self worth, other social services may be of little avail.

41. The municipal role in financial assistance programs has been reducing with greater responsibility accepted by the senior levels of governments. This seems to be a commendable trend and in line with the eventual evolution of some form of guaranteed annual income. However the municipality should retain the authority and flexibility to supplement basic income figures in order to provide incentives for rehabilitation and upgrading. To that extent we would disagree with the advocates of a total separation of the administration of financial assistance from supportive social services.

CONCLUSION:

42. We would like to express to the members of the Senate Commission on Poverty our appreciation for this opportunity to present some views and recommendations. We will follow your deliberation with interest and anticipate a report and influence that will be widespread and greatly assist disadvantaged Canadians.

APPENDIX "B"

Gentlemen:

The Monica Society of Edmonton, a group of approximately 350 widows, separated and divorced women, welcome this opportunity to put before your Committee their views on the important subject of poverty in Canada today.

This is a matter that vitally affects our members' welfare. We as a group would like to rise up against an economic and social system that makes poverty a by-product of growth.

In the societies of plenty, poverty is not measured merely by the revenues at one's disposal and the standard of living one enjoys... Is not the poor man, or in our case, the woman, who does not count, who is never listened to, who is put here or there without being asked her opinion, and who sinks into an isolation so painful that she may resort to irreparable deeds of despair?

THIS IS POVERTY—Social-psychological-cultural resulting in irreparable needs of despair causing economic poverty.

POVERTY as it exists in the lives of the Monicas can be described in the following manner:

(1) LONELINESS

Being unable to SHARE—(a) LOVE—(b) RESPONSIBILITY—(c) EXPERIENCES. The absence of LOVE is very difficult to bear. It results in a self-rejection, a withdrawal from society—depression and despair. It is difficult not to be able to share responsibility, be it financial, child care, the home, the garden. It is sad not to be able to share experiences, pleasant or unpleasant. The thrill and pride of a child's accomplishments loses half its effect if experienced alone. A thunder storm is much more difficult to experience all alone... a little thing, but meaningful.

When a mother withdraws from society and spends her days and nights alone with her children, she is deprived of adult conversation, opinions and experiences. Her personality is liable to become warped and stunted, lacking growth.

(2) REJECTION BY SOCIETY

We are all very sensitive to rejection, because a good many of us have already experienced one major rejection in our lives. In social functions with mixed couples we feel like a "fifth wheel". Landlords reject us as unsuitable tenants. We are insecure credit risks and we don't have any stability. Social Assistance recipients are subject to discrimination when purchasing school supplies by being required to line up in Department Stores in a special lineup marked "Welfare". Some Oil Companies and Department Stores have a policy not even to investigate the credit rating of separated women. Discrimination without investigation! Children are rejected by parents of other children as being from a "Broken Home".

(3) VOID IN THE HOME

The void that exists in the home by the absence of the husband and father is very difficult to tolerate. The children do not have the father "image" and companionship. These children are the adults of tomorrow—the husbands and fathers, wives and mothers of the next generation of Canadians... Do they know the proper roll of the male adult? Do the boys know what is expected of a husband and father? Do the girls know what to look for in a husband? They have not been witnesses to a true family atmosphere... so how do they know what is expected of them. Mother may be the most wonderful mother in the world—but she can never be both a mother and a father.

(4) INADEQUATE SYSTEM OF LEGAL AID

An insecurity exists due to the complex system of administration of family law which relates to the basic social unit comprising husband, wife and children. At the present time, problems relating to one specific family may be dealt with at the same time or at different times by several different courts. We become confused and are unable to have all our family law problems dealt with at one time or by one court in a reasonable and comprehensive fashion. Decisions are made by different courts without consideration of actions being taken by other courts resulting in conflicting decisions with no results being effective.

RECOMMENDATIONS that suggest solutions for the poverty problems as previously outlined are submitted for your consideration:

(1) LONELINESS—Recommendations...

The personal growth of the individual is of prime importance. Professional counselling must be more freely available, and encouraged. Personal Development Programs must be at their disposal, and educational and recreational opportunities must be provided and encouraged. The opportunity to attend these functions must be available, such as additional money for baby-sitters or more adequate and reasonable Day Care Centres which are also urgently needed for the working mother who is attempting to be self-sufficient.

Presently, a mother on Social Assistance is permitted to earn not more than $25.00 per month, or the additional money is deducted from her allowance. We agree that a limit must be stipulated, but for a mother with six or seven children, $25.00 additional does not go very far. Her desire for achievement is thwarted, her contact with people is limited, her ability to keep contact with the business world is eliminated, thus making it much more difficult for her to return to business when her responsibilities no longer require her to remain at home, and she could be self-supporting. THIS ADDITIONAL EARNING STIPULATION must be changed. We MUST help and encourage the individual out of the depths of despair.

(2) REJECTION BY SOCIETY—Recommendations...

Society must be made aware of the individual and a sincere Christian acceptance must be extended by the community, the agencies, and the governing bodies. Discrimination must be eliminated! Oil Companies, Department Stores, in fact all businesses should be forced to investigate under normal circumstances, rather than a policy of discrimination without investigation. Landlords also reject without investigation, and an impossible situation exists for the Mother who is head of the family when applying for rental privileges.

Property taxes—During the difficult years of raising a young family, recovering from the shock that the world has fallen apart, struggling to make ends meet on a woman's salary, couldn't her taxes be re-assessed—must she also contribute through her taxes, to welfare—when she herself is trying so hard NOT to become a recipient.

Income Tax—The recipients of separation allowances or alimony, must pay income tax on the monies received, while the payee is allowed to deduct the amount from his taxable income. In many cases the party raising the family is having a difficult struggle making ends meet and paying tax on this income could be the straw that breaks the camel's back.

Income Tax—Some consideration should be given to families who are trying to get back on their feet after years of struggling. Is there any possibility that the years when the personal exemptions far outweighed the net income, could now offset the years when the net income outweighs the personal exemptions. The children having grown, may no longer be exemptions, yet still remain at home... in a home that is now very probably in need of repairs and renovating. This money could be used for these tasks. We want to be self-supporting... help us to help ourselves!

Society must be more aware of the needs of the children. They should not be rejected because they are from a broken home. They should be encouraged in their neighborhood to come into the homes—to participate in family outings, in order that they may witness a NORMAL family atmosphere.

Please—help the Mothers who are heads of families to obtain a DIGNITY ABOVE REPROACH.

(3) VOID IN THE HOME—Recommendations...

Mother must acquire a fulfillment and satisfaction within herself so that she can extend unconditional love to her children, and be able to receive love in return. She must be able to create a good healthy image of manhood and a respect for the absent father.

The Monica Society strongly endorses a program presently in operation in Edmonton called the "Uncles at Large" program. This is similar to "Big Brother" program in operation in other cities. The "Uncles at Large" is a project sponsored by The Canadian Progress Club in cooperation with Family Service Association of Edmonton. Uncles at Large is based on the needs of the boy from a single parent family... the need for a relationship with a mature man... the need for recognition and reassurance... the need for relationship with someone who knows and understands what it means to be a boy. They attempt to provide companionship recognizing the gap left for a boy through the absence of his father. Needless to say, we... the mothers of fatherless boys... cannot express adequately the value of such a program. Uncles at Large is sponsored by The Canadian Progress Club and financially supported by them. Family Service Association, a private, voluntary and non-sectarian family service agency, is responsible for the screening, training and assignment of Uncles, and provides the counselling service required to make this program effective.

Needless to say, this program is limited due to the financial assistance required. Thousands of boys in our city could take advantage of this program, if it were available. Family Service Association and the Canadian Progress Club are doing a commendable job, but they are also aware of their restrictions.

The possibility of providing this service to our girls is presently beyond comprehension, but we, the mothers, can see a great value in the provision of this service sometime in the future.

(4) INADEQUATE SYSTEM OF LEGAL AID—Recommendations...

The Monica Society feels that an insecurity exists due to the inadequate system of administration of family law. Further investigation discloses that those experienced in the field of needy litigant rules and study of legal aid in civil matters recognize that in the majority of cases where legal aid is required the basis of the problem is a dispute between husband and wife and often involves children. They claim that institutional and procedural reforms are urgently required to improve judicial administration in the field of family law which will be significant in achieving an adequate system of legal aid. An article carried in the Canadian Bar Journal, October 1967, titled "Family Courts, A Plan for Alberta" by Stuart S. Purvis, Q.C. outlines and defines the required changes. This plan has been referred to the Institute of Law Research and Reform, Province of Alberta, where it is now being considered. The Monica Society endorses this plan, not only for Alberta, but for all Provinces in Canada.

Briefly, the recommendations for consideration for a new plan of family court are as follows:

1. It is recommended that a Family Court be established as a division of the Supreme Court of Alberta to have, hold and exercise jurisdiction in relation to all aspects of family law. A specialized judge or judges should be appointed to preside in the family court division. The judges will require to be appointed by the Governor General pursuant to the provisions of Section 96 of the British North America Act. However, while the appointment of the Judges is a federal matter, the establishment of the court as an institution is clearly within the Provincial jurisdiction.

2. The solution of disputes involving matters of family law cannot be achieved fully by the application of legal sanctions under the adversary system. The legal process must be augmented by assistance from other professions in the fields of behavioural science and medicine. For this reason, it is recommended that a Department of Court Services be created to operate within and under the control of the new family court division, to assist the court in the administration of justice in the field of family law. Consideration should be given to inclusion of the following services:

- (a) Investigating services;
- (b) Probation staff;
- (c) Referees;
- (d) Counselling services;
- (e) Detention and shelter care facilities;
- (f) Clinical services.

3. It is recommended that a committee or advisory board be established including in its membership lawyers, representatives from the field of social work and other influential citizens to assist, advise and co-ordinate the new court division and to assist in every way possible in obtaining acceptance of the principles involves, by the legal profession, judiciary and the public.

These three recommendations only briefly outline the program as presented, but it clearly defines an improved system in the administration of family law. Family law relates to the basic social unit comprising husband, wife and children. It thus includes law relating to the following topics:

CONTRACTS OF MARRIAGE:—Formation of the contract of marriage—dissolution—Annulment—Judicial Separation—Maintenance—The effects of the contract of marriage on the civil rights of man and wife and its effect in criminal law.

CHILDREN: — Custody — Maintenance — Guardianship—Criminal law (Delinquency, Correction, Penal reform)—Paternity Disputes.

The above are the recommendations for the establishment of a family court division of the Supreme Court of Alberta. If this recommendation is followed, it will have eliminated the overlapping and segmented jurisdiction which now characterizes our judicial treatment of family problems. Their second recommendation, that is to establish a department of court services within the control and under the direction of a family court, goes a step further and recognizes the desirability of co-ordination with people trained in social service and the behavioural sciences.

Thus defined are the problems of poverty as they exist in some of the lives of the Mother endeavouring to bring up her family with the absence of a father in the home. We, the Monicas, wish to rise up against an economic and social system that makes poverty a by-product of growth. We strongly endorse and recommend a strong Christian awareness and understanding of poverty, acceptance of the individual, and a meaningful attempt to improve conditions as they exist among the people of Canada.

In conclusion, we thank your Committee for hearing and considering our views on this important question. We hope that, if you find that any or all our aspirations toward improving poverty conditions are justified, you will make the appropriate recommendations to Parliament.

Respectfully submitted on behalf of the Monica Society of Edmonton.

STUDY COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

BACKGROUND and PURPOSE:

THE EDMONTON SOCIAL PLANNING COUNCIL

Planning Councils throughout the country have changed dramatically during recent years. This change has been brought about by the demonstration of citizens' desire to respond actively to the massive social problems facing us today. In addition, the change has been provoked by the emergence of new local planning groups under federal, provincial and municipal government direction. As governments become more active in the planning field, it is evident that there is an increasing need for the incidence of a strong citizen-based planning organization which can also serve as the voice of informed judgment and constructive criticism.

A primary role of the Edmonton Social Planning Council is that of a change agent. As pressing social issues emerge in our community, it becomes ever more apparent that a means must exist whereby citizens can make their wishes known and can gather to resolve problems. The Edmonton Social Planning Council attempts to respond to the community and through constant review to identify those issues that the community should become actively involved with; to generate the community's interest and to provide a platform for discussion and action. This activity necessarily involves fact-finding and research, the compilation and presentation of briefs, the organization of public meetings, methods to resolve acute problems as well as providing a means of on-going study of emerging concerns.

In recent years the council has become increasingly involved in building relationships with the constituency and in social animation. The steady emergence of indigenous or self-help groups is another aspect of this change in which the council has become more involved. Groups such as these possess the initiative and drive to help themselves and having had personal experience possess understanding for other persons in similar situations. However they are aware of the need for consultation and information about resources and methods. Their success in comparison to more institutionalized and professional agencies, indicates that we can learn a great deal and that these groups may provide some real answers.

Our awareness of the poverty and powerlessness of about one-third of our population has grown with a sense of dread and frustration. The alleviation of poverty, the economically poor, the poor in spirit, the victims of discrimination and exploitation has become a central concern. Poverty is a psychological process depriving individuals and families of material comforts, human dignity and fulfillment.

The Council begins from a position of a firm conviction regarding the dignity and worth of all mankind. Our observations indicate clearly, that most efforts to alleviate poverty are aimed at what is called "rehabilitation"—modifying or changing the behaviour of the individual to make him employable, productive and a consumer of goods. We recognize that such programs are based on false assumptions. Man should not be forced to change. Situations, environment, opportunities, alternatives should be presented to all for a free choice by individuals to build their own lives based on their own visions and desires and using their own personal strengths and resources.

We are confronted by a paradox:—a country of great natural wealth, resources and beauty, a burgeoning technology—apparently the means at our fingertips to dispel inequities and poverty forever and yet its constant existence and increasing visibility plagues us. It appears that an ethical revolution of some sort is required to reduce the expanding disparities that exist. Can governments play a role here in providing impetus and leadership for such fundamental social change?

The E.S.P.C. is dedicated to finding means to intervene in this situation where the complexities are compounding in the urban scene in particular. We are honestly attempting to work with the poor and the powerless, to listen carefully to the ideas they present and to encourage established institutions and organizations to do the same and provide opportunities for meaningful dialogue.

MODEL OF A CLOSED SYSTEM (Skid-Row)

One current part of our studies is presented here as a model of the closed systems that individuals and organizations both get locked into. This model illustrates clearly the futility of developing new programs without sufficient understanding of the parameters of the system. These programs, planned and designed on well documented needs, often make the situation less agonizing and less evident but actually serve to re-inforce and maintain the interdependency of the system.

The model we present is called "The Skid Row Concentration Camp". You will observe that once a man is caught up in this cycle it is virtually impossible to break away from it despite the many services and programs within the cycle that are designed to "rehabilitate" skid row dwellers and transient men. Similarly the service agencies are caught in the same circular network and seem almost as helpless as the men to extricate themselves. Consideration of this model leads us to recognize that freedom of choice and alternatives for men are missing. To add new services to such a system or to re-style the central core would only serve to cover up the real issues and delay any improvement other than a superficial one.

It seems essential that close attention be given to the culture of the groups of men who are in this situation in order to determine their strengths, their personalities and to provide alternative and viable opportunities that will allow these men to develop in their own fashion, not one superimposed and based on external and foreign values. We believe that closed systems such as this exist for many other disadvantaged groups as shown in the second drawing.

SOME EXAMPLES OF ALTERNATIVE MODELS:

We have asked three groups to describe to you the goals and methods of their organizations and the support they have secured financial and otherwise.

These groups will speak for themselves and have prepared the brief outlines that follow:

1. F.U.T.U.R.E. Society
2. Growing up Together
3. The Sturgeon Valley Housing Co-operative.

F.U.T.U.R.E. Society

The F.U.T.U.R.E. Society; not an agency but a social action group of convicts, exconvicts and interested citizens wanting to help each other to help themselves in leading a responsible, productive and purposeful life.

An excon, when he leaves an institution is at the bottom of the ladder and because he was there when arrested his chances are 20 out of a 100 of making the first step.

This usually raises the question, why is the recidivism rate in Canada 80 per cent? The flooring are some of the reasons:

(a) Lack of cold cash

The Average man leaving an institution has about $10 to his name.

(b) The real or the maginary rejection of the excon in the community

A better understanding of the excon and the community and the community and the excon must come about.

(c) Good-will Institutions

Hostels, Food centres, Clothing centres, for the poor degrade a man and provide an environment which quite easily can lead the excon to prison.

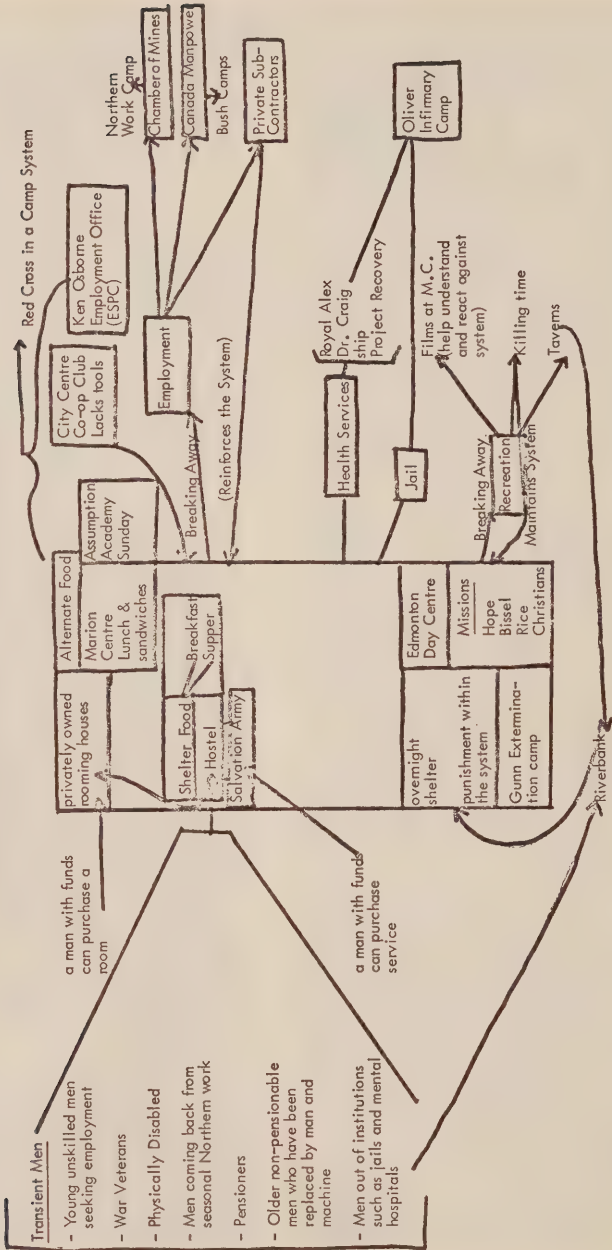

(d) Opportunity for retraining apprenticeship and further education

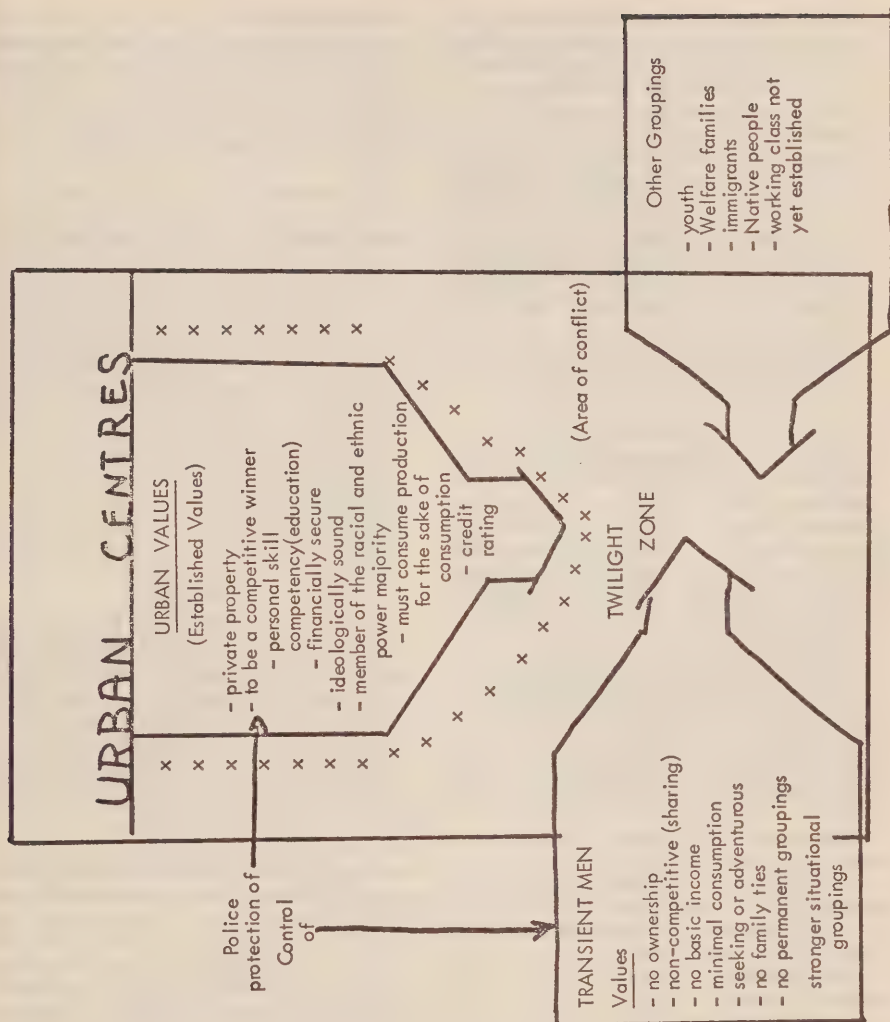

Any man leaving an institution should automatically be given the opportunity to further his rehabilitation either by apprenticeship, schooling or any other training available. This applies only if institutions in Canada are designed to rehabilitate the excriminal, mentally ill, handicapped or any person in need of rehabilitation.

(e) Employment

Canada manpower has become computerized; therefore special free services for finding employment for excons, transient men skid row people, alcoholics, and any one in need of rehabilitation or going through a rehabilitative program: are being provided by indigenous workers and groups and Social Development. Also private employment agencies are exploiting handicapped people by charging a fee taken out of the man's wages.

THE SKID ROW CONCENTRATION CAMP SYSTEM

(f) Agencies and Departments of Governments

Because agencies and Departments of Governments are competing for money and have to account for every penny there is little room for new ideas and experiments. Support is usually cut off when self help groups reach a point where services are actually duplicated, even if the service might be better. Because there are strict rules and regulations and guide lines to follow, most social workers are first dedicated to the establishment and second the client.

F.U.T.U.R.E.

AN IDEA—A PURPOSE—HOW IT WORKS
THE IDEA:

To form an organization of ex-inmates and interested citizens wanting to help each other to help themselves in leading a responsible, productive and purposive life; to establish a society dedicated to advance the status and well being of ex-inmates of penal institutions.

THE PURPOSE:

1. To originate and promote improvements in the general welfare of the members and to make available to members opportunities to participate in a variety of activities: card clubs, curling, bowling and other physical and social functions as well as discussion groups, public speaking and any other group activities.

2. To provide opportunities for members to enter educational facilities.

3. To establish, create, administer and maintain a fund for the purpose of aiding or assisting ex-inmates to rehabilitate themselves in the community.

4. To establish, construct and maintain suitable premises for the Society.

HOW IT WORKS:

One of the major problems the ex-inmate has in his or her re-entry to society is the problem of finding or being able to make new acquaintances and friends. It seems that in a great number of cases, when the inmate is released he does not want to go to any unfamiliar places where he might find new friends, for the fear of being left alone. He feels that he doesn't know how to become involved and active, he has a feeling that these people are different and he doesn't belong. The F.U.T.U.R.E. Society will greatly relieve this idea of rejection by providing:

1. An environment of persons with a common objective, which of course is a sincere desire to become respected citizens of society.

2. A relationship of acceptance, which will allow the inmate to meet new and purposeful people while he is in the company of old friends.

3. By creating an association of respected and successful ex-inmates, hence proving to the new member that ideas of ex-inmates not being accepted or having the same opportunities as other people is fallacy and that people are accepted and respected not for what they have done but by what they are and what they are doing now.

GROWING UP TOGETHER

This special programme for small children began in the fall with a group who came together through the Boyle Street Project Office. They thought that it would be a good idea to start a programme for children of parents who could not afford other facilities for their children. The group decided that the mothers in the group should have the control of the programme, and would also be able to work in the school on a voluntary basis.

The mothers group also wanted to set up a programme for themselves which could take place at the same time as the children's programme. Sacred heart Parish Hall was secured for the programme. It took about six months for a number of groups who were boycotting the programme. The programme for children began shortly before Christmas. The group however had received no funds when it started the programme.

The programme: 2 hours from 1:30—3:30 daily. The children were picked up at their homes by volunteer drivers. Once in the play-school the children had various activities, free play time, experience with art materials, music, toys and other equipment such as films and tape recorders. The children also went on field trips to places such as library, museum, university farm, the childrens' zoo. There were two resource people who were in attendance daily along with the mothers who came in to the school. The total staff situation was volunteer. The playschool ran until the second week in June. The only financing that the group received were two donations from church groups amounting in total to $50.00, and the payment of the utilities for a period of three months.

Who was approached for funds during this time: The two school boards, the public and the separate, the parks and recreation department. The school boards were certainly interested in the programme but their answer was the same—we are spending public monies and therefore must be responsible for how these are used—no money without strings (CONTROL). The parks and recreation department refused funds to the group because they had their own programme and could not see the point of giving a grant to a community group to run its own programme. The mothers group did not want a park and recreation programme for their children (there has been a history of conflict between the mothers in the Boyle Street area and the PSC dept.)

PHASE TWO

THE GOLDEN OPPORTUNITY

In June the mothers decided that they would organize the programme in a better fashion and become incorporated as a society. New more permanent facilities were required and more people who could be in the school in the full time basis could devote their full time to the childrens' programme. The mothers would take part in working in the school as well as having their own programme. Each mother was to work in the school for two months on a paid basis. The mothers also said that there was a definite need for them to have their own bus for transportation rather than rely on volunteers.

At about this time the Province put out a Request for Proposal for someone to run a pre-school programme in the area in which the group was running its programme. The group decided to put in a proposal to the government. This proposal emphasized the fact that a pre-school programme was much too limiting and went on to explain what type of a programme would be desirable. Once again the proposal was rejected—it is interesting to note the money was given to the schools. At present the school is not operating, and the group is planning to re-open in the fall—hopefully by then they will have received some financial assistance, so that the programme can have some stability.

The whole idea of the project was set up to provide educational opportunities for both the parents and the children. This is certainly not done in the school system and is one of the reasons that the school has had a hard time getting financing. Another reason is the fact that the mothers want to have the major say in the control and development of the programme for their children and themselves. The programme will no longer but unique if it allows itself to be sucked up into the school system.

THE STURGEON VALLEY HOUSING CO-OPERATIVE: GENESIS

Today, you can buy a pleasant house, but you can't buy a pleasant neighborhood. You can even have a part in designing your house, but you generally can't have a part in designing your neighborhood—that is, its communal facilities, such as schools, parks, recreation centers.

Is it possible for the people who are going to live in a community to help design their neighborhood facilities, and then to certain control over them after the community has been developed? Can they do this, and, at the same time, develop a community where citizens can retain their privacy if they want to?

Recently, a group of people from all walks of life, of all ages, and of various income-levels met together for nine consecutive evenings and attempted to answer these questions. These meetings were carried out with financial assistance from CMHC.

At first, they discussed their dreams—about what they wanted in a house and in a community. There were art students at these meetings who could translate these dreams into visual form—that is, into drawings.

People dreamed of houses with double-sinks in the kitchen; bedrooms with plenty of storage space; & rooms which can be rearranged as new children are born and as older ones leave home; rooms that are cool in summer and warm in winter; doors that are side enough to move furniture through; sound-proof walls; houses that do not look like boxes. In short, houses built primarily to satisfy people's needs.

People dreamed of communities with swimming pools, attractive community halls, health centers, day-care centers, senior-citizens' center, coffee-houses, sports-fields, large parks, safe streets, large landscaped areas, clean air, modern school, centrally located stores, park-land which is easily accessible and not close to busy streets, adequate laundry facilities. In short, communities built primarily to satisfy people's needs.

People dreamed of a community where all sorts of people can live that is, professional people, working people, rich people, poor people, people of various ethnic groups, retired people, pensioners, welfare-recipients, disabled people, young people, large families, etc. In short, people dreamed of the sort of mixed community that low-cost government housing, and other types of developments have not been able to provide.

These are the things that people dreamed about. But, in our society, can such dreams come true?

The group found that such dreams can and have come true in North America.

Representatives from the 200-unit Willow Park Housing Co-operative in Winnipeg and from the Calgary Housing Co-operative described ways in which people can make such—dreams—their dreams about houses and communities come true.

A family living in a Co-operative Housing development has special advantages over both ordinary ownership and renting. An ordinary homeowner has no control beyond his own property upon the actions of his neighbors. A renter has no control at all. Co-op families exercise a large measure of control of their community by adopting reasonable rules designed to keep their neighbourhood a pleasant, safe and decent place to live.

Co-operative housing provides top quality accommodation and a family pays only what it actually costs to own and operate its dwellings. There is no profit to a landlord. Yet, members have the same freedom from maintenance chores that renters do. The Co-op handles repairs, insurance, maintenance of grounds and the exterior of the buildings.

At this point, the group investigated the possibility of actually developing a co-operative housing community on a 100-acre site in St. Albert.

The site has the advantage of being located in one of the most scenic areas of the metropolitan area. The site offers a view of the Sturgeon River Valley. The site is zoned residential comprehensive. There are no odor or air polluting industries in the immediate area.

The present owners of this site, the Oblate Order, have given the group a free-six-month option on the land.

Representatives from CO-OP local co-operatives, credit unions, and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation answered basic questions regarding possible ways at financing the development.

Various architects, engineers, interior designers, and landscape architects helped the group to explore design possibilities.

These professional advisers informed the group that the site itself has a great potential for any type of development that the group might wish to start.

A co-operative was formally incorporated. It is called the Sturgeon Valley Housing Co-operative. Shares are currently being sold for $1 each, and a steering committee was formed in order to publicize the co-op, recruit more members, and work on further development of the general plan of the prospective community.

Co-op membership is open. Anyone who is interested in participating in the development of a co-op housing community is welcome to join. All co-op members, including new members, will be able to have a voice in drawing up initial plans for the community.

In September, there will be a general meeting of all co-op members where a board of directors will be formally elected. Also general policies aimed at specific development of the St. Albert site will be adopted.

CONCLUSIONS:

1. We must allow people self determination to develop themselves thereby guaranteeing our society the full richness of human experience, and the variety of human approaches and responses that make the ideals that we jointly hold of community and neighbourhood worth having.

2. We support the idea of a guaranteed income so that there may be a real equality of opportunity for everybody, and to provide a reasonable degree of satisfaction of life for everybody.

3. Resources must be made available to groups and organizations who are developing programs based on new models. Means must be established whereby personnel and financial support can be secured without the imposition of rigidity and controlling techniques.

BRIEF

to the

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

July 20, 1970

by

UNIFARM

9934-106 Street,
Edmonton 14, Alberta

PREFACE

This Brief was prepared by Unifarm, a general farm organization operating in the Province of Alberta.

More than thirty thousand Alberta farm units hold membership in the organization on a direct paying basis. In addition, the majority of Alberta farm Co-operatives and commodity groups are a part of Unifarm.

The organization makes representation on behalf of its membership to government, industry and other parts of society. In addition it provides a variety of services, such as insurance and accounting services.

Unifarm is administered by a nine member executive body made up of a president, two vice-presidents (one elected by the direct membership, the other by the Co-operative and commodity section), and six members of the 33 member provincial Board of Directors.

The brief was prepared by Elmer Allen, holder of a Master's degree in Agricultural Economics.

This presentation is being made by Unifarm President, Paul Babey, assisted by Mr. Allen.

DESCRIPTION OF POVERTY

Relative Concept of Poverty

Very few farmers would admit they are living in poverty. Rather they might say they are living on a low income.

One cannot arbitrarily say that if expenses for basic family needs are met there is no poverty. Poverty is living in a social environment which is relatively inferior to the majority of our society. Convincing the poor that they are living like the kings of the 19th century would not make them feel any better off. However, if every rural family had the same standard of living they would not feel poor, relative to each other.

There are two basic concepts of poverty. The obvious one is based on a measure of income; the second is that of fulfilling social needs of the individual. To properly assess the economic and social requirements one would have to observe family income, satisfaction of rural life, health, education and services available to various sectors of our economy.

Family income is one of the most important measures of poverty. We shall concentrate on this one measure because it can easily be described in quantitative terms. The other measures are more qualitative, and are therefore more difficult to describe in absolute terms.

Type of Poverty in Alberta

Rural poverty in Alberta is historical, seasonal and occasional, especially during widespread crop failures and depressed market prices. We have rural areas where net farm income has always been considerably lower than in other regions of the province. We have part-time farmers who are seasonally unemployed. Southern Alberta has been hit by drought in cycles while northern parts of the province have suffered crop failures due to excessive moisture in the fall, or too little moisture during the growing season.

When agricultural markets become depressed (especially grain markets) a group of farmers fall into the poverty level.

RURAL POVERTY IN ALBERTA

Economic Measures

Economic measures are used to illustrate the extent of poverty on Alberta farms. There are many economic indicators, including gross farm income, net farm income, family farm income, etc. The first measure, gross sales (commonly used) is very misleading. The obvious reason for its use is that it is reported by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in the Agricultural Census. This measure is misleading because it does not show any non-farm income. Even "net farm income" reported annually by DBS is very misleading because of the large contribution by "income in kind".¹

Rather than resort to some economic definition for poverty as has been done by the Economic Council of Canada, in the Fifth Annual Review (married couple $2,500; married couple with one child $3,000 etc), which is really equivalent to personal and family exemptions for income tax purposes, we can assume that a non-taxable farm family is living in poverty.

On the basis of such a definition, Table 1 indicates that approximately one-half of the 59,185 Alberta farmers filing income tax returns in 1968 were not taxable (likewise in 1967 and 1966). There were 29,261 Alberta farm families whose earnings were below the poverty level. That fully 50 per cent of Alberta farm families were below the poverty level in 1968 indicates the magnitude of the rural poverty problem. By comparison only 17 per cent of non-farm families are living below the poverty line (non-taxable).

Looking at the distribution of income from all sources, about 33,500 or 57 per cent of farm families in Alberta earned less than $3,000 (Table 1). The middle income group earning $3,000 to $5,000 net income contained nearly 11,800 families or 20 per cent of the farmers. The remaining 23 per cent earned over $5,000 net income in 1968.

Source of Family Income

In many cases the smaller the amounts of gross farm sales, the greater the amount of non-farm income.

Non-commercial farmers (farm sales of less than $2,500) in Canada earned approximately 53 per cent of family income from non-farm sources in 1958 (Table 2). Those selling less than $250 worth of farm produce actually earned 99 per cent of their income from non-farm sources. Their earnings from non-farm sources were ($2,503) substantially more on the average than of those who had gross sales between $250 and $2,500. In fact their total net income was higher than those farmers selling $250 to $2,500 of farm produce.

¹"Farm Net Income", (Cat. No. 21-202, DBS, June 1970) reports Alberta net farm income of nearly $300,000,000 for 1969. Of this net figure, $94,821,000 or 32 per cent was "income in kind"—money which the farmer never saw, but was supposed to have saved indirectly, in house rent and by consuming farm grown products. The house rent figure for 1969 was reported to be nearly $74.2 million, the remainder of $20.6 million accounting for farm grown products consumed on the farm. Seventy-eight per cent of "income in kind" is for house rent and 32 per cent for farm products. If "income in kind" was removed from net income it would reduce the farmers farm income on the average (assuming 66,000 farms in 1969) from $4,500 to only $3,100 a drop of $1,400. This is not to say that farmers received only $3,100 in 1969 because nearly $1,000 was reported to be an increase in farm inventory (grain in store, increase in livestock value etc.). This means the net amount of visible take home pay (before income taxes) is reduced to $2,160 per farm, a far cry from the original $4,500. The figure of $2,160 of course, is meaningless because off-farm income has not been mentioned. If we are going to use it as a comparison to earnings of non-farmers a more accurate measure needs to be used.

This indicates that gross farm sales are a very poor indicator of family income. Just because a farmer does not report much in gross farm sales, on the average, in no way substantiates the fact that he should leave farming for some other occupation.

More recent data from the Department of National Revenue indicates that non-farm income is still a significant source of farm family income. In 1968, it accounted for 25 percent of total family income in Alberta whereas in 1962—it accounted for only 19 percent (Table 3). The majority of the non-farm income comes from wages and salaries, with bond and bank interest being the second largest source of non-farm revenue. Part-time farming in Alberta is becoming a significant source of family income for many Alberta farmers.

Part-Time Farmers

Alberta farmers reported earnings of $24.5 million in 1968 from part-time work. This is more than twice as much as reported only six years before when off-farm work accounted for $11.2 million. The trend has been toward more farmers participating in some form of part-time work. Only 19 percent of the farmers worked off the farm in 1951 whereas 33 percent did so in 1966 (Table 4).

Part-time operators includes off farm income from salaries, wages, commissions, custom work or non-agriculture business or practice (pensions, family allowance, investments, rentals from lands, unemployment insurance or exchange work not included), providing the income received was over $750 or worked 75 days or more off the holding. Part-time workers are all workers regardless of the number of days worked or income earned.

^b These part-time farmers are those who worked off the farm for 73 days or more no income restriction was available as in 1966.

^c Of the 18,307 workers, 9,459 were non-commercial farmers and 8,823 were commercial farmers.

Another very important observation should be made regarding Table 7. In 1961, 41 percent of the non-commercial farmers did off-farm work. This means we are losing more full time farmers than we are those farmers who report part-time work off their holdings.

While evidence is not available it may be safe to assume that many farmers who have off-farm income are better off financially than those who depend entirely on the sale of farm produce. Taxation statistics indicate that those who report off-farm income tend to be taxable more often than those who do not.

Farmers on Welfare

With so many Alberta farm families living at the poverty level we would expect many of them would be eligible for welfare (social allowance or social assistance as phrased in Alberta by the Department of Social Development). However, it is not easy for the farmer to get welfare because he usually has some equity in the farm. The net value of the farmer's assets make him ineligible for assistance.

The Department of Social Development reported 997 farmers in receipt of assistance in November, 1969. Of these, 168 farmers were in receipt of welfare due to present farm marketing and crop conditions; all were long term non-productive farm units; while 418 were temporary cases for various social and economic reasons.

There are some welfare cases where the problem is alcohol, poor management or lack of ambition. This is typical of people in all walks of life. Our concern is for the large number of individuals who are working hard but cannot make ends meet.

Farmers who are residents of a municipality are not eligible for provincial assistance if they are employable or only require temporary assistance. All other welfare cases including those in Special Areas or Improvement Districts are handled by the Provincial Department of Social Development.

A survey of the municipalities showed that in 1969 there were approximately 195 farmers receiving municipal assistance in addition to the 997 receiving provincial assistance for a total of 1,192 farm families.¹

In addition to the above there were some 2,500 farmers who received the $1,000 Provincial Government's Interim Assistance loan this spring. This special loan was given only to farmers who could prove they needed assistance to cover living expenses.

¹The survey was made by mailing a questionnaire from our office to all municipalities in Alberta (Improvement Districts and Special Areas are handled by the Provincial Government). Forty out of 48 replied, those that did not reply most likely had no or very few welfare cases.

There are many other farmers who should have received assistance but did not know how to get it or did not want to take it.¹ Many rural people are not receiving adequate attention. As one rural social development director reported,

"there are insufficient numbers of workers available from the Department of Social Development to adequately serve people who are in need of assistance. Assistance is being given but the workers are carrying such heavy caseloads that they have no time for the rehabilitative work and counselling that is so necessary to bring about change. This should not be construed as a criticism of the workers involved here but rather a statement of circumstances which mitigate against full and proper jobs being done".

It has been proposed that the provincial government should handle all welfare cases to prevent any overlapping of assistance.

MISUNDERSTANDING OF FARM INCOME AND THE CHANGING BASIC INCOME REQUIREMENTS

Many people still believe that basic economic needs of farmers are much less than those of urban people. They incorrectly assume that farmers do not need as much take-home-pay because they (the farmers) can live off the land. While this may have been the case a few decades ago the rural scene has changed greatly in recent years. Rural people are just as concerned about a standard of living, both economically and socially, as their urban counterparts.

Poverty is not only the lack of essentials to sustain life, but also lack of access to certain goods, services, and conditions of life which are available to others.

At one time when the majority of our population was rural-oriented, people were not inclined to compete with the standard of living of urban people. Today this has changed. With modern communication and transportation technology the rural people are becoming more aware of the more affluent sector of our society. They too would like to enjoy all the modern conveniences and more leisure time. As a result, many rural people are not satisfied with their present income levels. There are some however, who are satisfied even though they are very poor.²

The needs of rural people have increased in many ways and only a few will be mentioned for illustrative purposes.

Life on the farm has changed significantly in recent years and the trend has been to purchase more and more goods and services rather than "living off the land". With more farm specialization fewer farmers have access to farm-grown produce. For example, 59 percent of the farmers reported hog production, 71 percent reported chickens and 71 percent reported milk cows in 1951. In 1966 only 41 percent reported hogs, 49 percent reported chickens and 48 percent reported having milk cows. According to our estimates, the 1971 census will probably report that approximately half as many farmers will have access to these products as was reported in 1951, so that many more farmers must purchase milk, eggs, butter, livestock, meats and poultry than they did previously.

There are many services purchased today that were not available before. Other items such as utilities (telephone, gas, electric power, running water etc.) and other conveniences mean extra costs in operating the farmstead.

With the decreasing rural population many farm inputs and services provided locally at one time must now be purchased further ²A study conducted in the Dixonville, Blueberry and Niton regions of Alberta indicated that 3/4 of the farmers had a total net family income of less than $3,000 a year, and yet when these farmers were asked if they had money and could do anything they wanted, their response indicated that "even though farming is making a poor living for most members of the sample interviewed, most are sufficiently satisfied with it, most are so well satisfied with the farming life that they would not leave it even if there were no financial risk for them in the process". About one half of the farmers interviewed felt they were doing quite well, very well or promisingly. In the Bonnyville region 42% of the farmers interviewed in 1965 said they had sufficient capital invested in their farm unit. The average investment was just under $27,000 and their net farm income was less than $3,000. Even though these farmers may be satisfied with the size of their holding they were probably unaware of the economies of size that existed in the area. If they did, many would expand if they were guaranteed better returns. Many would not simply because they fear going in debt, are too proud to borrow, lack knowledge of possible returns from various resource uses, are reaching old age and don't want to bother changing, etc.

¹Dr. Stephen G. Peitchinis states that "Undoubtedly, there are hundreds of low income individuals and families who qualify for supplementary social allowances but do not apply for them. A number of reasons can be suggested; firstly, there has been little concerted effort by government, semi-public and private welfare agencies to inform the people of their eligibility and to encourage them to apply; secondly, there are people who know that they are eligible, but do not apply because of fear of being rejected, uncertainty regarding the extent to which they would be compelled to account for their expenditures, and unwillingness to undergo means tests; and thirdly, there are many who regard any form of public assistance as degrading."

from home. Farm inputs (machinery repairs, fuel, fertilizer, hardware, building material, etc.), living needs (food, clothing, etc.) health service (medical, dental, drugs, etc.) and other general services provided by technicians, mechanics and tradesmen must all be purchased further from home for many farm families. It is difficult to estimate the extra costs involved nevertheless they are real costs that necessitate higher family incomes to meet present needs.

Larger farm tractors, automated equipment, and other machinery (including the self-propelled garden cultivator) all provide more leisure on the farm, but require higher comes. In other words, the rural financial needs are much closer to those of urban people today than they ever were in the past.

One other misconception regarding farm people is that they may be poor income wise, but they accumulate a large amount of farm capital. This is very misleading for three reasons: (a) much of the capital is left to the next of kin so he can start farming, (b) over one-half the farmers have a capital investment of less than $40,000 and (c) farmers own about 75 per cent of the capital they operate.

Many farmers must expand their holding to remain a viable unit in a very competitive industry. Most of their earning must be plowed back into farm expansion. This means that farmers with low incomes actually have even less to live on, than appears on the surface. Given the present income ratios many urban dwellers could generate a larger capital holding than the farmer. Because he does not, should not be construed to mean he is unable to do so.

In conclusion, if one were to consider all the economic costs of not having a dentist, a doctor, a library, a swimming pool, a theater, a good education, or even a babysitter in the rural area, it can be established that the modern farmer must have an income comparable to that of urban workers.

REGIONS OF LOW RURAL INCOME IN ALBERTA

We have "pockets of poverty" in Alberta. Some regions have considerably lower incomes, on the average, than others.

Statistics of total net family farm income are not available so cash sales per farm, capital investment per farm and net income, as reported by income tax returns were used as a yardstick to measure the occurrence of low income in the 15 Census Divisions of the province of Alberta (Table 8).

Census Divisions 12, 13, 14 and 15 appear to be the regions having the lowest gross farm sales per farm, capital investment per farm, and the lowest net income as reported by income tax returns with exception of C.D. 14¹

These four regions lie in the northern part of the province with the exception of C.D. 14 which protrudes further south along the well established forestry area. The low income region lies predominantly on the less productive dark grey wooded soils zones of the province. The black and brown soils contain much fewer numbers of low-income farmers. One would be safe to assume that low productive soil regions breed low-income earners or attract people who have little capital and less than average education.¹ The area tends to be less productive in crop production and unfavorable weather and climate conditions increase the risk and uncertainty of adequate returns. Marginal returns per unit of production are lower in the area making it that much more difficult for the farmers to sustain a more rapid rate of economic growth.²

WHY WE HAVE RURAL POVERTY

For various reasons we are always going to have people at the bottom end of the income scale, no matter what programs are developed. Our concern is that too many rural people are poor, and immediate solutions to the problems are required.

If farmers were able to make the necessary adjustments and if there were no external impediments for labor migration into other employment it should be possible theoretically to minimize the wide-spread income differentials that exist within and between various sectors of our economy. Rapid agricultural adjustments do not take place and this is why we are confronted with wide-spread poverty in rural areas. The question that needs to be answered is what are the factors that impede rapid agricultural adjustment and economic growth and contribute to wide-spread rural poverty.

(A) Factors Affecting Rapid Agricultural Adjustment and Growth

Assuming that rural poverty can be minimized by

- (1) Off-farm migration
- (2) Expansion and development of farm holdings
- (3) Supplementary rural income and
- (4) Higher net returns for farming

then some of the major factors which affect these adjustments should be reviewed.

First, it should be established who might be expected to make these adjustments. Farmers are by no means homogenous and cannot be categorized by placing them in boxes. It is possible to assume however, that we have three economic classes of farmers. First are the viable farmers who need not adjust. Second are the potentially viable farmers who could adjust and increase farm incomes; and third are the non-viable farmers who need to migrate or earn more income from non-farm jobs. That is, we have two groups who can adjust, but within them we find farmers who are able, unable, or do not want to make these adjustments. The one single most important factor to consider is age of the farm operator. All other factors revolve around this one.

(B) Age Groups

1. The Young People

The younger the farm operator, the greater are his opportunities to find non-farm employment. The older the farm operator the less are his chances to migrate or expand his farm unit.

If a farmer wanted to improve his economic position through migration, alternative employment opportunity becomes the single most important element in the decision to leave farming. Lack of knowledge of jobs, experience, and education were important factors. A study of migration from a low-income farm area indicated that three-quarters of the migrants moved less than 30 miles from their former farms, and most had remained in their original community.³ One-half of the migrants who responded held on to their farm during the transitional period. They retained ownership of their farm for some time as a means of maintaining some feeling of security. Some had hopes perhaps, of returning to the life they hated to leave. The variables that affect the migrants success in off-farm employment depend upon his level of education, work experience and non-farm training. The level of unemployment is of course also very important. If it is desirable, and we think it is, to increase off-farm opportunities to the young people in rural areas, education and non-farm opportunities become very significant factors.

Whenever a farmer leaves the rural area there is a detrimental effect on those remaining. The services of those remaining become underutilized and the cost of municipal and social services per capita increase.

To create a more favorable rural-urban balance it would be desirable to have more part-time or full time work for young farmers in their own area rather than have them migrate outside their community. More incentives for industrial development in rural areas are required to provide these jobs for farmers.

¹This observation is made by the author on the basis of his study of low-income farm regions in Alberta.

²For more details on factors contributing to slow growth see appendix A which contains a summary of a thesis by Elmer Allen.

³See page 2 of Wayne Lamble's thesis on Off-Farm Migration in appendix B of this report.

There has been a significant decrease in the number of younger people taking up farming in Alberta. In 1951 there were over 41,000 farmers under the age of 45 whereas in 1966 there were only about 29,000 (Table 9). If this trend continues, it should in itself, remove many of the low-income farmers from the agricultural industry. Those who want to help farmers should perhaps concentrate in this area—the young people in rural areas. This requires better educational opportunities for the young, some retraining for others, information regarding employment opportunities, and financial assistance and incentives for rural people to continue education.

2. The Middle Age Group

It is those people with low-incomes who are in the middle age group that it is most difficult to help. It is unlikely there will be any significant reductions in the foreseeable future because they are not as mobile into other occupations. It seems more logical to help a 50-year-old farmer to keep producing than to retrain him, move him from the community he enjoys, to employ him for a few years in an environment where the cost of living will be much higher.

About 27 percent of the farm operators in the province were between 45 and 54 years of age in 1966. Twenty-six percent of them supplemented their farm earnings with off-farm employment. While many of these farm operators have viable units and have higher average incomes than the younger farm operators, they do not earn as much as those 70 years old and older, but they do have larger family obligations than do older farm operators.

The most logical internal agricultural adjustment appears to be expansion of their farm holdings and/or increase in part-time work. External factors such as prices for their products and prices for their inputs play an important role in their economic development.

Expansion of their holdings requires additional capital, managerial abilities, adoption of new technology, services of agriculture extension, adequate market information, and most important, higher returns for their production.

At the present time there is no special farm credit program for the non-viable farmer. Loans are based on the individual farmers equity so that those who have larger farm units are the ones who can readily obtain credit at reasonable interest rates. Rather than the majority of land sales being added to present holdings of the potentially viable farm unit, viable farm units are expanding their farm holding's at about the same rate as others. The small farm operator is at a disadvantage when it comes to competing for land that is being offered for sale. Until such time as there is a change in agricultural credit policies, land tenure arrangements and government programs to provide higher returns to these farmers, they will continue to live in poverty. Low loan limits, high interest rates, and the traditional lending policies of lending institutions who make loans exclusively on the value of assets owned by a potential borrower, do nothing more than perpetuate poverty in Canada. If governments continue their laissez-faire attitude towards these farmers they will have very little opportunity to improve themselves.

Future farmers need to avail themselves of assistance and guidance (from a management aspect) in providing lending agencies with a well analyzed set of financial accounts, or well defined budget or plan of how they propose to invest the borrowed capital. At the same time many lending agencies must adopt the management rather than equity approach to lending and borrowing. This means that lending institutions will have to know more about modern farming practices, farm budget etc. Bankers and professional agrologists in Manitoba recently participated in a seminar to learn more about farm budgeting etc. To our knowledge this practice has not been adopted in Alberta.

3. Older Farmers

With nearly one-third of the farmers in the age group 55 and older, no agricultural adjustment program that is aimed at employment will be very successful. Early retirement within the local area combined with some negative income plan appears to be the simplest avenue of approach for this group.

We believe that in the interest of dignity and self-respect for the individual, it would be wrong to say these farmers should "do something else." Rather than try to raise every submarginal farm to commercial status, minor improvements to boost incomes, even if one must use a negative income plan, it should be used in a program for older farmers.

C. Domestic and International Markets Affect on Agriculture Income

The number of farmers at the poverty level, regardless of their age group, fluctuates from year to year, depending upon agricultural production and market prices. The general income level of all farmers in Canada is highly correlated to general price levels of agricultural commodities. Prices of most agricultural products are subject to severe price fluctuations. Fluid milk is one of the few commodities that has established prices. Products that are exported are affected by international prices, while products consumed locally (such as fresh meats) are affected by domestic markets. Foreign prices tend to be inelastic (drop less with increased production) while local market prices tend to more elastic (drop by a greater percentage than the percentage increase in production).

Various measures have been employed to stabilize prices and consequently farm income through such measures as:

- (1) Fixed prices
- (2) Stabilized prices

- (3) Two-piece systems
- (4) Input quotas
- (5) Sales quota
- (6) Floor prices

Attempts have been made to increase prices through some form of supply management, market promotion, and subsidies. Nevertheless, agricultural prices in general have not increased comparably with other prices in the Canadian economy.

The Index of Prices Received by Farmers in Canada has increased 16 percent since 1949 whereas the Consumer Price Index of All Items has increased 62 percent (Table 10).

Farm costs in Canada however, have increased by 100 percent since 1949, catching farmers in a cost-price-squeeze. Prices received by Alberta farmers increased by only 9.5 percent, while costs have increased by 97.2 percent (Table 10). These figures by themselves do not show the entire picture because productivity is a factor that should also be considered, nevertheless, it does indicate that the margin of return to farmers has decreased drastically during the last 20 years.

High rates of inflation in recent years have contributed to the rapid increase in costs of farm inputs but has not increased farm prices. Consequently, inflation has had a detrimental effect on farm incomes in general across Canada.

During the last 4 years, gross farm income in Alberta has dropped 1.4 percent, largely due to price declines (there was a small drop in productivity also). Realized net income however, dropped by 29 percent and if we ignore income in kind (it appears highly exaggerated), income per farmer has dropped over 43 percent in Alberta (Table 11). This drastic drop in farm income has no doubt put many farmers into the low-income category.

While price increases for agricultural products would not remove many farmers from the low-income category, it is one of the most significant factors contributing to low-incomes in general at the present time (see Table A in appendix).

GOVERNMENT AND RURAL DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS

Governments have recognized the need to improve farm income levels across Canada. The recent Task Force on Agriculture was the result of recognizing the complexity and emergency of the economic state of agriculture in Canada. In the past, many agricultural programs were adopted to tide the farmers over a crisis, and ad hoc programs are still being developed today. A good example is Operation Lift, a program that is of very short-term.

The government could be criticized for inconsistent policies. On the one hand they promote agricultural efficiency and on the other hand they have policies that promote equity and compensation. If agricultural programs are aimed at serving the viable commercial farmers, they will not meet the problems of poverty-level farmers. While we recognize that certain programs are necessary to serve both, some of the general programs should be restructured to assist the low-income farmer more than the viable commercial farmer. Nearly all of the Agricultural subsidies or assistance are received by commercial farmers who have gross sales in excess of $10,000. They sell about 70 percent of total production, but represent only 25 percent of the farmers. On a per farm basis this means that those selling over $10,000 gross would receive nearly 7 times more subsidy per farm than would those selling less than $10,000, if the subsidy had no upper limits and was paid on each unit sold. Fortunately, a few of the government assistance and subsidy programs such as the dairy subsidy, Operation Lift, and the interest-free cash advance program for farm stored grain have upper limits. However, others like wheat storage assistance, feed freight assistance and crop insurance assistance, and many other indirect forms of government assistance have no upper limits. For every one million dollars of government subsidy or assistance paid in Alberta a farmer selling more than $10,000 of farm produce would receive about $40 while the farmer selling less than $10,000 would receive only $6 on the average. Since the larger farm operators' costs of production are considerably less than that of the small farmer, this is a good example of "assistance to the one who needs it least".

Governments have listened too closely to those who say giving larger subsidies to small farmers is "subsidizing inefficiency". Why is it that we fail to hear the same phrase when small businesses are taxed 21 percent instead of 50 percent? This is not called "subsidizing inefficiency", rather it is called a "tax incentive" to help small businesses. Farmers need "incentive programs" to help low-income operators become self-sufficient economic farm units.

The government should subsidize interest rates for those farmers who are presently non-taxable and would like to expand their farm into an economic unit, for two reasons. (1) It would not cost as much as welfare programs and at the same time the farmer would be helping himself. (2) The taxable farmer is indirectly obtaining credit at less than cost because he is able to claim the cost of credit as an expense. For example, the cost of credit to a taxable farmer in the 50 per cent tax bracket is actually one half the rate of what the non-taxable farmer pays. Furthermore, interest charges are normally higher for small farm operators because of the greater risk involved. If special concessions or consideration is not given to the low-income farmer most government programs will simply perpetuate low-income farmers.

ARDA programs have been of some help to the middle-income group in two areas of the province. Their objective is to raise incomes in rural areas and improve resource use. It is difficult to assess how successful ARDA has been in the province until the 1971 Census of Agriculture is available. We have some suspicion that the reduction of farmers in both C.D. 14 and C.D. 12 will not be greater than that in the other census divisions. We also suspect that average farm income in these two areas will not be any closer to other regions in 1971. We are unable to understand why rural development programs are not more successful in raising rural income levels.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Guaranteed annual income plan for migrants—Some form of income protection is required for those who want to leave farming. The greatest problem facing individuals seeking a new occupation is the uncertainty of security at their new job. If their income was guaranteed at a satisfactory level for a reasonable period of time, it should encourage more migration of young people. This would provide for more utilization of underemployed resources of human capital by creating more output in the economy, on the long run.

2. Encourage more on-the-job training by employers—Employers perhaps have been reluctant to hire unskilled labor because the output of the employee does not warrant the minimum wage they must pay. However, if the recommendation above is adopted, and the government supplemented part of the wages paid while training on the job, more under-utilized human resources could be employed. The trend towards hiring only those with higher education does not necessarily mean more productive output. Many rural people have hidden talent and ambition that could be developed on the job. Some form of government grant could be incorporated to provide some incentive to the employee to complete the training necessary to improve myself.

3. Potential viable farmers should receive management and financial assistance—Farmers who want to expand their farm into an economic unit should be given assistance. A program should be developed that would make available to the farmer agricultural extension specialists who would assist the farmer throughout the adjustment period. The Rural Development Credit Agency suggested by the Task Force would provide the necessary credit. If the farmer upgraded himself and improved his income, he should be rewarded by the government writing off part of the loan. Incentives of this type tend to increase participation and the farmers' efforts to reach a certain goal. We understand such a program is presently underway in England.

4. Subsidization of interest rates should be provided for non-economic farm units—Unless low-income farmers are given some concession, many will never be able to rise above the poverty level. Low-income farmers are presently unable to set aside enough income to invest in their business because most of it is used for living expenses.

5. Agricultural subsidies should be directed towards the low-income sector of agriculture—Subsidies represent financial assistance contributed by governments toward current costs of production. The objective of most subsidy programs is to increase the earning power of a farmer so that he could expand his operation and thus have less need for the subsidy. With present distribution methods most of the subsidies go to those farmers who now have less need of them. Unless additional subsidies and assistance are redirected to low-income farmers, the value of assistance programs to the poor is questionable.

6. A special program should be established to enable low-income farmers to acquire land—Many low-income farmers are unable to acquire land because other farm operators outbid them in the market place. A program should be directed toward farmers who have sufficient managerial ability but not adequate capital, to help them acquire more land. This can be achieved through more liberal loans for land, or by government purchase, and either reselling or leasing the land to a restricted group of small farm operators.

7. Redistribution of the tax burdens for low-income people would help reduce the number of people living in poverty—Farmers are more receptive to tax reductions than they are to transfer payments that provide the same end result. Municipal, provincial and federal taxes combined tend to be regressive. That is, the low-income families' tax burden as a percentage of family income is greater than it is for higher-income families. Families in Canada with incomes of less than $2,000 contributed 60 per cent of their income towards taxes of all levels in 1961 (see report of the Royal Commission on Taxation, Volume 2, 1966, P. 246). Families earning between $3,000 and $7,000 contributed about 32 per cent towards taxes and only thereafter did higher-income families start to contribute a larger percentage, the $10,000 and over group contributing about 38 per cent on the average. However, 22 per cent of the families fell into the $2,000 and under category while only five per cent earned $10,000 and over. The Carter report states that with exception of income taxes, taxes in general levied on individuals are not equitable. The report states that property, social security, sales and excise taxes are regressive in most cases. We believe that each citizen should assume a personal financial responsibility for the cost of services commensurate with his ability to pay. The three levels of government should restructure their taxation system to remove the regressiveness with more consideration of the taxpayers ability to pay.

8. All individuals and families should receive some form of guaranteed annual income—The present social development program (previously Public Welfare) in Alberta does not serve the farm population adequately. Many farm families are living at bare subsistence levels and many do not have enough to cover all family needs. In many cases children quit school to help provide family needs. This is unfortunate, as it tends to perpetuate poverty in certain rural communities.

A negative income tax plan would eliminate many welfare schemes and help those farm families who are unable to obtain welfare because they own farm assets. (In 1966, 19,212 or 27 per cent of the farmers had a total capital value of less than $25,000 in Alberta while 20,378 or 29 per cent owned between $25,000 and $50,000. Their equity is about 75 per cent of what they operate.) In spite of the fact that many farmers have a small capital investment, and one half of all Alberta farmers are non-taxable, most of them do not qualify for any assistance. If a negative income tax plan provided for payment (from the treasury) an amount equal to one half of the unused exemptions and deductions, it would help those who really need economic assistance. Such a scheme would stimulate incentives for people to work and better themselves. Transfer or welfare schemes are not favored by farmers and too frequently they undermine, rather than reinforce the abilities and aspirations of recipients to participate productively in our economy.

Welfare systems at present tend to provoke the results they should be designed to avoid. For example, a child who must stand in line with a voucher to obtain his school books feels alienated whereas a university student who has 80 per cent of his education subsidized by taxpayers feels the province owes him an education. Some go so far as to say we should pay them while going to university. Farmers have never asked for much more than a square deal. They would like to get paid a decent wage for their work.

9. More industrial development should be encouraged in rural areas—Regional development incentive programs to promote economic expansion are desirable. We are somewhat concerned in Alberta that the Federal Government selected only one "special area", Lesser Slave Lake, and only the extreme southern part of the province was selected as a "designated region", under the Regional Development Incentives Act. We believe more provincial-federal government co-ordinated rural development programs should be developed to utilize the physical and human resources of other rural regions in the Provinces.

10. Farmers must have marketing legislation that would provide more stable realistic prices for farm products—On the domestic level with supply management and more bargaining power farmers could receive higher stable prices. World prices of many agricultural products would rise if foreign governments did not subsidize production one way or another. Removal of international trade restrictions for agricultural products and more two-way trading with those countries who would purchase more agricultural products should be developed. Canadian farmers are very efficient and have done a good job in trying to survive on the basis of being competitive. However, as long as other producers do not have to play the game by the same rules there is no way farmers can compete.

11. Census data on family income is essential—To date the only economic classification of farmers is "gross farm sales". Such data is completely inadequate as a yardstick in the determination of the economic status of farmers. Total net farm family income should be reported. This would include net farm income, part-time income, transfer payments, plus all other off-farm income. Cross-classification according to family size and age of the operator would be most useful in keeping track of the numbers of low-income farm families in the future. This should be incorporated immediately into the 1971 census of Agriculture.

12. Dominion Bureau of Statistics should review (1) income in kind, (2) index of prices paid by farmers, and (3) index of prices received by farmers.

Income in kind accounted for 32 per cent of net farm income in Alberta in 1969, 25 per cent during 1961-69, 20 per cent during 1951-60 and only 16 per cent during 1941-50. We believe that more realistic data would show the trend in reverse.

Index of prices received are not up to date. Unless preliminary estimates are made no current use of the data can be made.

Index of prices paid uses inputs such as binder twine which is no longer used by farmers. Furthermore, all farm and non-farm indices should use the same base year instead of 1935-39, 1949 and 1961.

13. We concur with most of the recommendations made by the Agricultural Task Force which are found at the conclusion of chapter 16 on the Low-Income Sector. They recommend in part:

- (1) Strengthen the Manpower Service available to farmers
- (2) Higher Levels of Employment
- (3) Improved Education
- (4) Welfare and Social Services
- (5) Guaranteed Annual Income Plan
- (6) Small Changes for Older Farmers
- (7) Community Approaches
- (8) Publication of Research and
- (9) Special Rehabilitation Programs as a means to resolve the low-income of farmers".

We believe that recommendation No. 8 is incomplete. We suggest that too much time has been spent on research and not enough on program development and co-ordination with other departments which are involved in rural development.

14. We also believe that recommendation No. 12 by the Agricultural Task Force in chapter dealing with credit should be implemented to solve the low-income problem.

"As a special subsidiary to the Federal Provincial Agricultural Credit Board, a Rural Development Credit Agency should be created. The Agency's attention should be devoted entirely to providing credit to the non-commercial low-income farmers. Its operation should be flexible—in order to ensure that there is a minimum of duplication and omission among existing programs relating to the poverty sector in agriculture. The Agency should count as its successes, those loans and assistance which result in a farmer graduating to commercial credit terms".

We do not agree with some of the other recommendations such as No. 10 which states that governments should not subsidize interest rates.

There were over 29,000 farm families in Alberta who were living in poverty in 1968 on the basis of taxation statistics. The assumption is made that families are living in poverty if their total family income (excluding non-taxable transfer payments) is less than their total exemptions and deductions allowed for individual families under the Income Tax Act. In spite of the fact that total physical output of agricultural production and per capita production in farming reached an all time high in 1966, one half of the farmers in the Province were still non-taxable during the taxation years 1966, 1967 and 1968. Net farm income has been dropping since 1966. If we ignore income in kind, net income per farm dropped over 43 per cent from 1966 and over 1969. On the basis of 1969 farm income and outlook for 1970, one half the farmers will continue to remain non-taxable. Considering the fact that the cost of living has been increasing rapidly and wages and salaries have been rising for many others to keep up with inflation, farmers are actually worse off now relative to the rest of society than they were a few years ago.

There were nearly 1,200 farm families who were receiving provincial and municipal assistance last year. In addition there were some 2,500 farm families who received special provincial government loans for living expenses because of the short-run agricultural crisis that has developed during the last two years.

Life on the farm has changed rapidly during the last two decades. Fewer farmers have excess of farm grown produce because they have specialized their production. This means that their off-farm needs for production inputs and family living have increased considerably. With the decrease in rural population, the cost of many goods and services have increased as farmers have to travel further to receive them.

There has been a significant increase in the numbers of farmers reporting off-farm income to supplement their farm income. In spite of the fact that many farmers sell very little farm produce, their total income from all sources is higher, in many cases, than of those farmers reporting considerably more in farm sales. This suggests that many part-time operators, if moved out of agriculture would be made worse off considering the higher living expenses in urban areas. Furthermore, many of the part-time operators have very limited agricultural resources that could be added to those remaining in agriculture for expansion purposes.

The number of young people entering agriculture has dropped significantly in recent years. Other young people who are farming would like to leave the industry for other jobs if they could. However, they have found many barriers to occupational mobility that need to be overcome. Many farmers like their occupation and are so satisfied with farming as a way of life that they are reluctant to move regardless of the economic benefits they would receive outside of farming.

Many farmers are caught on the border line. When markets for their products are unfavorable, incomes drop and they fall into the poverty group. Attempts have been made by farm organizations and governments to stabilize and increase prices by various means. The obstacles in this direction have been exceptionally difficult to surmount. Farmers are optimistic (if they were not we would not have any farmers today) that things will improve next year. In the meantime many live under substandard conditions, hoping that somehow, somewhere, things will improve.

FACTORS AFFECTING ECONOMIC GROWTH IN THE BONNYVILLE REGION 1967

By Elmer C. Allen

Abstract

Many agricultural areas in Canada have low farm incomes relative to other higher income agricultural areas. This is partly due to the rapid agriculture change taking place today. Slow economic growth is usually attributed to inferior quality and smaller quantities of physical resources per worker. Adoption of new technology, farming practices and large capital investment in the more affluent agriculture regions has served to increase the difference in income between farms and regions.

In this study, two regions were selected in Alberta. Factors which contributed to economic growth in the high-income Red Deer area were isolated and compared with those in the low-income Bonnyville area. It was found that Bonnyville farmers had low incomes because inadequate amounts of resources were available to combine with the existing labor force. Furthermore the low-income region did not use existing resources efficiently. With improved management, more efficient use of resources, and increase in the farm size a considerable increase in the agricultural region's economic goals could be achieved.

It is unlikely that a more favorable growth rate can be achieved without stimulation from outside the region. This is where ARDA and other resource development programs can play a big role in improving the low-income problem of rural regions.

Summary and Conclusions

The rate of economic growth in Bonnyville, measured by gross income per operator in constant dollars, has not improved relative to Red Deer growth. Bonnyville farmers are as far behind as they were 25 years ago. At that time Red Deer farmers had twice the average gross farm income per operator and although 25 years later both regions had doubled their gross output per operator, Red Deer farmers still maintained the same relative position over Bonnyville farmers.

One reason why Bonnyville farmers have not overcome the differential income gap is the change in total regional output over time. Over the last 25 years, Red Deer increased her total regional output by 50 percent, where as Bonnyville only made a 21 percent increase. As a result of low regional productivity, rapid off farm migration occurred and some 800 (40 per cent) farm operators left the Bonnyville area between 1941 and 1961. The net farm income of the remaining farms is still considerably below that of the provincial average.

The economic growth that did occur could be attributed to three major agricultural adjustments. There was a significant increase in all aspects of farm size in the Bonnyville area. Total farm acreage increased so that presently it is similar to Red Deer farms. More significant was the increased acreage in Bonnyville farms from 64 cultivated acres in 1936 to 220 cultivated acres in 1961. In Red Deer the change was from 160 acres to 276 acres.

Change in livestock production paralleled the change in gross income in both regions over time. Red Deer farmers on the average had twice as many cattle and hogs per farm as did Bonnyville some 2 or 3 decades ago and the same relative difference exists today.

Total capital investment per farm also relates to the trend in gross farm income. Total capital investment in both regions had increased ten fold in current dollars since 1936. Red Deer farms maintained about twice the average capital investment per farm as Bonnyville farmers. However, the distribution of capital investment among resources which was similar at one time, has changed. Today, Red Deer farms have considerably more invested in land and buildings whereas Bonnyville farms have increased investment in machinery and livestock. The distribution of farms by size of investment is markedly different in the two areas also. One half of the Bonnyville farms have a total investment below $25,000 whereas only 10 percent of the Red Deer farms are in this category.

Failure to gain capital to combine with existing labor, appears to be another cause of differing gross farm incomes in the two regions. Larger amounts of working and operating capital would help achieve the general economic objectives of the region. In the Bonnyville area over one half of the farmers said that they did not have sufficient capital in contrast to one quarter of the Red Deer farmers. Moreover the average loan in Red Deer was nearly twice as large as that in Bonnyville which reported 7 percent more loans.

Although there were more people per farm operator in Bonnyville, there was a larger labor force in man-years of available labor on Red Deer farms. Even though there was more labor in Red Deer, the labor was more efficiently employed in terms of output per man-year than in Bonnyville. In other words there was more underemployed labor in Bonnyville than on Red Deer farms. However, quality of labor is probably much more important as far as farm production is concerned. In comparing managerial ability in the regions, Red Deer farm operators were far ahead of Bonnyville operators. Management was no doubt a factor relating to the size and determining the productivity of the farm.

Net farm income and family earnings were closely related to the quantity and quality of available resources per operator. As a result, the majority of the Bonnyville farms earned low net incomes, 67 percent earning less than $2,000 as compared with only 25 percent of the Red Deer farms. In their own value terms, 85 percent of the Bonnyville farmers and 40 percent of the Red Deer farmers stated that their incomes were unsatisfactory. The average net farm income was $1,325 in Bonnyville and $4,599 in Red Deer. The Bonnyville farmers gained 41 percent of their family farm income from non-farm sources as compared to 19 percent in Red Deer. Off-farm income did help to alleviate the low farm income problem for some of the farmers. While large differences in incomes may be attributed to inadequacy of farm capital per unit of labor, intensity of land use, and managerial ability, other differences in weather and farm size were undoubtedly important.

In spite of adjustments made to increase the efficiency of farm commodity production and labor migration, agricultural incomes remained relatively low. Most of the farmers in Bonnyville own too few resources which can be combined with labor to earn satisfactory incomes. It was found that not only do Bonnyville farmers lack sufficient resources but that available resources were not being employed efficiently.

By increasing the scale of farm, Bonnyville farmers could expect farm returns to increase by a factor of 1.6, whereas Red Deer farmers had constant returns to scale. In addition to increasing the size of farm, Bonnyville farmers would benefit if resources were used in different ratios. Increasing livestock production, land acres, coarse grain and forage, while decreasing wheat acreage and summer fallow would increase income considerably. However, to make these changes necessitates a larger amount of capital, more off-farm migration, more land consolidation and more and better management. It is obvious that external help from other institutions is necessary to facilitate these changes.

APPENDIX B

OFF-FARM MIGRANTS: A CASE STUDY OF CHARACTERISTICS AND ADJUSTMENTS, 1968

By G. Wayne Lamble

Summary

The objective of this study was to learn some of the characteristics of farm people in Alberta who have left farming for non-farm employment, the main factors influencing this decision to move, and the consequences of these moves. Some of the more relevant findings of this analysis have been summarized in this section.

The Pre-Migration Situation

Nearly 90 percent of the migrants had been raised on farms and they had spent an average of 19 years trying to succeed at their preferred occupation and way of life. The average age of the migrants when they left farming was 43 years; 3 years less than the average for farm operators as a whole. Nevertheless, this represented an age disadvantage for many of the migrants in seeking non-farm employment.

About three quarters of the migrants had children of school and pre-school age living at home who also shared in the experience of moving from the farm to a non-farm environment. The average family size was 4.7, somewhat larger than the average Alberta farm family of 4.2 and 3.7 for Alberta urban families.

While the level of formal schooling attained did not appear to impede nor encourage off-farm migration, the migrants reflected the general low level of education of farm operators which is much lower than many other members of the labor force. Thus well over one half of the migrants were also educationally handicapped and restricted in the kinds of jobs for which they qualified.

About one in four reported having acquired some non-farm skills prior to leaving the farm; mostly in the form of apprenticeship or on-the-job training such as carpentry, mechanics, plumbing, welding, and some business experience. Over one half of the respondents had worked off the farm, mostly on a part-time or seasonal basis, during the five years prior to leaving their farm. These tended to be the men who had smaller than average farms, producing very low net incomes. Although the off-farm work was often low paying, it had provided a relatively regular and stable supplement to their inadequate farm income and provided an opportunity to acquire marketable non-farm skills.

Migrants had smaller farms. The median size was 320 acres or 160 acres of improved land. Similarly, average capital investment was nearly half that of non-migrant farms. Two thirds of the migrants had operated farms with a capital value of less than $24,950. However, operator equity in this investment was high with only 57 percent reporting any outstanding liabilities prior to migration, and the median amount for this group was only $3,000.

Almost one half of the farms had produced less than $3,750 in gross sales annually. A similar proportion of former farmers had to supplement their farm income with off-farm work. The median off-farm earnings of this group was $1,500 per year and accounted for over 50 percent of their total family income.

The Decision to Leave Farming

More than 60 percent of the migrants had been thinking of making the move for a year or more before they actually left the farm. Much of the decision process was concerned with the resolution of mixed and conflicting feelings concerning their farms. As a group, the former farmers showed more areas of agreement concerning why they liked farming than why they disliked it. Nearly all reported attractive features or advantages that reflected the social-psychological attributes of farming such as feelings of independence, serene atmosphere, close family and neighbor relationships, and personal satisfaction of working with plants and animals. On the other hand, almost all of the migrants reported important disadvantages of low and unstable financial returns, hard working conditions, and dependence upon weather and market conditions.

The primary reasons given for leaving farming were economic in character, although they were aggravated by general conditions of work and life in the farm environment. Almost two out of three reported economic and financial reasons; more specifically, inadequate and uncertain high production costs, low prices, crop failure, and shortage of land, labor, and capital. Twenty percent of the migrants, most of whom were from the high-income area, gave personal factors of ill health and advancing age as their most important reason for leaving the farm. Social-psychological factors were the major reason for 14 percent of the migrants. They generally reflected a desire for better working and living conditions than were available on the farm.

Many might have moved sooner had they been able to see satisfactory alternatives and solve some of the uncertainties involved in migration. Others were "getting by" and were reluctant to leave the family farm, hoping things would improve before they were forced to move. While a critical health problem or crop failure and finding a buyer for the farm were often factors that finally resulted in actual migration, locating a alternative employment opportunity was the single most important final element in the decision to leave farming. Consequently, most migrants had found employment by the time they left the farm, and very few were not employed within a month of leaving.

Contacts with friends and relatives appeared to be the only form of assistance that a few of the migrants had in obtaining non-farm employment. This greatly limited the effective geographical area for which suitable employment opportunities could be found. About three quarters of the respondents had moved less than 30 miles from their former farms, and most had remained in their original community.

Almost half of the migrants had sold their farm when they first quit farming, but most of the others preferred to go through a transitional period in which they retained ownership of their farm for some time as a means of maintaining some feeling of security.

The Post-Migration Experiences

The relatively short distance moved by the majority of the migrants considerably reduced the difficulties associated with making adjustments to non-farm employment and living. Only 30 percent reported having experienced any notable difficulties and of these, finding suitable employment was the most serious problem. Those affected tended to be older, with low levels of education and had no non-farm training or work experience. Adjusting to increased cash living expenses and to the impersonal nature of urban living posed a difficulty for a few, especially those moving greater distances to larger towns and cities.

The migrants chose a wide variety of non-farm employment, but concentrated in the unskilled, service, clerical, and sales categories. The more frequently mentioned jobs included janitor service, road construction and public works laborers, carpenters, mechanical workers, and sales jobs.

Seventy percent of the group had not experienced any unemployment since leaving the farm and a similar proportion had made no change in jobs during that time either. Only 12 percent reported any dissatisfaction with their non-farm jobs due to low wages, long hours of work, and hard working conditions.

Four out of five migrants had realized an increase in their family income by making the initial move to non-farm employment. Moreover, 90 percent continued to increase their level of earnings as they spent more time in the non-farm labor force. The average increase was 5.9 percent yearly. By 1966 the median level of employment earnings was $4,200. Including other sources of income the average total family income was $5,685 per year.

Thirty percent of the former farmers had experienced some residential mobility after leaving the farm but the majority of this group had moved only once, usually to purchase their own house or in quest of better living conditions. There was a decline in their involvement in voluntary organizations in the community as family and kinship continued to play an important role for their companion and recreational needs.

The families were generally satisfied with their new location; only 12 percent indicated that they would like to move to another area. Their attitudes toward the non-farm environment revealed that they tended to stress the occupational and material advantages of living in town and to consider many of the social-psychological aspects as disadvantages.

Despite the off-farm migration that has occurred, in some areas the rate has been too slow, and there has been a tendency for labor to accumulate as apparent and disguised unemployment. The low productivity of these people contributes to rural poverty and economic stagnation. Evidently a higher rate of migration would be necessary to bring about improved utilization of resources and well-being of the individuals and families.

The wide variety of characteristics among those leaving farms suggests that if confronted with comparable economic, sociological, and personal problems and frustrations, many other farm operators would also decide to leave to enter non-farm employment. There is evidence that a higher rate of migration can be met from farms. In the study conducted in 1965 of the Bonnyville district, there were 44 per cent of the farm operators who indicated willingness to leave farming to accept non-farm employment. They had been unable to do so for a number of reasons, most important being the absence of alternative job opportunities, lack of alternative skills and job training, and low levels of education.

There is now unprecedented need for public policy and programs which will give special consideration to the circumstances that impede mobility and structural change in agriculture. As revealed in this study and in others, the diversity in the characteristics of migrants and potential migrants necessitates a variety of programs to meet a variety of needs.

The varied farm experience background may be an asset in many jobs such as construction, road building, operating machinery, and businesses related to farming. But employment will continue to grow faster in the service industries than in productive industries. While it is expected that there will be substantial increases in requirements for proprietors and managers, clerical and sales people, skilled craftsmen and service workers, and smaller increases among semi-skilled, the need for unskilled labor will not likely increase. The big challenge, then, for farm people desiring to change occupations will be to meet the technical and professional requirements of alternative opportunities.

One of the barriers to occupational mobility is that the marginal value product of the new entrant is less than his cost to the employer until he has acquired the necessary skills to perform effectively in his new job. As minimum wages increase, this gap may become so high that no industry can afford to hire an unskilled worker.

These points illustrate the great need for occupational training, training that will enable migrants to qualify for skilled jobs that are available. Part-time off-farm work is a popular avenue to full-time non-farm work which enables individuals to obtain non-farm work experiences as well as training. Moreover, such a system of in-place training can reduce placement problems. Chances for other non-farm employment are improved if a migrant shows a prospective employer previous non-farm work experience. Likewise, if the migrant has some satisfactory experience in non-farm employment, the personal uncertainty of leaving farming is reduced.

Co-operation and guidance from local business and industrial groups are needed, especially since most operators have a desire to remain in the area where they farmed. This requires planned programs of economic development of local resources in broadening employment opportunities. Consideration may also be given to assistance and training programs helping those with potential managerial ability to use their special skills in developing their own business to provide needed community services.

Training and retraining costs should not be borne entirely by the first non-farm employer since once achieved, they become part of the skills of the individual trainee and may not be captured by the employer. Such training should be the function of a public agency, or a public subsidy should be provided to cover the cost incurred by a trainee in a private firm. Where retraining of a farm operator occurs away from their home area, training may be more effective if provision is made to move the rest of the family with him. This may require providing housing for the family near the training site and intensive counseling with regard to making social and living adjustments. Arrangements for a flexible training schedule adapted to variations in seasonal labor requirements, including individual tutoring and remedial education may also be necessary. Finally, specialized forms of financial assistance involving grants and loans for subsistence during periods of training and unemployment that may accompany transition to a new job as well as to overcome economic obstacles to geographic relocation should be available.

There is a need for expanded services of employment agencies at the farm level to test, counsel and place those interested in occupational mobility. Evidence indicates that potential migrants usually have quite limited knowledge of the alternatives open to them, including programs of assistance as well as labor market information.

Agricultural extension has a responsibility in agriculture that extends beyond improving production and efficiency to include areas of adjustment associated with human resources. It should attempt to establish an understanding by farmers of what adjustment in reorganization and management of farms is required to fit future conditions. The earlier potential migrants decide to leave farming, the easier the overall adjustment.

Many migrants would leave sooner if they could sell their farms. Programs of public purchase of such farms or credit programs to assist private consolidation would ease this impediment.

Other so-called "boxed-in" farm operators are often beyond the age where migration normally occurs. It is quite unrealistic to expect these persons to make substantial occupational and geographic moves. Programs of early retirement and terminating compensatory payments may be a more reasonable approach in such instances.

A necessary prerequisite for greater occupational mobility from farm to non-farm is a strong labor market. A slack labor market reduces the incentives to change occupations, to educate oneself, or to move geographically because of the risk of being unemployed thereafter.

These, as well as other programs, are possible approaches needed to improve manpower mobility potential in agriculture. The effects and evaluation of any alternatives may best be provided by scientific experimentation with different types of programs. However, in view of the changes taking place and the importance of occupational and geographic mobility of labor to a solution of low-income problems in rural Canada, manpower policy for agriculture must be related explicitly to national manpower policy and to general economic goals.

The 6,328 farmers who reported gross sales between $3,750 and $5,000 in 1966 would now have returns between $4,500 and $6,000. Assuming one-half of Alberta farmers are below the poverty level (taxation statistics) a price increase of 20 percent would remove about 7 percent of the farmers out of the poverty class. However, the income disparity between low-income and high income group becomes even wider i.e. those with $12,000 gross sales receive 60 percent more income while those selling $2,500 receive only 50 percent more income.

Appendix C

Hypothetical example of effect of a price increase for Alberta farmers

	25th Percentile	50th Percentile	75th Percentile
Gross Sales.....	$2,500	$5,000	$12,000
Expenses.....	1,500	3,200	8,000
Net.....	1,000	1,800	4,000
Now with a 20 percent increase in prices holding other factors constant
Gross Sales.....	3,000	6,000	14,400
Expenses.....	1,500	3,200	8,000
Net.....	1,500	2,800	6,400
Change in income.	+50%	+56%	+60%
Income up.....	+50%	+56%	+60%

In addition to the above farmers there are many part-time farmers who probably would rise above the poverty level if their gross returns rose by 20 percent. Furthermore, there are others who by our standards would still be living in poverty but many of the farmers perhaps would think differently. In other words, instead of only 7 percent being raised above the poverty level, it is possible that perhaps some 15 percent of the farmers would feel they moved out of the poverty group.

PRELIMINARY INFORMATION:

The Special Project was initiated two years ago out of mounting concern for the welfare of chronically dependent, multi-problem social assistance clients. The concern was twofold:

(1) There was an increase in the number of unemployed employable persons on the welfare rolls which represent an increasing social and economic cost to society.

(2) We knew very little about effective approaches to meet the needs of these people.

The purpose of the Special Project was to devise effective social service techniques and to study the needs of the unemployed employable person who was currently on the welfare rolls.

Through cooperative efforts of all three levels of government, a grant was secured from the Department of National Health and Welfare, Welfare Grants Division, to support a demonstration project. At the present time, the action phase of the study has been completed and staff are writing up a comprehensive report of the experience and findings. This Project grew out of the three city study, Edmonton, Winnipeg and Ottawa which was undertaken earlier by Dr. Paul Geisel of the Canadian Welfare Council. There were three demonstration projects planned for Canada, but due to unforeseen events, Edmonton was the only city fortunate enough to get its project off the ground. This brief is concerned with the unemployed employable person as related to social assistance funds. Many of the observations have been derived from the research and experiences gained by staff and clients in the operation of the demonstration project.

In staffing the demonstration project, the decision was made to bring together people from different professional backgrounds. With a multi-disciplinary team contributing ideas and experience, a comprehensive service unit was established for the purpose of implementing an experimental approach to the problem. Staff were recruited with the research associate, a social psychologist, being the only one having had prior experience in the social assistance field. The director's professional identification was in psychiatric social work, with experience in several private agencies. Three staff counsellors were identified with the profession of social work, adult education and psychology. The Special Project receptionist-secretary was recruited from the stenographic pool of the City Social Service Department and was familiar with many aspects of the Department's operations. The research director, a sociologist, was retained on a part-time basis and had extensive experience and knowledge of social action research.

The social assistance clients actively served by the Project consisted of males under 45, living with a spouse or having a history of a stable common-law union. There were to be no serious physical handicaps or mental defects present or known at the time of referral. These people were referred to the Special Project by the regular Provincial Department of Social Development and City Social Service Departments. Clients with the above characteristics were randomly assigned to either the Project or a comparison group.

LIVING IN CONDITIONS OF POVERTY:

All of the people dealt with in the Special Project were in relative states of poverty. They were poor to the extent that they had exhausted all of their own financial resources and had become dependent upon the welfare system. There are many other people who live in poverty who do not come under the jurisdiction of welfare programs or are differently characterized. This brief does not concern itself with those populations. The best estimates of the number of unemployed employable people in our society indicate that this group comprises a small proportion of the total population. In Alberta, it is estimated that there are approximately 4,000 employable unemployed individuals on the Provincial public assistance rolls. To this must be added a number of spouses and dependent children that are affected by the status of these unemployed individuals. While we refer only to a specific and limited type of social assistance client, we feel that this experience has implications for many others in the welfare situation. In Alberta, the number of people seeking social assistance is increasing and it is at the same time increasingly more difficult for a person in a poverty cycle to extricate himself. Our society has become complex and at the same time our clients indicate that they are alienated from one another and have fewer relationships to fall back on at a time of crisis in their lives.

Two different kinds of poverty, very closely inter-related became evident. First, there was poverty involving the simple lack of money. Second, there was a type of poverty characterized by demoralization, despair, and hopelessness. These individuals were lacking in the spirit of life and had simply resigned themselves to a vegetative kind of existence.

CONFRONTING DESPAIR:

During the last two years we were in contact with people who were experiencing both types of poverty simultaneously. They both lacked money and spirit with which to re-establish themselves in the mainstream of our society. In reviewing our service it seems that the greatest perceived benefit was the opportunity provided for personal confrontation. Clients often indicated that for the first time they had an experience where someone was willing to tell them exactly what was seen as their responsibility to themselves and to the rest of society. It was important to them to have someone who really cared and who was willing to help them restore hope for the future. Concluding research interviews with clients indicate that the experience of confrontation in a context of personal involvement was a most significant aspect of the experience. Even though their past functioning was not conducive to productive employment, we found that when given the opportunity these people were willing to confront themselves. They were willing to deal with their own inadequate attitudes when they saw that by doing so they would earn another chance to prove their own worth to themselves and the rest of society. Through this experience a glimmer of hope was restored. As attitudes changed, they became more content with themselves and were able to move toward a realistic life plan and formulate sound goals. The spirit of the service rendered was to try to meet the people on their own ground and provide the necessary supporting services to do what was thought necessary. There was joint responsibility in this relationship and each counsellor was accountable to his client; likewise the client was accountable to his counsellor.¹ This was the common meeting ground on which we were able to meet and begin realistic planning with the unemployed employable men and their families.

EXPERIMENTAL TRANSACTIONS:

In keeping with the above philosophy, the following is a sample of the innovative approaches utilized in the Project.

1. Informal Operational Procedure:

- (a) Location of Office—an office having easy street level accessibility was secured apart from the regular welfare offices in Edmonton.

(b) Coffee Urn in Waiting Area—by initiating an easy informal reception area where coffee was always available and where our receptionist was encouraged to engage in conversation with clientele, we were able to help them feel welcome and relaxed while waiting for an interview.

(c) Personality and Location of Secretary by having a small waiting room area and by having our secretary keep appointment schedules, running on a prompt basis, we were able to demonstrate to people that they counted and were worthwhile, and helped them to begin feeling this way.

(d) Staff Relations—staff were encouraged to call each other by first names and also to address clients on a first name basis. Introductions were made among staff and clients so that people would gain experience in meeting others who were strange to them. It appears that in this way and in other ways we were able to reduce alienation.

2. Client Involvement:

(a) Client Committee—the purpose of the client committee, a group initiated by staff, but later became self-governing, was to give feedback to the Special Project staff relative to the services rendered.

(b) Client Budget Committee—the purpose of this committee was to review grievances between staff and clients over matters related to budget control of the social assistance funds in individual situations were clients and staff were not able to come to an agreement. The budget committee was elected from the main client committee body and had authority to make changes as they deemed necessary. This committee acted responsibly and was a definite asset to both staff and clients.

(c) Assessment Meeting—clients, their wives and sometimes older children were included in assessment planning meetings and were required to read the staff assessment report. This included impressions from staff of the client's personality, and current life situation. Attacking the problem with this degree of openness on the part of professionals and clients resulted in increased trust and client involvement as well as a clearer analysis of problems.

3. Staff Development:

(a) Conferences—each staff member attended a conference during the two year period of operation. The purpose was to bring back new and fresh ideas on a variety of aspects related to rendering effective social services. This policy stimulated creative thinking and input of fresh ideas. It was also instrumental in building good staff morale, and was congruent with the overall developmental philosophy of service which included not only clients but staff as well.

(b) University Courses—being located in a city with a large and comprehensive array of relevant course material available, staff were encouraged to upgrade themselves by attending the University of Alberta.

(c) Team Building—at the very outset it was necessary to spend a considerable amount of time developing a common philosophy and acceptance of the unique attributes possessed by each staff person. In addition, it was necessary to maintain this relationship on an ongoing basis by having conferences at which time staff were free to challenge each other on a personal basis.

(d) Tape Recording—a very open policy on tape recording was maintained for the purpose of staff development, greater learning and understanding of client situations.

4. Utilization of Community Resources:

(a) Psychiatric Consultation—a link was maintained with competent psychiatrists in the community for the purpose of consultation and treatment of individuals who needed and were motivated to utilize such services.

(b) Debtors Assistance—a high percentage of our clients needed to help with debt problems. Fortunately in Alberta, this service is excellent and was extremely helpful in helping people to repair the credit rating they had destroyed.

(c) Family Court—where there was clear evidence that a person refused employment and did not avail himself of appropriate services to solve his problem he was brought to court to face the question of his responsibility as head of a family. This action was initiated while maintaining a compassionate and understanding supportive relationship. This experience, along with intensive counselling services, proved to be a useful technique with carefully selected cases. Quite often clients began using the Project services in a more meaningful manner after the court experience.

(d) Academic Upgrading and Job Retraining—The resources available in Canada Manpower's Adult Upgrading Programs were helpful. Even more helpful though, in our experience, was the Alberta Vocational Training Program. Both programs were used extensively.

(e) Family Aids—the purpose of using the Family Aid program was to help the wife improve home conditions and atmosphere. Clients were able to identify with the Family Aid Worker at times when they were unable to identify with a professional counsellor.

(f) Several other resource agencies in the community were used; following is a partial list:

Division of Alcoholism
Family Service Association
Alcoholics Anonymous
Out Patient Department of the University Hospital
Legal Aid Society
Edmonton Labor Council
Edmonton Rehabilitation Center

5. Group Experiences:

(a) Retreat for Married Couples—the purpose of this retreat was to improve communication between husband and wife and allow them to be away from their families for the purpose of reassessing their situation. Help was provided for competent child care.

(b) Mens Retreat—the purpose of this experience was to set up an encounter group around theme, "Getting to Know Yourself", using an outside group dynamics consultant.

(c) Ongoing Group Experiences—the purpose of these experiences was to enhance the functioning of clients.

1. Wives' Group—the wives group brought together people with similar difficulties and gave the Project a family focus. In many instances when wives gained a different perspective of their husband's unemployed status they began working together as a team in the marriage.

2. Men's Group—A series of men's groups served to identify basic problems such as poor self-concept, uncertainty of ability or potential to achieve, etc. By listening to each other and through professional guidance of group leaders, the men began to experience satisfaction and move from a state of immobilization to action.

3. Married Couples Group—this met with varying degrees of involvement, however it is our impression that some gains were made in achieving better communication in the marriage.

6. Psychological Measurement.

(a) Personality Assessment—the purpose of this was to assess the characteristics of the client's personality and utilize these in long-range goal planning and career placement. Liabilities and assets were enumerated and the assessment results afforded the opportunity for counsellors to check their clinical impressions, allowing greater precision.

(b) Assessment of Potential—psychological tests were used to arrive at a realistic assessment of a person's potential. In many instances it was found that individuals tended to under-rate their own ability to achieve. These psychological tools were open to the clients and results were discussed with them.

7. Job Development.

(a) New Careers—the purpose of the New Career program was to use public assistance funds to develop the usefulness of a job to the point where it would be accepted by the regular system of employment as a worthwhile career. Men were not just placed, but were placed with a view to their interests and the job's potential for growth.

(b) Sheltered Work—when there was a need for development of skills using on the job training, we were able to offer financial incentive and reduce the burden of risk that a prospective employer would be taking by employing a person with a questionable background.

8. Research:

(a) Feedback was constantly gained from the Project researcher. This allowed reassessment and adjustments in research design and promoted new developments in the action phase of the Project.

(b) The fact that staff knew their performance was being measured and assessed had an effect on functional behaviour that was mostly positive.

While it is difficult to define the ingredients that go into a developmental philosophy, one of them certainly is flexibility. This is readily observed in the above outline. Our caseloads were small enough to permit involvement of sound personal relationships. Of critical importance was the formulation of a plan by the client, in cooperation with his social worker, by which he proposed to re-establish himself in society.

There are at least two sets of dynamics influencing the problem of the employable unemployed social assistance client. A set of dynamics that encompasses the individual's personality is discussed in the literature and all that needs to be said is that many of our clients are personally inadequate to meet the demands placed on them in the labour market.^{2,3,4}

The other set of dynamics is the complexity of the society. This complexity is exemplified by the client's inability to cope with consumer credit resources; the highly differentiated job market; the law; and the large scale helping agencies in the urban community. Inadequate wages and the lack of job opportunities contributes to a competitiveness that forces some people to the bottom of the ladder. This causes people to lose sight of their objective, give up hope, and subsequently drop out of the labour force. This dynamic interacts with the person's personality difficulties so that some of these people are compelled to apply for social assistance. Once dependent on social assistance the client finds himself financially reinforced for failure. This leads to a cycle of dependency difficult to break. Stigmatized by his society and marginally supported in his failure he makes attempts towards self-support—fails—returns to welfare and is further rewarded for his failure by another cheque. As time progresses these attempts are fewer until welfare becomes a predictable, marginal, yet safe way of life.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

A. Specific Recommendations to Social Assistance Services

1. It is recommended that facilities and services be organized in such a manner as to permit a general, informal personal operational procedure.

2. It is recommended that inter-disciplinary comprehensive diagnostic services be available and utilized in a planned and disciplined manner.

3. It is recommended that a client voice in the control of public assistance funds be implemented on a cooperative and organized basis.

4. It is recommended that assessment, or goal planning meetings, be held with teams of staff, with clients participating to implement goals and facilitate involvement.

5. It is recommended that social assistance programs build in outside consultation aimed at improving operational techniques and to provide new and up to date knowledge.

6. It is recommended that social assistance departments set up ongoing demonstration staff units exploring innovative approaches, acting as training units, working with difficult cases and reporting regularly to staff operating the social assistance program.

7. It is recommended that social assistance administration be done flexibly keeping in mind the unique and differential needs and levels of potential of different clients.

8. It is recommended that in social assistance units, intensive services involve teamwork. This concept involves the assignment of a case to one primary worker but the case is the responsibility of the entire team rather than any single individual.

9. It is recommended that a staff development program be implemented involving, among other things, sending staff to conferences or seminars related specifically to their tasks and job performance, for the purpose of bringing back into the program fresh enthusiasm and creative ideas.

10. It is recommended that the task of postulating problems amenable to research be assigned a high priority in the job performance of staff in social assistance programs.

11. It is recommended that ongoing research be implemented by social assistance departments in order to develop up to date and relevant programing.

B. General Overall Recommendations for Welfare Policy:

1. We recommend that a national policy clearly defining the level of poverty must be agreed upon and that the amelioration thereof must be seen as a goal toward which we must strive.

2. We recommend that intensive social services be designed to function with selected unemployed employable social assistance clients to effect their placement back into the mainstream of society. This necessitates a change in philosophy in that we must view financial need on a differential basis and give greater priority to separating financial services from social services. It is then possible to intervene in a client's life to prevent the further breakdown of social functioning by providing the option of intensive service.

3. We recommend a modern work requirement in welfare programming that takes account of job availability. Fiscal and manpower policies must be planned in harmony in order that all individuals can be assisted to utilize their potential in tasks that will be meaningful to them and to society at large. It may be necessary to institute a public employment program as part of the set of policies which will make this recommendation practical.

4. We recommend that a national policy on the level of poverty be congruent with a federal program of income maintenance in the form of a universal minimum income such as the demogrant. This procedure, we think, will restore respect and integrity to individuals, allow the retrieval of funds from those who do not need them through income tax measures, and remove the detrimental effect caused by the present contamination of social work services that occurs through the administration of financial assistance.

SUMMARY:

One of the facts ascertained in the experience of the Special Project is that people do not feel worthwhile or have integrity unless they feel they are contributing and doing their share as members of society. On the surface it may seem that some people do not want to take this responsibility seriously but when incentive is provided we find that a new kind of "esprit de corps" evolves and the result is participation.

Social services offered by the demonstration project achieved a positive response from clients and a compatibility with their needs to be productive members of society. There were some clients who were initially unhappy about the confrontation effected, but after more thought many were able to say it had been a good experience. Basically, this confrontation consisted of their realization of their responsibility to themselves and society. Favourable rapport and mutual respect were gained when people were faced with the question of whose responsibility they were, especially in light of the knowledge gained of their good potential and subsequent ability to function independently. As well, they were able to participate in their own assessment and had constant access to Project staff. They were able to affect policy and operation as well as themselves being affected by these.

When clients make the decision to accept consequences of their behaviour, it is necessary to have a network of services to follow through with their plans. This network of services must be backed up in social legislation which helps to promote relationships to develop in a compassionate manner.

It must be especially noted that without a congenial host and sponsor the demonstration project could not have functioned and achieved the results and experiences compiled to date. The host organization must be willing to take risks and allow experimentation even if this sometimes necessitates difficulties for them. Sincere appreciation and thanks go to the City Social Service Department in Edmonton who made this Project and these findings possible.

SPECIAL PROJECT
CLIENT COMMITTEE BRIEF
EDMONTON, ALBERTA

JUNE, 1970

PURPOSE

The purpose of this brief is to express the needs and wants of the clients of the Special Project and to show what has been accomplished by clients in the Special Project.

DESCRIPTION OF THE SPECIAL PROJECT

The Special Project's purpose is to test the hypothesis that, given intensive counselling, encouragement, and mobilization of existing resources, a social assistance client can be channelled into a satisfactory job placement that will result in eventual reduction of dependency and the need for financial assistance.

SOME ASPECTS OF THE SERVICE:

(1) The Special Project has a very flexible staff and administration, which is an asset.

(2) The staff holds an assessment meeting with each individual at an appropriate time.

(3) The clientele of the Special Project is treated by the staff as individuals and responsible citizens—not like numbers. In order to keep this type of atmosphere, the location of the Special Project is entirely on its own, away from the regular system.

(4) The staff gives an individual the training to find himself, his real self, and to know himself a great deal better.

(5) The staff leaves the ideas of jobs and school up to each individual client, allowing him to make his own decision on his own future. Each must decide for himself.

(6) Vouchers are not used in finances; if necessary the Debtors' Assistance Board is contacted through Project staff to relieve clients of overpowering debts. Marital counselling is given, or other supportive counselling as the case may be.

SERVICE AND RECREATION:

(7) Group discussions and counselling for the clients have proven to have very good results.

(8) Outdoor camping for group sensitivity therapy and discussions have given clients, once again, self-understanding and feelings of self-worth.

(9) There are men's meetings and couples meetings (man and wife) once a week.

(10) Staff members visit clients in their homes. Clients may call their counsellor at any time of the day or night, in cases of deep depression or the need to talk with someone. These situations frequently occur.

OPERATIONAL PROCEDURE:

Many concepts of the philosophy and methodology unique to the operation of the Special Project are best understood and illustrated by following a hypothetical case. Referral is primarily accomplished through the cooperation of staff in the City Social Service Department or Edmonton Regional Offices of the Department of Social Development. The criteria for referral are:

1. Male, under 45, living with spouse, or history of a stable common-law union.

2. No obvious serious physical handicaps.

3. For research purposes, the client must not be told anything about the Special Project. When contact is made the Project is explained.

When a referring worker calls the Special Project, clients are either accepted or put on a waiting list. When it is possible to accept a client into the caseload the referring worker and the project counsellor usually make their own decision on how the referral may be best accomplished. Both staff members may meet jointly with the prospective client, at other times the client may be referred directly to the Special Project without the presence of his previous worker. During the initial interview, aims and objectives of the Special Project are discussed openly, and the client is told this represents an experimental approach geared to finding new ways of better assisting people in our society. He is told the Project is looking for people to voluntarily participate, but it is emphasized that he need not feel compelled to do so. He is told that involvement is desired with both him and his family. He is also informed that there will be interest in his personality, aptitudes, and interests, and that he would be expected to participate in psychological testing.

If he decides to become a client of the Special Project he is seen by the counsellor who will carry primary responsibility for the case. As soon as possible he is introduced to all members of the staff and the principal counsellor conducts several interviews to gather information. The objective of this process is to get to know the individual as a person and not simply as a welfare client or a file number. This process is central to the Special Project and begins with the receptionist greeting the person, offering him a cup of coffee, helping him feel comfortable in the waiting room, and generally relating to him as another human being.

As soon as sufficient rapport is present an extensive psychological test battery is initiated. This battery includes the Edwards Personal Preference Schedule, 16 Personality Factor Questionnaire, Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory, the Heimler Scale of Social Functioning, the Revised Beta Examination, Self Analysis Form and the Neuroticism Scale Questionnaire. While not a regular part of the test battery, other instruments are used in a discretionary manner.

When the staff worker has sufficient knowledge of the person to develop a plan, an assessment meeting is called. Staff attempt to learn as much as possible about the client's life style in order to make an assessment of how realistic any proposed plan may be.

Having developed long and short range goals through assessment meetings and group sessions, intensive counselling by unit staff and/or the utilization of appropriate community resources are implemented. There is continued involvement and periodic reviews. The process is highly individualized and also presents a challenge to each staff member to use his own initiative and creativity in regard to approaches which will work for a particular client.

In addition to individual interviews, the staff conduct group sessions. One group involves only men and was set up initially because they observed that many of the clients were astute at determining what was wrong with other social assistance clients, but didn't have much insight into their own situations. The group experiences revealed that the clients are able to talk to one another and establish rapport. This developed to the point of actual confrontations if thinking by a particular group member became unrealistic.

Another has been the married couples group. Groups of this kind have focused primarily on the lack of communication between husband and wife. It was felt that in many instances the married couples lacked information and did not have sufficient security in their own personality to be able to communicate real feelings to their spouse. The group has accomplished this purpose having had outside people come in to speak and to discuss everyday problems. Both groups have been somewhat unstructured and open-ended in their membership, however recently clients have recommended closed membership. The wives have also formed a group, meeting with government officials and meeting with the men's group for discussions on various situations. The wives client committee work with the men's committee cooperating on many matters.

THE NEED FOR MAINTAINING THE SPECIAL PROJECT

It should be noted that because of more flexible administration of assistance (i.e. incentive, etc.) and because of higher per family per month earnings, the average family that the Special Project has been working with has a higher total monthly income. This flexibility in the administration of assistance seems to have been beneficial because Project clients have entered work or education earlier, more often, and kept at it much longer than those in the regular Provincial or City systems.

The longer the social assistance experience, the shorter the duration of jobs, the fewer the attempts to get jobs. Several studies have shown and the Special Project study has upheld the idea that from initial application to assistance to about 6 months appears to be a reorganization: during this time jobs don't seem to be the first priority, and financial assistance seems to be used as a breathing space to reorganize and make plans. After the 6 month period attempts to get jobs increase rapidly, rising to a maximum at around 18 months and then declining so that between 2 and 3 years after initial assistance was granted, the attempts to get jobs and the successes in getting jobs is almost non-existent. It seems that a person on assistance for over 3 years has about a 90 per cent chance of staying there. Because of more frequent, closer and intensive contacts, Project clients appear to have shorter reorganization time, averaging about 3 months before work or school.

In the planning stages insight into the problems to be encountered resulted in the Special Project being provided with a variety of professional staff consisting of one psychologist, one adult educator, one female social worker, one researcher, a fine secretary, and the Project director. Changes of counsellors are possible and usually at the request of a client. If the situation comes up that a particular counsellor feels there is no communication with his client, then the counsellor, himself, will suggest to the client that a change is wise.

Very often in other agencies people wanting psychological test results never get a chance to share these results or outcomes of the testing. The Special Project, at an appropriate time, holds an assessment meeting with each individual and his wife, behind closed doors, with all members of the staff, excluding the secretary. The purpose of this gathering is to talk over the results of the tests and other information and to provide better understanding between the husband and wife. Each counsellor has his or her own view. Talking, listening, and bringing all points of view to the forefront, can help the individual to better his situation, to give more insight into his or their problems, in order to prepare them for better functioning.

In the regular system and the way it operates, individuals are treated like numbers with no sense of responsibility. In the Special Project, the clientele are treated by the staff as individuals and responsible citizens. The welfare stigma isn't hanging in the air. The whole atmosphere is completely different: you are greeted with a smile—not a glare; you are offered a cup of coffee and automatically put at ease. Provision of financial assistance is not considered the primary goal of the Project staff. Money helps any situation to a certain extent, but it is not the root of the problem or problems. Money can't buy you happiness; but understanding, concern, communication and respect can do so much for a person. For this reason and others, the Special Project is located in an isolated site, away from the regular system.

Vouchers are not used to finance the client's needs. This procedure takes a great burden off a client's shoulders—the responsibility to cash gives him back his dignity.

Group discussions and counselling among clients have helped many of the clients get to know themselves and each other, and to express themselves and get things off their chests. Many of the various problems clients have are similar, if not exactly the same as the person sitting next to him. In this way they can express their feelings comfortably, give ideas and accept ideas among each other. This has proven quite an asset. This same type of session is carried on at outdoor camps which include group sensitivity sessions, group therapy, and discussions. All of these aspects give a client the benefit of the doubt. The group meetings are held once a week with the men alone and one night a week for couples (man and wife). No one is forced or told that he better come out!

Through continued insight into existing problems a committee consisting of Project clients was born. This has provided good results in the sense that the committee has helped the staff in many areas by giving them feedback on the work and vice versa. The committee gives the men the responsibility of making decisions and the chance to get out to meet people in different levels of government and news media, to express their concerns. Many new clients who may have a misunderstanding with their counsellor and wish to change, but can't face up to the situation personally, or who may have a beef or gripe, will come to the committee first and in turn, after discussing the situation, take the beef to the counsellor or director of the Project. As a committee having gone through the mill, we can express our thoughts and honest opinions. This is why we are presenting the brief to this committee.

A budget committee was soon born out of the client committee. A client who feels he needs more money comes to this committee and explains in detail his financial situation and why he believes he needs more assistance. Three members sit on the budget committee and the majority rules in final decisions. Depending on the point of view of two out of three members of the committee, the person may get an increase or he may get less depending on the situation. The committee in turn takes this decision to Mr. Harland Magnuson, the Director. After discussing the matter with the committee, looking at reasons why it is felt that this particular client should get more or less, the final results are implemented. With all of these services used, clients have the incentive to go ahead and as a result about 70 per cent of the clients in the Special Project have been successful in job placement, upgrading in high school or N.A.I.T., etc. and literally get on the "right track" with a future in front of them. This compares with about 40 per cent in regular social service department programs.

CONCLUSION:

Granted, from one point of view the Special Project appears to be spending a large sum of money. However, from another viewpoint, very much can be gained. As mentioned above, at the latest counting about 70 per cent of the Project clients have gained success in work, training or upgrading, by using the intensive counselling services, job finding, flexible use of assistance and other aids and incentives offered by the Special Project. It is reasonable to hope that with experience, abilities and increased insight into the problems, the staff will be able to improve this percentage.

Gains are manifold in that (a) the community gains with the success of every individual graduating from an upgrading program, going into employment, and becoming productive (b) offspring may be spared the danger of becoming "second generation" welfare charges and (c) the long term cost is really a long term investment which will eventually be amply repaid through taxes and contribution of skills and abilities to the society and economy.

Suppose the program is scrapped—what is to be gained? If this is the result then those denied this kind of help and experience stand a much higher chance of having to remain dependent on welfare.

Granted it costs money to upgrade and train, but in the long run it costs more not to do this. It costs money for close, intensive counselling and personality growth, but neglect of this results in much greater eventual social and financial costs. Besides, when compared to the costs involved in the usual long-term financial maintenance program offered by regular social assistance departments, the Special Project approach is not all that expensive.

To sum up—a negative approach to this kind of service can only maintain and increase the burden on taxpayers, as well as maintaining all kinds of social ills.

I had the chance—I want others to have it too!

RESOURCE MOBILIZATION FOR EMPLOYMENT—SPECIAL PROJECT POSITION STATEMENT—NOVEMBER 1969

While it is too early to make recommendations based on findings and data of the Special Project before completion, it is possible to state observable trends that might prompt consideration of changes in current operations relevant to social assistance. Therefore, we want to take this opportunity to outline briefly some ideas that have been discussed repeatedly in our experience to date.

Change in philosophy:

In our view, the attitude of "development of potential" seems absent from a subsistence based social assistance program. This does not reflect on any one person who may be involved in administering or carrying out services to people in an economic need, but rather has its roots in the basic philosophy and purpose of the program being administered. When there is a maximum ceiling on the assistance rates to which to adhere, this becomes the social worker's goal rather than the goal being development of the person toward independence. Often, the uniqueness of the individual's situation and circumstances seem to be lost in the shuffle of the administration process.

While it is difficult to define the ingredients that go into a developmental philosophy, one of them certainly has to be flexibility. In our view, when the decision as to how much assistance is granted remains with the social worker, who is in a relationship with the client, this becomes a tool which can be used to motivate the utilization of potential. The end product of this kind of relationship can be nurturing of integrity, dignity, and self-worth which are necessary ingredients in any personality that hopes to attain any semblance of independent living. This is a self-actualizing process which enhances the client's ability to meet more realistically his responsibility in our complex society. Of critical importance is the formulation of a plan by a client in cooperation with his social worker by which the client proposes to re-establish himself in society. A flexible assistance philosophy conceives of the "budget" as being one of the tools to help implement the total plan.

We think it is very important to consider the political implications of a changed philosophy in the administration of social assistance. In order to achieve the confidence necessary to carry out a program involving a "subsistence-plus category", it must be demonstrated that in the end there are going to be savings to the tax payer, or a demonstrated measurable increase in the productivity of the human resources involved, or both; and that these will offset the added cost of an intensive goal-oriented income maintenance program. In our view, preventive social service and income maintenance must go hand in hand. If the goal is to prevent further breakdown in the social functioning of individuals, our philosophy of administering an income maintenance program must change to a developmental philosophy. People who can get help through ordinary institutional measures, on a private basis, must be encouraged to do so, but where this is impossible a question must be raised about the current prevailing attitude of insisting that a person exhaust almost all financial resources before becoming eligible for assistance. The current "hold the line" philosophy, using subsistence rates which are fixed, and a policy of eligibility which permits a client to experience total financial failure complicates the integration of preventive social services with income maintenance. There is little merit to the above practice, therefore, we must develop a program designed to intervene at a crucial time in a client's life to prevent the breakdown of social functioning from continuing.

Proposal.

From the experience gained to date in the Special Project, a logical outgrowth or plan might be as follows:

A. Discretionary powers as to the amount of assistance granted to be based on differential diagnostic intake procedure that would take into account:

- (a) present financial position of the applicant
- (b) present personality or emotional condition of the applicant
- (c) present planning and ability to develop potential toward independence.
- (d) an estimate of time necessary to achieve the plan which is outlined through intensive diagnosis. Implicit is the assumption that periodic assessment to re-evaluate the original plan will account for progress or lack of progress and allow taking new action based on experience.

B. To put validity into this kind of program there must be teeth in the law to permit social work personnel to take action to compel the applicant to be confronted with his own condition, rather than allowing him to vegetate on a subsistence budget as has happened with so many of the people we have seen to date, referred from both the Provincial and City Social Assistance Services. To allow a client to use a subsistence budget for the purpose of retreating or withdrawing from society is not preventive nor is it developmental in philosophy. We think that some clients have arrived at a stage of "mere existence" before they arrive on the doorstep to make application for money. We also believe that many have lost "hope" for themselves and must be compelled to account for the potential that is theirs to use for their own well being, as well as the well being of society. Therefore, the services of the social worker must be embedded in the law to gain the respect and attention so necessary to the task. In some instances recourse to court of law, based on realistic facts, is the force which enhances a developmental philosophy and prevents further breakdown of social functioning.

Inherent in the above outline is a proposal for action, a plan and treatment of the individual applicant who makes his immediate needs known initially through a request for money. It has been stated to us many, many times by individual applicants that they do not desire only money, but are desperate for survival and therefore present that need first. Recently, a client told an Edmonton Journal reporter "this Special Project has done much good for me. Just giving money in a normal welfare way does no good. Here, they help you gain self-respect and a job."

This quotation illustrates the need for a preventive developmental philosophy aimed at restoring independent social functioning.

In the literature it has been stated repeatedly that one cannot work on personality problems until the basic needs are met. We have experienced this in the Special Project, and in our view, it is much more realistic to have the applicant determine his own basic needs and live according to his own decision. Sometimes the applicant's desires are unrealistic in terms of basic needs. Then the onus is on the social worker to be reality oriented and the task becomes one of modifying the attitude that the client has regarding his finances. Often it is this unrealistic mode of thinking that has contributed significantly to a breakdown in social functioning to the point where the person becomes chronically dependent. This pattern of personality functioning needs intensive intervention if we hope to restore independent functioning effectively. Usually such a pattern of functioning has not developed overnight, therefore, remedial action must involve intensive counselling which has depth and understanding over a long period of time to achieve an outcome that has meaning for the client and also for society.

SPECIFIC THOUGHTS ON IMPLEMENTATION:

While we feel that it is not necessary for all staff involved in carrying out such a program to have as high educational and experience levels as the Special Project staff has currently, it is important that competent resource staff be built into the program to attain an adequate level of treatment-oriented achievement. If staff are not disciplined or effective in counselling, the program will fail because caseloads will build up and intensive services will cease. It is probably necessary to set some arbitrary limits, therefore, which will enable the Department to establish priorities on a differential diagnostic basis. It must be recognized that all cases do not require the services outlined in this proposal. It seems reasonable to delegate the administration of assistance where development of potential is not a goal to non-social work personnel. This procedure should result in some saving of time and the resulting decrease in numbers of cases per worker would allow the necessary initial planning with applicants to be carried out. The predicted overall effect of such a program will be that each year a number of clients who would otherwise remain dependent on public financial resources may be rehabilitated to the point of again contributing to the economy.

The need for this type of preventive social service program will continue to be apparent even though we may, in the future, achieve the goal of a guaranteed minimum income for all people. The complexity of our society is producing casualties who must be dealt with. In our view, we must accept the fact that financial need is only a symptom of a breakdown which has occurred in an individual's social functioning over a period of years. At this time, we have data from projects in Canada and the United States as well as from our own experience to document these facts both clinically and empirically. More knowledge is necessary and some is forthcoming, but the time for action is ripe. If we fail to provide the leadership to meet the challenge we may also lose the opportunity to use the knowledge we have available.

SUMMARY:

In summary, then, through careful diagnosis of the problems of all applicants those who are unable to benefit from intensive service because of i.e. health, injuries, extreme mental problems, etc. and have assistance administered to them without a lot of fuss, perhaps at reasonable subsistence rates. Those who could benefit from more services would then be handled with flexibility in approach and financial administration with the ultimate, ever present, highly stressed goal of EVENTUAL return to employment in a career rather than just a job. We say "eventually" because this process could be quite lengthy involving upgrading, training, apprenticeships, counselling, etc. etc.

The basic idea, and one to be stressed again, is that the parallel functions of any such service are to (a) help the client regain his independence, dignity, self-respect and respect from others as well as (b) make money for society by decreasing waste of valuable human resources.

QUESTION:

Can we discuss the reality of changing policy to include a "preventive social service" function and the "development of potential" as basic ingredients to a new philosophy of viewing economic need?

APPENDIX "G"

SUBMISSION

by the

EDMONTON AND DISTRICT COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

to the

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON

at

Edmonton, Alberta

July 21st, 1970

Presented by the Rev. Edward M. Checkland
Chairman, Social Action

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:

This submission to your committee, made on behalf of the Edmonton and District Council of Churches, though not formally endorsed by the Council or any of its constituent members, will concern itself, as directed by the Executive of the Council, with that area of your responsibility described as "defining the problem and recommending appropriate action". We shall be concerned less with specific definitions and remedies than with broad general principles that should guide social policy in the matter of alleviating and eliminating poverty in Canada and elsewhere.

It was said long ago that "the poor you have always with you" and, in the minds of many people, this statement, its intent radically distorted by ripping it from its original context, seems pretty much to settle the matter. The statement is generally taken to mean that the existence of poverty is a fact of life embedded in the nature of the universe and is a fact that cannot be eliminated though its effects can to some extent be mitigated. A classic expression of this kind of thinking is found in "The rich man in his castle,

The poor man at his gate,
God made them high and lowly
And ordered their estate."

Though an increasing number in our society would vehemently reject this as an adequate or even apt description as the state of affairs which creates the poor as a class among us, there is yet a tendency for many people to accept poverty as inevitable for a substantial number in society. To such poverty, though no longer ordained by God, is nevertheless an unavoidable though regrettable-alleviate it but not be so unrealistic as to imagine that we can eliminate it. Common decency, it is felt, requires us to help but it should be recognized that there is little hope of removing the burden of poverty from those who suffer under it.

We should like to draw to the attention of your committee that even as ripped from their context, the words "the poor you have always with you" are a fundamental comment upon human nature and upon human society.

Concerning human society these words say that poverty is a function of civilization. Never in the history of mankind has any civilization been able to eliminate poverty. Poverty, indeed, has been the stone upon which every civilization has been built. The poor are always with us because civilization as men have created it requires that they be. No other conclusion can be drawn from human history as it has been lived on this planet.

Civilization has been built upon the backs of the poor. The classic examples of this are the slave, the serf and the coolie upon whose tortured muscles and tormented minds the glories of the past and even of the present were built. The wealth, power and comfort of the North Atlantic world are established upon the depressed conditions of people in Asia, Africa and Latin America.

In the modern world the once noble word "civilization" has suffered a considerable reduction in meaning. In practice it has become synonymous and almost coterminous with "development", i.e., the exploitation of the world's resources and the manipulation of the world's peoples required to make those resources exploitable. In short, poverty in our world has become a function of development. And now as the pollution of our air, our water and our land, becomes the evident and inevitable consequence of our pursuit of development the visage of poverty is assuming a grimmer and grimmer aspect and is becoming more and more the face of the future. To recognize that development has become the source of poverty in our world we have only to recall the comment made in the 1850's by an English visitor, Lord Carlisle, that it was the blessed good fortune of the United States that they had among them, as a class, no poor; and to note that the existence of the poor, as a class, in North America has become the central problem of our society. A case in point in Canada is the fact that N.H.A. mortgages originally designed to help lower income persons have in fact benefited them but little since money for mortgages was subject in the market to the power of the highest bidders who, of course, could not be persons from the lower income brackets. To understand that through the destruction of nature development has become the source of poverty for all in our society we have only to read our daily newspapers. Our predicament was succinctly, through probably unconsciously, put in words on a roadside sign in the Banff National Park which describes that park as "a museum of nature".

The point to be taken from these comments is simple and direct; namely, that it is men who make other men poor. Poverty is neither the consequence of the acts of God nor of the operations of a self-adjusting, automatic system. Poverty is the consequence of the acts of men operating their society. Nothing is more stupid than to try to explain poverty away either as an act of God or as the inevitable result of some vast impersonal process. Like the equally stupid alternative that holds that poverty is the result of the failures of the poor—which is precisely not what the words "the poor you have always with you" mean in their original context—this is a mere cop-out from responsibility. Persons, not the process, create poverty.

The words "the poor you have always with you" have become, therefore, a comment, in the twentieth century as they were in the first, upon human nature. Civilization and development are the work of men and the prevalence, persistence and extension of poverty is a fundamental comment on the kind of people we actually are in our civilized and developed world. We create poverty for other men because we are moved and directed by a mind that has become impersonal and mechanistic, more concerned with maintaining and operating the system than with the effects of the system upon human beings. Men are being made for the system and not the system for men. Much of the unrest in our society comes from the recognition of this fact and from the refusal to accept it any longer. It would seem, for example, we are being told just this by the refusal of the native peoples of Canada to embrace wholeheartedly the possibility of their being absorbed into the "white man's civilization". We have, it seems clear, become the kind of persons who in the name of development do such things to other people that perpetuate and extend the rule of poverty in the world. That we have become this kind of persons all unconsciously does not in any way lessen the enormity of what we have done and are doing. It rather increases it, for it reveals that we never really gave much thought to what we were doing as persons to other people and, therefore, to ourselves.

Defining poverty as a problem becomes, then, a matter not merely of scrutinizing the structures of our society to discover their inequities and methods of removing or lessening them. Fundamentally, it resolves itself into a willingness and capacity for self-examination and criticism individually and collectively to discover how, in private and societal relations, we are failing to be persons to one another and to those beyond our own western culture. Poverty is a manifestation of that failure at home and abroad. We must look at our hopes, desires and ambitions to discover what room they allow and make for the needs and interests of others. We need to examine our ways of life to discover where and how they place unequal burdens on the backs of the poor. For example, we have to become aware of the fact that the rate of return on investment, which is the fundamental factor governing the development of our cities and our natural resources, is not an adequate foundation for a human habitation. This probably more than any other single factor contributes to shoving that 30 per cent of our population below what the Economic Council of Canada and others have described as the "poverty line". Consideration of the needs of others cannot be considered a paramount factor in the development of our society when the rate of return on investment dominates its decisions.

The attitude which dominates our society as reflected in our concern for the rate of return on investment shows itself in the administration of our social assistance and welfare programs. They are designed to prevent starvation and destitution rather than to provide opportunity for a reasonable and responsible human life. They are so designed because to our mind the only fully human beings are those economically productive. Consequently the elderly, the unemployed, the handicapped, the poorly educated, the emotionally impaired and the otherwise disadvantaged are given assistance but little position in our society. For example, the established fact that retarded children are capable of showing affection to a degree considerably beyond that usually exhibited by the so-called normal person is given little consideration by us. In less well-developed societies such persons are often regarded as the chosen of God. It is not unfair to say that they are regarded by us merely as misfits because they do not fit the productive mechanisms of our economic order. It is of little consequence to justify ourselves by pointing to what is done for those on the fringe of our society. We have to face the fact that they are on the fringe of our society and to inquire what that says concerning us. We need to see and treat them as persons whose very disabilities provide for us the opportunity of being persons in ourselves in ways denied to us by the domination of economic interests over our society.

The fact is, moreover, that the majority of people in this world are on the fringe of human society. It is probably true to say that at the moment there are more people in the world living in misery than have ever lived here at any one time in human history. During the sixties the poverty-affluence gap between the undeveloped and developed nations became a truism. In that decade the gap was not closed but rather widened and largely because of the domination of investment over our minds.

What has been said in no way suggests that we should abandon or seek not to improve the ameliorative and palliative measures we now take on behalf of the poor. It is a case of continuing to do these things and doing them better while not leaving weightier matters neglected. Those weightier matters concern the quality of human life as it gives meaning to the lives of those who are little more than tolerated in Canadian society, and by our society throughout the world.

To establish a human quality of life for those on the fringe in our world should become the basis of domestic and external policy for Canada. The world in the next thirty years will become an increasingly managed world. Under the growing domination of economic consideration vast new powers have arisen in the form of global companies whose interest is in investment opportunities rather than in the quality of human life. At present these powers are not very amenable to control by any of the existing political and social structures of our world. Management of the world's resources as conceived by them is likely to emphasize exploitation and manipulation in the interests of investment with the benefits accruing to people being largely incidental to those interests. The interests of people must become the concern of governments not only within their own borders but throughout the world. Democratic governments rest upon the consent of the governed and if they do not become the champions of the interests of the dispossessed at home and abroad they will lose their credibility for people. Democratic governments must accept the responsibility of ensuring that human life is given an economic foundation that allows men and women to become free and responsible persons. An economic floor below which no person is allowed to fall must be established. But a floor is of little use if the sky is the limit for those whose main interest in life is in over-reaching their fellow men.

Consequently some kind of ceiling will need to be established to keep income differential within bounds. The unresolved problem of the industrial order has been income. The so-called wage-price spiral is evidence of this and witnesses to the disruptive effect of the lack of a ceiling which lack causes concern for money and economic interests to be paramount among men in their anxiety to maintain their comparative positions in the economic scale. Were we to be facetious we could suggest that the model for the future should be an elevator in which all travel together. Certainly, if we do not travel together, it is very probable that we will all go down together.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen, we have not been concerned to define for you precisely the ills of our society which create poverty nor to recommend to you specific remedies for those ills. For that you have available to you the advice of those whose expertise far exceeds ours in these matters. We have been concerned, rather, to raise for you, and for us all, the more fundamental question of the perspectives and values pursued in our society because we believe that something other than the logic of the attitudes expressed in our present aspirations and ambitions needs to be brought to bear upon the problems of our society. Those problems need to be seen as functions of our present attitudes and it is our hope that we may have made a modest contribution to that end.
